Of books such as Mr. Robert Buchanan's latest novel one is tempted to say, with Dr. Johnson, when he compared a woman's preaching to a dog dancing on its hind legs, "Sir, the wonder is, not that the thing is done well, but that it is done at all." No one can possibly read The Heir of Linne, and notice the extreme thinness of the story, the scantiness of the dialogue, the threadbare quality of the incidents, and the scamped and scrappy nature of the descriptions, without feeling that the wonder is that the novel has been written at all. Out of the stuff with which he has provided himself none but the wielder of a most practised pen could possibly have produced even so meagre a narrative as Mr. Buchanan has succeeded in putting together. And yet, in reading Mr. Buchanan's book, it is impossible to quite forget the power and vigour of which he is in reality capable. Those who have taken the trouble to study the Italian fresco-painters of the end of the seventeenth century, who covered the vast walls and ceilings of the late churches and palaces, will remember how sometimes the scamped figures that sprawl across a Heaven or an Olympus, on fluffy clouds of cotton-wool, show, when looked at closely, that the painter had in reality capabilities for higher things. Had the taste of the time demanded it, he could have filled his wall-spaces as fairly and as thoroughly, if not as delicately, as Luini. Since, however, he lived in an age that would tolerate bad work, and since to pad and scamp was easier than to work like an artist, he padded and scamped. Feelings of this sort are produced by reading Mr. Buchanan's novel. We feel he might easily do so much better; indeed, we remember that he has done much better, and yet we see him working so ill. Those who approach The Heir of Linne must banish from their minds the old ballad, which lends nothing in story or incident to the book. The plot of the present work, such as it is, revolves round the figure of Willie the Preacher, a broken-down Socialistic stump-orator, who in early life has been first a minister of the Scotch Church, then a friend and disciple of Robert Owen, till at last, ruined by drink and a touch of madness, he has broken from all creeds but some fantastic creation of his own, and has taken to wandering up and down the south-west coast of Scotland, preaching, singing, and begging. If in the picture of Willie the Preacher there is something that interests us, there is nothing either original or remarkable in any of the other characters of the book. They, indeed, are simply constructed out of novelists' common-form. There is the wicked old laird, who repents too late—that is, when he hears that the woman he has ruined and his child are drowned. There is the woman herself (of course a melancholy but saintly victim, who hopes against hope that the laird will do her right in the end), and the child (of course lovely and good till he grows up, and then tall, stern, and noble-minded), who are neither of them drowned, though, in the usual way, every one imagines they are. There is also the adopted daughter of the laird, who softens the old man into comparative decency of deportment; and the laird's Paris-bred heir. Need we add that besides there is a complicated will, with the usual intricate marriage provisions so much in favour with novelists; and, last of all, an innocent girl with whom the heir has gone through a mock marriage?

The faults of A Breton Maiden are in some ways the very opposites of those of the novel we have just been discussing. Instead of the work being that of a practised pen, it is essentially that of an amateur. Instead of the story being too thin and too commonplace, it errs from being confused with a crowd of incoherent incidents, and from relying too much for its interest on rather far-fetched situations. Every page, indeed, of A Breton Maiden shows signs that the author, if not exactly new to her business, has by no means completely mastered the technical part of the art of novel-writing. Still the faults that arise from lack of skill are in reality far less tiresome, and so far more pardonable, than those which come from padding. Brittany at the time of the Revolution is a good place in which to lay a story. The strange customs of the Bretons, their dogged, uncompromising national character, their storm-beaten sea-coasts, the wild and wind-swept heaths on which stand the cromlechs and dolmens still regarded with so much of superstitious reverence by the peasants, the weird beauty of that Celtic legendary lore of which the Bretons are now the chief guardians, all render Brittany a peculiarly promising scene for a novelist. To say that the "French Lady," who, as the title-page tells us, is the author of A Breton Maiden, has made the fullest use of her local colour would perhaps be going too far. Still she has not altogether neglected it, and has up to a certain point used her opportunity well. She is evidently intimately acquainted with Brittany and the Bretons, and so what she tells us of them is of real interest. Her account of the Bretons is thus the redeeming feature of the book, for it must be confessed that her plot becomes often very much confused. At one period, indeed, its development reminds one of a harlequinade, so rapid and so eccentric are the movements of the characters. They fly backwards and forwards, and play hide-and-seek with ferocious soldiers in old castles, woods, and farmhouses in a manner truly bewildering. Into this tangled web we do not, however, propose to introduce our readers. We will content ourselves with mentioning that among the characters there are—a Chevalier destined by his uncle to make a mariage de convenance with a rich heiress who, notwithstanding that the Chevalier falls desperately in love with her, does not marry him; a friend of the Chevalier who does marry her—that is, if the young couple ever escape from the dangers amidst which the end of the third volume leaves them; a disagreeable Breton noble who will keep proposing to the heroine; two amiable uncles; one amiable but invalid aunt; an honest farmer; a proscribed priest and his sturdy brother; a devoted servant, and a host of supers in the shape of loyal peasants and cruel soldiers. The following passages may be quoted to show that the writer is not without a certain descriptive power. The peasants row out in their open boats at midnight to hear mass, said upon the water by the proscribed Curé of their village, who is under the ban of the Jacobins:—

> Soon in the perfect silence of the night, only broken by the noise of the oars, was heard a distant silver bell; and every barque rowed towards the place from which the sound came. One large boat, all alone, was there in the distance, and, as soon as it was perceived, the eyes of the crowd of men, women, and children, in the other boats, were all directed towards it. They remained at a respectful distance and formed a semi-circular group round it; then the boat advanced towards the centre and stopped, and in the midst of the silence, broken only by the gentle murmur of the waves that came rippling up against the keels of the boats, a man's voice, close, strong, and solemn: "Dominus vobiscum!" and the kneeling crowd responded: "Et cum spiritu tuo!" and the Curé, clothed in his white surplice and embroidered stole, the golden threads of which now and then glittered like the twinkling light of a star, began to say

Mass to the serious and attentive crowd, whose murmured responses lost themselves on the moving waters. And, when the silver bell announced the elevation of the consecrated Host, the crowd prostrated themselves and wept aloud, for their shepherd was an outcast, and the consolations of religion they could only get by stealth.

We cannot leave the Breton Maiden without noticing the quaint Gallicisms which a "French lady" has scattered with no unsparing hand over her book. "It's most gallant. But who forces . . . ?" says the friend when the Chevalier announces his intention to marry. "Ah! uncle, uncle, whatever put it into your head to marry me?" is the pathetic exclamation of a nephew, not of a niece. Occasionally, however, the style ceases to be French, and drops, we are fain to admit, into the worst three-volume idiom—"One they were and one they were to be, and he was bright and handsome, and could plead so well!" If there were no reviewers, even the print and paper would call out on such writing. With one more criticism we shall rest content. It cannot be believed that a poem in Breton, or for that matter in Chinese, could exist with any lines that could possibly be translated, even into prose, thus:—"He is dressed like a peasant, blue overcoat with embroideries, blue waistcoat, and leather gaiters, small straw hat with red lines." The reader, however, must not be discouraged by these little weaknesses of style; for, after all, the interest of the book itself is very little affected by them.

FLOUR MANUFACTURE.*

ONE of the very oldest of industries, of which there is evidence in far-off prehistoric times, found in the lake-dwellings of Europe as well as in Egypt and in the East, is the preparation of the wheat grain for food by bruising, crushing, and milling. Man's original grinders were, of course, his molar teeth, but it may be presumed that these grinders wore out, as they still do, and instead of starving, as the poor old toothless lion does (is the natural death of wild beasts starvation?), being endowed with intellect and ingenuity, man ground his food between stones, and further, to save himself trouble, employed his women and his slaves to do it for him, as the Bible testifies. The fruit of the wheat plant—Dr. Kick says it is a fruit and not a seed (p. 21), because the germ is supplied with nourishment in the endosperm—that we eat has been the principal food of the nations of central Europe and the countries surrounding the Mediterranean for countless unknown generations, and has been carried as such to America and all lands peopled by Europeans. There are parts of the world too cold and parts of the world too hot for the wheat plant, but the grain or flour can now be carried to the outermost parts of the earth, and it will probably supersede in the long run, as a better food, the rice of the Chinese and the Indian nations.

This work of Dr. Kick's is the standard work on the modern methods of manufacturing flour, or, in simpler English, of milling, and the present is a second edition, with a supplement dated 1888, very carefully translated into English by Mr. Powles. The evolution of milling would be very astonishing if the complicated machinery of the present day for all purposes were not so familiar to us. Nevertheless, the march from the bruising stones now stored in museums to the roller mills of to-day ought to be of high interest. The power employed has proceeded from the hand and arm to the patient ass, to the water and wind power, to the steam now so much in vogue, which last is probably again to be replaced by a more economical and better force applied by electricity. Wind and water occupied a long period in the history of milling, and the miller is a romantic personage in many a song and many a story. There is a deep philosophy in the windmills of Don Quixote, and go where you may the miller will rank amongst the most intelligent of the population, by virtue, no doubt, of the educating influence of his machinery. The milling to which we have b n accustomed in England is the ordinary grinding with millstones, from the rough-and-ready way of the country miller by the stream with his water-wheel, or on the hill with his windmill, to the town miller with his silk dressing-machines and his superfine flour, each supplying his district according to the demand, or, rather, regulating the demand by the produce he is able to supply. Dr. Kick, being an Austrian, describes the process of milling with millstones, as practised in Austria and Hungary, and he explains the construction of the millstones themselves, the best being made of a French stone in sections, cemented together in the round millstone shape. The upper millstone is the "runner," the one that revolves, and the other performs the proverbial part of the nether millstone. The nether millstone has sometimes been made the runner, and sometimes both have been runners, but there has been no marked difference in the result. Millstones are best adapted for low grinding, which, according to modern notions, is a very low thing indeed, adhered to, we regret to say, by the English long after such low practices had been abandoned by nations of a higher milling civilization. Low grinding is performed by the stones being placed so close to one another that the grain is ground into one mass of crushed meal, to be afterwards "dressed," or sifted, by dressing machines of wire or silk, according to the miller's ability, into flour and offal. High grinding is performed by the grinders being placed so far apart as only just to touch the grain on the first occasion, to be succeeded by a dozen or more distinct, and, in a milling sense, different, processes of crushing. This high grinding is the modern milling, or flour manufacture, the science and art of which Dr. Kick's book fully describes, and is the authority in the hands of every miller who has any respect for his calling. Householders know that Hungarian flour is the finest and best that can be got for special purposes, and this flour has been imported from Hungary up to recent times to meet the demand for it. English millers, however, have now adopted the Hungarian method, as expounded by Dr. Kick; and the very best flour, as fine as any Hungarian, can be obtained of English manufacture. There is a demand in Hungary for the very finest flour, and a demand also for the lower sorts; hence the fact that the Hungarians and Austrians have elaborated the very complicated machinery now in use. Millstones have given place to rollers of iron, steel, or porcelain, much smaller and handier than millstones, and more easily adjusted. We will attempt to describe the modern process of high milling in the best mills in a few words, recommending the reader to Dr. Kick's book for further information as to his principal food; for, after all, what a small proportion does his meat bear to his flour food in his daily meals if he is a wholesome feeder!

The miller first catches his hare—in other words, he obtains the wheat that he requires, making selections for his special purpose from the great varieties that are offered to him on the market. This is not the place to treat of the different qualities of wheat; suffice it to say that the English farmer grows the finest white and red wheats, but they require mixing with others from a drier climate for the miller's use. Having made a suitable mixture of wheats, the first process within the mill is to thoroughly cleanse the grain. In a high-class mill this is the first ing nious and complicated operation that is likely to strike a stranger with wonder. The wheat looks fairly clean till the refuse of the cleaning is exposed to the naked eye, when the abominable stuff that would have otherwise "gone into consumption" is made painfully manifest. The berry goes through many different sorts of cleaning before it is entrusted to the rollers. Some wheat, which has been threshed on an earthern floor—Indian wheat, for example—must be washed and dried. All seeds other than those of wheat must be taken out. Foreign substances of all kinds, an indescribable medley acquired in transport, must be rejected; amongst these are small pieces of iron, needles, odds and ends of nails and wire, which would damage the rollers, to say nothing of our digestion. These trifles are seized by a series of strong horse-shoe magnets, through which the wheat is made to run. And the skin of the berry itself is thoroughly cleaned by machinery. There is a deep crease or furrow in the wheat berry, dividing it into two parts, as every one must know. This crease is a refuge for dirt, and can only be cleansed by dividing the berry into two parts. This duty is performed by the first set of rollers, and the true milling has begun by the first "break," as it is technically called, the rollers being set so high, or so far apart, as only just to separate the two sections of the grain at the crease. The grain then passes through six or more sets of iron or steel rollers one after another, each performing their office of "breaking." Some of these rollers are smooth, others are grooved, and the surfaces of a pair turn on their axes at a different rate of speed in the same direction, by which the breaking process is more complete. This breaking may be called process No. 1. After each set of rollers there is a "scalper," a milling term taken from the Americans. The berry being broken by the rollers, the scalper is a machine that takes from the broken berry whatever flour or refuse may be loosened; but this is not the fine flour which it is the object of the miller to make. The scalping may be called process No. 2. The product of the breaking rollers is then passed to the "purifier," a term used for the machine which separates the light particles of bran from the heavier particles by a current of air. Process No. 3. The product is then passed on to the porcelain rollers, which are a second series of six or more sets of fine rollers, and this process No. 4 is technically called "reducing." The product which is submitted to the reducing process is called dunst, semolina, coarse and fine; and middlings, coarse and fine. After each reducing there is purifying, as before described, and dressing. Dressing, process No. 5, is accomplished by sifting the product of the reducers through exceedingly fine silk dressers. To make fine flour, therefore, there is crushing, purifying, and dressing, to be repeated over and over again, until everything but the purest flour, or endosperm of the grain, has been eliminated—leaving a very beautiful object to the eye. It will be seen that the term purifying consists in separating the light from the heavy particles by currents of air; and the term dressing consists in separating the coarse from the fine particles by sifting. This is a short account of the milling carried on in our best modern roller-mills. The power, water or steam, as the case may be, is applied to the whole by means of bands and wheels; no hands are used, except to examine the results, and from the uncleansed wheat to the last process all is passed on automatically. There is, moreover, a curious dust machine, contrived to absorb all the dust flying about in a mill, which would not only be an annoyance to the men, but would also find its way into the flour. The finest Hungarian flour is indicated by Nos. 000, 00, 0, and the other qualities by Nos. 1, 2, 3, &c., showing that after No. 1 had been reached it was necessary to use 0's to mark further progress in refinement. The final result of good milling is 80 per cent. of flour, of which 50 per cent. may be very fine, 16 per cent. of bran and offal, and 4 per cent. of loss.

* Flour Manufacture: a Treatise on Milling Science and Practice. By Friedrich Kick. Translated from the second enlarged edition, with supplement, by H. H. P. Powles. Illustrated with 24 Plates and 113 Woodcuts. London: Crosby Lockwood & Son.

Millers usually divide their produce into flour of all degrees for which they may have a demand; pollard consisting of rejected portions of the grain which is not bran—very good cattle food; and bran, which is the mere outer skin of the wheat berry. The better the miller, the worse the bran, is a well-known saying amongst cattle feeders; for the good miller strips the outer skin off the grain, and leaves you nothing but skin or bran.

Dr. Kick's work is highly scientific and technical, and cannot be recommended for its amusing qualities. But it is the miller's text-book, and is a study for every one interested in a subject of vital importance.

THE LIFE OF MRS. ABINGTON.*

SEVENTY-THREE years after her death, and eighty-nine after her retirement from the stage, "Nosegay Fan" is promoted to be the subject of a memoir. Her early life was in sufficient contrast with her later career to justify the tongue of current scandal in wagging against her. Born of obscurest parentage—her father, first a soldier, afterwards kept a cobbler's stall; her brother was an ostler in Hanway Yard, and her mother died while Frances was still a child—she lived to "ride in her own coach," and, with more prudence than ordinarily distinguishes members of the class from which she sprang, to enjoy a comfortable maintenance during her declining years. She escaped, however, the less than dubious honour of a biography such as was assigned Mrs. Jordan, Mrs. Baddeley, Miss Bel'amy, or Mrs. Cibber. No pamphlet warfare attended her proceedings. Not a single entry under her name appears in Mr. Lowe's Bibliography of the Stage. It is difficult to know to what cause to assign this happy immunity. Gossip enough concerning her there was in her lifetime, God wot. This, however, is mainly buried in old and scandalous newspapers and magazines. Were it not for the record given to the world during her lifetime in that pestilent publication, The Secret History of the Green Room, there would be scarcely a reason to doubt that the virtues of Frances Abington were as shining as her abilities, and were calculated to shed a lustre upon the respectable family with which, after her advancement in her profession, she amiably, if gratuitously, allied herself.

Now even, when the anonymous compiler of to-day has cast upon Mrs. Abington a light which his predecessor of a couple of generations ago failed to afford, perhaps because the sight of a gem with so many facets bred a doubt as to his capacity to do it justice, pretty Fanny's peccadilloes are spared. No attempt whatever is made to drag her "frailties from their drear abode." Garrick's censure of Mrs. Abington is of course recorded. On the back of one of her letters to him Garrick has written that she was "The worst of bad women." This spiteful outbreak had, however, reference to her temper, after a more than usually fervid display of its nature, and might possibly be taken as a proof of her pious austerity. Seldom, indeed, has an equally decorous biographer dealt with a heroine equally frail. The marriage of Frances Barton in September 1759 to "Mr. James Abington, a trumpeter in the Royal service," is duly chronicled. We are told, moreover, that the name Mrs. Abington now bore was "a name she was destined afterwards to cover with lustre, but a name, so far as she was concerned, connected only with difficulty and unhappiness."

Of the circumstances that preceded or accompanied her marriage there is no hint. The separation which followed cannot be passed over in silence. With a discretion as rare as it is commendable, her biographer says, "As Mrs. Abington grew popular her husband showed unmistakable signs of jealousy, whether justifiable or not it is not easy to say; but things came to such a pitch, and the dissatisfaction grew so mutual, that by common consent they parted."

To what good fairy Mrs. Abington owes her happiness it is, in her biographer's words, "not easy to say." Certain at least it is that, while her distinguished talents have met with full and steady recognition, she has escaped most of the penalties of histrionic greatness. It is no business and no pleasure of ours to revive the accusations that were brought against her while she was still living, and remained, possibly through a justly entertained contempt for the polluted source whence they sprang, unanswered. We will even applaud the new system of preparing a theatrical biography which, passing by the materials on which previous scribes were accustomed to dwell, records all that is creditable to an actress, and places in the other scale nothing except her shrewishness. We content ourselves, accordingly, with saying of this beautiful, accomplished, and inspired vixen—the first Lady Teazle and, it has been held, the best Beatrice—that she has been more fortunate, as regards the records of her private life, than some of her contemporaries.

The artistic career of Mrs. Abington is not eventful. Much credit is due to her for the manner in which she educated herself; so that, while singing or selling flowers in Leicester Fields, reciting at public-house doors, or acting as servant to a French milliner in Cockspur Street, or cook-maid in the kitchen of Robert Baddeley of histrionic fame, she learned, according to the perhaps not very exacting standard of that day, to "read and speak French with facility" and to "converse in Italian." She appeared upon the stage, and created slowly a favourable impression. She then went for five years to Dublin, and returned the height of the fashion. Hitchcock, in his Historical View of the Irish Stage, speaks of her as "then" (1762) "esteemed one of the first comic actresses ever beheld in this kingdom"; and Tate Wilkinson, who acted with her at Smock-Alley Theatre, goes into unwonted raptures over this invaluable "jewel," which had been in Dublin "almost in a state of obscurity." Her taste in dress was admitted to be equal to her abilities; she was an acknowledged leader of the ton; ladies imitated her attire; and the Abington cap became the rage. Her subsequent career until her retirement was passed in the blaze of triumph. Its principal events are well known. The number of important characters she played, her influence over Johnson, who, though he could neither see nor hear, obeyed her command to go to her benefit; how Reynolds painted her as Miss Prue, and how Horace Walpole paid her the highest compliments, and gave her leave to bring an unlimited number of friends to inspect his possessions, are not these things told more or less unveraciously in the glowing chronicle of Dr. Doran? Suffice it to say that for thirty years she queened it over the stage on which she walked, stamped, played, fretted, and sulked in a manner that enchanted every one except those who were at the mercy of her whims and vagaries.

Not very difficult is the task of spreading over a volume the record of her successes. The casts with which pieces were played are given in Genest. These printed in extenso fill a considerable space. Records of her successes in Ireland are found in Hitchcock and elsewhere. Davies in his Life of Garrick, Dibdin in his History of the Stage, Boaden in his Life of Mrs. Jordan, supply more or less information, and the Garrick Correspondence furnishes a supply of petulant, spiteful letters which are reproduced, and constitute the most amusing reading in the volume. The prologues she recited and the lumbering impromptus which were written upon her contribute further materials; and the volume, thus constituted, extends to the regulation size of the less important theatrical biographies.

Bringing together a quantity of information only to be found by some research, this Life claims recognition. We should be thankful for more accuracy, and, though this perhaps is hypercritical, for a few traces of style. On p. 10 we are favoured with the following astounding cast for The Winter's Tale, which, as a literary curiosity, we copy in extenso. The date of the performance is said to be March 24, 1757:—Leontes, Garrick; Daffodil, Woodward; Tukely, Palmer; Dizzy, Yates; Sophia, Miss Macklin; Arabella, Miss Minors; Mrs. Dotterel, Miss Barton; Widow Damply, Miss Cross; Lady Fanny Pewit, Mrs. Bradshaw. So startling is this it throws other errors into the shade. We might otherwise congratulate our author on the discovery of Thomas Moseen, an actor and a dramatist previously unknown to fame, and of a play by Meliere (sic) entitled George Danyin; on speaking of Mrs. Baddelay (sic) as a cook, on the play of Albumazer, and on Mrs. Abington, as regards dress, appearing "parfaitement habile." What, however, is more aggravating than any error is the dexterous way in which quotation marks are used. Where these leave off is not seldom a matter of dubiety to the reader. This has the advantage or disadvantage that the author may be robbed of the credit of some cunning turn of phrase or startling departure from recorded history the responsibility of which may be fastened upon Genest, or Davies, or who knows what chronicle, of things theatrical. The grace and refinement of style meanwhile may be guessed from the passage in which it is shown that after "Mrs. A——s" (why this discretion?) "return to England . . . the same jealousy" (on the part of Mrs. Clive) "again broke out and would sometimes display itself in bickerings and altercations that were not entirely congenial to the delicacy of the sex." An engraving of Cosway's portrait of Mrs. Abington appears in the volume, which is supplied with a full index.

COOKERY BOOKS.*

THE triumph of the "little dish" is one of the rare pieces of real progress in an age of much sham progress. It is a triumph which has been hardly won, and over which, perhaps, it is pardonable for those who by learned discourse in the proper places, such as this Review, have helped it on, to pride themselves. It is not, we think, more than ten, certainly not more than twelve or fifteen, years since an indignant correspondent of that very estimable paper the Queen, which had been setting a good example by giving recipes of the kind, broke out in thunder on the head of the devoted editor. "How long," he asked, or at least he used words to this effect, "were these degrading kickshaws to be held up to imitation?" And then followed a passage which was so exquisitely British and human that it has dwelt in our memory as things seen in a casually taken up newspaper do not often dwell after many years. "Young ladies," said the indignant one, "would lose their appetite, and young men their patience, before the joint appeared." We forget whether the editor of our esteemed contemporary summoned up courage enough to hint that possibly "the joint" might never appear at all, and might, once in a way, be no great loss. Probably he did not, and was wise in abstaining, for the afflicted enemy of kickshaws might have gone away and done some rash act like the historical admirer of crumpets. But we have always dated the triumph of little dishes from that letter, not of course as a cause, but as a symptom. The correspondent of the Queen was like Mr. Swinburne's Pagan priest. He saw the little dishes; "he knelt not, neither adored them"; but he evidently knew that "the joint" was doomed at least as a sole and single source of food. Far be it from us to wish that it should suffer any further eclipse than that of having other lights to share and vary its sometimes rather oppressive splendour.

Mrs. De Salis has done as much as another to assist the substitution of aristocracy for tyranny. We do not, indeed, much like her catchword "À la Mode." In the finer and greater arts, such as cookery, fashion is nothing. Little dishes are not better than large ones because they are fashionable, but because they are cheaper, more varied, healthier for persons who do not take a great deal of exercise, and better suited to add an interest to life. However, no doubt the great name of "Beef à la Mode" gives the phrase a certain authority in cookery. Mrs. De Salis's opinions on what the later Lord Peter would have called "the general question" are sound, for she admits that she thinks oysters best when unadorned. But it is no paradox to say that in art we do not want the best only; we want all the good things; and in many ways (with a restriction to be noted presently) cooked and dressed oysters are very good things indeed. We question, indeed, whether there is a better dish of its kind in the world than the old-fashioned scalloped oyster. The learning in the introduction is but kitchen learning, and when Mrs. De Salis says that Essex and Suffolk are the most celebrated localities for oysters, she must mean Essex and Kent. Nor do we know what she means by "the celebrated Rocher de Cancale oyster." The "Rocher de Cancale," it need hardly be said, is famous as a place of eating, not of fishing, oysters; and if Mrs. De Salis has ever eaten oysters at Cancale itself (where there are no rocks at all) we think she will agree with us that they are no great shakes. But all this does not matter. The important point is the receipts. We do not observe in these any warning against tinned oysters such as we should like to have seen. They are sometimes very unwholesome; they are almost always tough; and they are generally either flavourless or coarse. No doubt there are exceptions; but as a rule we should say, "Don't have oysters at all if you cannot get them fresh." Mrs. De Salis, however, gives and largely uses in her receipts a preparation called oyster powder, which is derived from the actual fresh fish, and which, though we have not tried it, seems not unpromising. We like the recipe for "Attelets of oysters"—a sort of a cross between a scallop and a rissole. "Little bombs of oysters" are of the more elaborate order of cookery, but excellent. Of oyster sandwiches we do not approve; they are sloppy, and the oyster has a fiendish habit of evasion. Neither are we great partisans of curried oysters, which are nearly always tough. But "Chartreuse of oysters," "Oyster cream," and "Fleur d'huîtres au cordon bleu," may all be recommended to those who believe in very elaborate cookery. For ourselves, without being rigid puritans as to oysters au naturel, we are inclined to think that the simpler accommodations are the best. Of these there is a capital fricassee here; also a good "Huîtres au plat." "Oyster roly-poly" sounds and reads a little like confusion, but it may be good; and we really do not know that in all the book, where there is nothing bad, there is anything better than "Stewed oysters of the last century." This is very much like the traditional receipts which people used to do for themselves in little silver saucepans in the days of suppers. A few miscellaneous shellfish receipts are added, and they make a very good finale. Mrs. De Salis has the large charity to condescend even to periwinkle patties. The whelk must, after this, feel jealous at his surely arbitrary exclusion.

The companion volume on Soups and Dressed Fish (the latter a good old phrase which has rather gone out of late) has, of course, a much wider subject; but the author very modestly and honestly disclaims much originality here. Still we find some novelties, at least novelties to us. The opening article, "Alma Mater Soup" (it would, we think, make an English University cook stare), is a kind of glorified sheep's-head broth which we do not remember to have seen before. "Purée d'asperges" and "Potage aux pointes d'asperges"—two good things (but the latter is the better) often confounded in English menus—follow with other well-known soups. In the Bouillabaisse receipt we miss the bread which plays such a large part in the best form of the soup, and indeed sometimes makes Englishmen deny it the name of soup at all. The Bisques are good; but is not bisque rather too much eating and drinking mixed? The most orthodox soup, "à l'Impératrice," is, if we mistake not, a simple consommé with poached eggs in it, which is said to have been invented, and succeeded, on the spur of the moment at Compiègne. Here it is a purée of lettuce. We do not find, and we are not sure that we ever have found in a book, the plain but excellent fish soup which is called, in Scotland—at least in the North of Scotland—"Fish in sauce," or "Fish and sauce." And we think it a mistake to use sherry, unless it be very old brown sherry, instead of Madeira in turtle soup. But these are the only unfavourable criticisms that occur to us, and these are not very unfavourable. In the fish division we only do not find much to notice because all is good. We should add some garlic to the "Barbue à la Provençale," and in the receipts for dressing salmon we note a little of the (we had hoped) obsolete error of smothering the natural and unsurpassable flavour of the fish with all the strongest foreign tastes of sauce. But "Soles à la désso" deserve particular notice.

Mrs. Maitland's book is as miscellaneous as the meal for which she is catering. Her recommendation of ordinary saucepans for making coffee and chocolate is rather unusual. There are numerous receipts for fresh bread, cakes, &c., especially Northern varieties of the latter. Both "John Peel's teacakes" and "Liverpool Exhibition hotcakes" read well, but caraway-seeds in Bath buns are all wrong. After more than a hundred varieties of this kind we come to sandwiches. A honey and oatmeal variety of these we do not remember to have seen elsewhere, and there is another curious device of the same sort composed of Devonshire cream and biscuit powder. "Lauretta sandwiches," yet again of the same kind, but depending generally on cream cheese, with very original garnishings, may also be noted. In fact, these are interesting additions to that restoration of the sandwich which we are glad to see, and which is one of the not many good results of the practice of five-o'clocking. The cider-cup receipt is fair: but it is a vain imagination that ice should not be put into cider-cup. It can be cooled that way just as well as by the tedious standing in a refrigerator, and there is absolutely no difference of taste. The note to "put the sugar last of all" into claret cup is a more important error. What is the result? The fine powder revives the effervescence of the soda-water, and the mixture, losing an unnecessary amount of gas, becomes vapid. The best way is to put sugar, flavourings, and whatever "alcohols" are used, first of all; to add the claret after these have well amalgamated, and to put in the fizzing water last of all, even, if anybody likes, after the ice. But perhaps no lady ever did quite understand cups. The "Mandarin's" cup is ingenious, but rather a punch than a cup. There is a good cool tankard; and, on the whole, the book, at a small cost and in very small space, provides an unusually miscellaneous collection of receipts for the same meal.

The fourth book on our list is, like all the others, small and of small things; and also like all the others makes a commendable attempt to provide novelties; but it is of a more general and miscellaneous character. Mrs. Davidson appears to have drawn largely on Spanish receipts—a source not hitherto much worked in our country, probably because of the notion that, except chick-peas, garlic, and oil, there is nothing in the Spanish cook's pharmacopœia. A considerable variety of tortillas is given, but the tortilla of Mrs. Davidson appears to be an omelet, while we had always understood that the real or Mexican tortilla is a pancake or fritter, the difference, of course, being the inclusion of flour. "Bacalao," or dried fish, also figures. Two tripe receipts of Spanish character, or at least names, may please those who delight in that savoury, and a "Sole asado"—a kind of sole au gratin—reads well. Even a deslichado doblado might, if he liked sweets, rejoice in a "Soplado," which appears to be a sort of marchpane or almond sugar cake. "Rosquilla" is a much more unfamiliar thing of the same kind, the unsubstantial foundations whereof appear to be eggs, aniseed, and sugar. "Buñuelos" simple, or "Malaganian" (a name strongly suggestive of Famongomadan, and the other gigantically denominated giants in the Amadis), "Bollos," "Manecados," "Mantequillas," "Soplillos," "Turon," all these things will look well in menus, and provided man fears not toothache or cloying, perhaps not taste ill in the mouth. The oddest named thing in the book is "Angel's hair." We shall not say what it is, only observing that, of all the angels we have known (and thank Heaven! we have known many), no one ever had hair in the least like this. We do not know that we care much for iced soup, but if anybody does, he will find two prescriptions here; and there is a good Puchero. The two receipts "à la Valenciana" contain oil enough to satisfy anybody; but, without sharing the British delusion above mentioned, we can hardly believe that any Valencian receipt for cooking mutton and chicken can be totally destitute of garlic. For do not Valencians, or did not they, speak a dialect of the Langue d'Oc? Various réchauffées of beef with Hidalgish names—"fricando," "rehogardo," "guisado," omne quod exit in o—are promising enough, and Spanish onions, "rellenas," sound to the manner born. It should not be supposed that Mrs. Davidson confines herself to these outlandishnesses. We have only cursorily noted the most novel or novel-sounding of some three hundred receipts. As may be guessed perhaps by the cunning, even her English prescriptions have a general tendency to the full-flavoured; but full-flavoured cookery, though English interiors cannot stand a long continuance of it, is well enough now and then, and we recommend the book as having what neither all nor most cookery-books have—a place and a character of its own.

Miss Jones of all our authors alone appears not for the first time, and her book is occupied solely with the comparatively poor creature "Sweets." For these reasons, and these only, we dismiss her more briefly; but those whom her matter concerns will find her a faithful and fertile source of information.

THE CLASSICAL REVIEW.*

THE Classical Review has entered upon its second year of existence, and that the sanguine expectations with which it was started have not been altogether disappointed may be conjectured from the fact of an Archæological Review being now projected by the same publishers. That the Classical Review has well earned all the success which it has achieved will not be denied by anybody who has studied the successive numbers as they appeared, now collected in a handsome and serviceable cover for the library shelves. Not the least interesting parts of the Classical Review are the obituary notices of recently departed scholars. Chief among them is the illustrious Johan Nicolai Madvig, who died at the end of 1886, aged 84; not by any means a mere savant, he was an active politician, a member of the Danish Parliament, and at different periods Minister of Worship, Inspector of Education, and President of the Council. "He was the hero of the whole Danish student-world, and to the last he delighted to associate with them." On his critical work many acute and some flippant attacks have been made, but the scholars who were best able to detect the faults of his method were most enthusiastic in recognizing its commanding merits. Cobet's words in proposing his health deserve to be requoted:—"Pugnabimus tecum, contendemus tecum, eoque vehementius pugnabimus quo te vehementius admiramur." Amongst other deceased scholars mentioned in the Classical Review are Dr. Thompson (Master of Trinity), a fastidiously sound Platonist, a triumphant vindicator of the Sophist's authenticity, and the maker of many caustic witticisms; Henri Jordan, unrivalled as an authority on Roman topography; G. H. Heslop, editor of many speeches of Demosthenes; Wilhelm Henzen, an eminent specialist in Latin epigraphy, well remembered for his courtesy to strangers at Rome; and Carl Schaper, a fluent Latin speaker, editor of Virgil, who did not relax the energy of his research even when his mortal sickness was upon him. The November number of the Classical Review contains a pleasant account of Windisch's memoir of Georg Curtius, the learned but ever learning philologist. A critic rather than an enemy of the new school of grammarians, he had the knack of laying his finger on the weak places of "the doctrines now rapidly becoming popular."

In this as in other matters of controversy the conductors of the Classical Review have succeeded in presenting both sides of the question. Karl Brugmann's "complete official statement of the new Indo-European grammar" is received with gushing welcome by one philologist (who disclaims that offensive description); but another, less convinced or more cautious in expressing his assent, writes with judicious reserve on Engelhardt's theory of Latin conjugation. "Some of the illustrations [of the syntax] are enough to take away the breath of a scholar who has not followed the more recent developments of comparative philology." Professor Wilkins goes out of his way to doubt whether Engelhardt is meat for babes, perhaps because Mr. T. C. Snow had previously declared that Brugmann's book not only could be used by schoolmasters, "but it must." In Mrs. Oliphant's last novel one of the characters, a good Conservative, favours Greek and Latin, because (it is innocently declared) there cannot be any newfangled ways of teaching old things like the classics. Of the prospects of the movement for "reforming" the English pronunciation of Latin Mr. Postgate, writing in April, took an extremely hopeful view; the alterations proposed in Messrs. Trübner's pamphlet had been approved by the Philological Societies of Oxford and Cambridge, and it was expected that at Cambridge the system would be put into practice at the beginning of Michaelmas term. Admitting the existence of differences among the Reformers, Mr. Postgate considered that there was a fundamental agreement, as to "general effect and essential particulars," sufficient to justify a beginning in practical work. It is not stated whether the scheme of pronunciation (that which is attributed to the Augustan period) is to be extended in its entirety to the earlier and later writers, or whether the unhappy undergraduate is to modify his pronunciation according to the date of his author.

Under the head of Appeals, J. E. B. Mayor demands with justice that "the republic of scholars" shall extend a liberal support to Professor Wölfflin's Thesaurus of Latinity. The subscribers take 250 copies, so that only 280 are offered for public sale; and four volumes have already appeared at the very moderate price of 12*s*. each. In this Archiv für lateinische Lexicographie "many hundreds of words are registered for the first time," and "the whole method of lexicography is criticized from many points of view"; so that an eye trained by these volumes will search the field of Latinity "with a clearer vision and a more definite aim." A small subsidy is allowed by the Munich Academy, and the highly capable editor receives no remuneration; but an increase of subscriptions is urgently needed. Another proposal, not less deserving of serious consideration, but not appealing to the pocket, is to adopt Mr. E. M. Thompson's scheme for making a descriptive catalogue of classical MSS. in public and private libraries, in the first instance at home, but afterwards (if possible) abroad. The editor of the Classical Review is anxious to be informed of the existence of any such MSS. and of the names of persons willing to assist in drawing up the descriptive catalogue. Chronological order will be preserved as far as possible, and a start is to be made with the Greek poets. It may be noticed here that Mr. W. F. R. Shilleto's index to the Classical Review, exhaustive as it is, does not give sufficient help to the hasty reader. Thus in referring to it for the above scheme, no mention is found under the head of "Catalogue," or "Manuscripts," although it appears under "Scheme," "Classical," and "Thompson." It would be easy to criticize the manner in which the editor has allotted the not very great space at his disposal; but he has many tastes to consult. Some will think that justice has not been done to the scholarship of the New Testament; others that more than is due has been conceded to numismatics and other branches of archæology; but this at least is a movement in the right direction. Thanks to the co-operation of gentlemen connected with the British Museum, there is no longer any excuse for the Latin and Greek literatures being taught and learnt as if they had never stood in direct relation with real life. Every facility is afforded in the Classical Review to scholars who are anxious to keep themselves abreast of Continental research. Some persons will be surprised to discover the great and successful activity of French scholarship. Practical training in palæography is given at the École des Chartes; and an Album Paléographique was published last year, which contains, with descriptive letterpress, fifty photographic facsimiles, taken chiefly from French MSS., ranging from the fifth to the seventeenth century. As Mr. Thompson remarks, it is easier to send the MSS. (in facsimile) to the world than to send the world to the MSS., and he hopes that a future increased demand of these facsimiles will result in lowering the present almost prohibitive prices. The subject of classical education in France is discussed in a series of letters, not yet complete, addressed to the editor by a French professor.

In original articles, though there are a few both important and interesting, the Classical Review is somewhat deficient. The bulk of each number is given to elaborate notices of recent English and foreign editions, written in the German style, and signed in every case with the reviewer's name or initials. To this plan the objections are obvious; but none of the possible evils have as yet arisen. These detailed criticisms of important books will be found specially useful by the diligent scholars who keep their texts "noted up to date." It is important to know what J. E. B. Mayor says about Friedländer's Martial, Robinson Ellis about Bücheler's Juvenal, or Jebb about Schmidt's Greek Dramatists, not because it is the dictum of a great scholar, but because it is certain to be well said and worthy of record. Up to the present time readers of the Classical Review have not been enlivened by a controversy. We are glad to see that the "Note and Query" system has been adopted and successfully developed. Many of these "little bits" are capital reading, instructive as well as suggestive, and the plan ought to draw valuable contributions from scholars who are unable or unwilling to undertake the labour and expense of producing complete and substantive editions of the classics. Moreover, a man may be an indifferent scholar, quite unfit to write a treatise or make an edition, yet he may have a few bright ideas which ought not to be lost. Much future elucidation may be collected by saving these classical candle-ends. Not the least interesting of these casual paragraphs is Dr. B. H. Kennedy's only contribution to the first volume of the Classical Review: the proposed derivation of titulus from stilus, initial "s" being dropped as in many other words, and titulus being either reduplicated from tilus or converted by assimilation from the diminutive tilulus. This happy thought was suggested by reading in Rabelais the phrase tiltre au dessus, the title above the page—the stilus above the stilus—that which is written above to explain that which is written below. Unnecessarily, as we think, Dr. Kennedy makes an apology for dipping into his Rabelais. It was for the sake of the old French, not the matter; but let that pass. Old-fashioned scholars will notice with pleasure that Greek and Latin versification has not yet taken its place among the lost arts. Mr. E. D. Stone gives in Greek a patriotic Carmen Sæculare:—

γῆς κρατεῖν, τέχνας τ' ἐπασχεῖν πολυπόνοις μοχθήμασι,
'Ινδίκην τ' ὅσοι κατοικεῖτ' ἢ Λιβυστικὴν χθόνα Καναδίαν τε τήν τε νῆσον τὴν ἐπώνυμον νότου ταὐτὰ καρδίαις φρονοῦντες εὐτόνοις γηρ.ύμασιν τὴν ἔτος τόδ' εὐθενούσης κύριον τυραννίδος νῦν ἄγουσαν εὐλογεῖτε, πέμπετ' αἴσιμον μέλος.

Mr. G. C. Warr writes a Dedication from the forthcoming Echoes of Hellas; and "G. Denman, Trin. Coll. Camb. quondam Soc." has made a copy of Greek Iambics out of Black-eyed Susan (ἡ μελάνοσσος Σούσαννα). We believe that the Greek will suggest to those who have nearly forgotten them the English words of Susan's "sweet William":—

βέβαιος ἡμὴ πίστις αἰὲν ἐμμενεῖ
φέρ', ἐξαλείψω χείλεσιν πτηνὸν δάκρυ· ἀποίχομαι μὲν, νόστιμος δ' ἐλεύσομαι.
ἄνεμοι μεταλλάσσοιεν θε· καρδία δ' ἐμή.
μαγνῆτις οἷα, πρός σε, τὴν Ἄρκτον, ῥέπει·
οἴκοι μενόντων μὴ πίθῃ λόγοις βροτῶν, πίστιν θελόντων ψεύδεσιν διαστρέφειν, ὡς δῆθεν ἀνδρῶν ναυβατῶν, ὅπῃ χθονὸς τύχωσ', ἔρωτα καινὸν εὑρόντων ἀεὶ—πιθοῦ μὲν οὖν σὺ ταῦτα προσποιουμένοις, σὺ γὰρ πάρει μοὶ πανταχῇ πλανωμένῳ.

It happens that relatively few pages of the Classical Review have been devoted to Ancient History. Mommsen's last volume (The Roman Provinces under the early Emperors) receives a short review; so do Fränkel's revised edition of Boeckh's Public Economy of Athens, and Schiller's History of the Empire. Roman Jurisprudence comes in for incidental discussion in Mr. Roby's examination of some of the points of law involved in Tyrrell's edition of Cicero's Correspondence. Full accounts are given of recent excavations at Assarlik, Smyrna, Tiryns, and elsewhere. In promising to deal with all that concerns the language, life, and literature of Greece and Rome down to the year 800 A.D. in the case of the Western Empire, and to the year 1453 in the case of the Eastern Empire, the editor had undertaken a sufficiently arduous task; and he is to be congratulated on having distributed his pages over the different epochs of this wide period, not of course with equality, but certainly with judicious impartiality.

One of the most practical features of the Classical Review is the monthly list of new books published in England and on the Continent, with the prices duly stated. This by itself makes the Classical Review indispensable to teachers. A record is kept of the most important recent events at the English and other Universities. It would be pleasant to discuss some of the innumerable questions of interest which are raised in this volume. Enough has been said to prove that the Classical Review has been well conceived, well managed, and well executed.

A CENTURY OF BALLADS.*

THERE has always been a kindly feeling in English literature for those artless old ballads of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries which travelled through the country in countless pedlars' packs to be the only learning of many a cottage and the delight of many a fireside. In the pages of Walton—pages which seem perennially fragrant with meadow-sweet and flowering rushes—one of Mr. Piscator's chief allurements (or baits) to his companion Viator is an "honest Alehouse," with its "cleanly room," its "Lavender in the windowes" and "twenty Ballads stuck about the wall"; and Swift, describing a country home in "Baucis and Philemon," does not omit these modest mural decorations. "I cannot for my Heart," says Addison in the Spectator, "leave a Room before I have thoroughly studied the Walls of it, and examined the several printed Papers which are usually pasted upon them"; and he goes on to mention one of the very pieces specified by Swift, the pretty "Tragical Story" of "The Children in the Wood"; adding, incidentally, that the late Lord Dorset (i.e. Prior's patron) "had a numerous collection of old English Ballads, and took a particular Pleasure in the Reading of them." Goldsmith, again, frankly admits his preference for "Barbara Allen's Cruelty," as rendered by his father's dairymaid, over any of the quavers and roucoulements of Signora Colomba Mattei; and in the Vicar of Wakefield he dilates upon the "soothing ballads" sung by the blind fiddler and Farmer Flamborough. Evidently, in those words from The Winter's Tale which Mr. Ashton quotes in the forefront of his book, "he loved a ballad but even too well."

Some of these homely canticles, which were so grateful to Goldsmith and Addison and Swift and Walton, Mr. Ashton has collected into a goodly volume, with an environment of luxury entirely alien to the "brown sheets and scurvy letter" of their originals. He has also copied with much spirit (one hesitates to use the long-suffering word facsimile) the rude old plank-cut designs which adorned and (with some latitude) interpreted them. Many of these, although, like the penny showman's characters, they play diverse parts, have considerable vigour and some pictorial feeling. There is a portrait of Queen Elizabeth prefixed to "The Bride's Good-morrow" which is almost a work of art. Others, as, for example, that to "The London Ladies' Vindication of Top-Knots," which represents a very décolletée damsel of the Lely type profusely decorated with patches, are useful indications of costume. Others, again, as the heading to the "Merry Milkmaids" and "Barbara Allen's Cruelty," are so quaint and elementary as almost to arrive at humour. Of the ballads themselves, most of the interest that still clings to them is rather antiquarian than literary. One may learn from "A Posie of Rare Flowers" some of the pretty old garden names ("Start-up and kiss me," to wit); from "Heyho, Hunt about," what were the popular names for women; from "The Sorrowful Lamentation of the Pedlars" what fashion of ware they carried in their packs; and from "The Traders Medly" those cries of London which sprightly Mr. Will Honeycomb (surely with superfluous tolerance) christened the ramage de la ville:—

> Ripe Kentish Cherries for three pence a Pound,
> Figg, Figg it away, for I tell you they'r sound,
> Hot Pudding Pies, here's two for a Pennie,
> Come buy my card Matches, as long as I've anie;
> Flowers for your Gardens,
> Come buy my bak'd Wardens,
> Here's two for a Farthing;
> Will you buy my Furbeloe Pears?

"Here's Milk for a Pennie a Quart," says another stanza—a statement from which, however, it would be rash to draw conclusions without very precise data as to the value of the currency. Upon the social ballads, among which the foregoing are classed, follow the supernatural division, perhaps to be more accurately qualified by the adjectives "gruesome" and "grisly" than the much-abused prefix "weird." These deal largely with witches and witch-finding, and the doings generally of his Satanic Majesty, who, in the head-piece to "Strange and True News from Westmoreland," is certainly painted at his blackest. This doleful tragedy, printed "at the Golden Ball in Py Corner," and going (rather incongruously) to the tune of "The Summer Time," relates the condign fate of one Gabriel Harding, who returning home drunk, murdered his wife with a blow on the breast, and was afterwards himself "removed" by the Devil in the guise of a stranger clothed in green, all of which is attested by "the Chiefest in the parish," who have thereunto set their hands. Another, "The perjured Ship Carpenter" (of Gosport), offers a salutary monition to all young mariners, who, "one foot on land and one on shore," court damsels "to be their dears," and then desert them:—

> I hope this may be a warning to ALL
> Young men how innocent maids they enthral.
> Young men be constant; and true to your love,
> Then a blessing indeed will attend you above.

Le style en est vieux, as Alceste says, but the morality is irreproachable. The "Historical Ballads," which include a picture of the execution of King Charles I. of Blessed Memory, and bewail the "most solid FUNERAL" of his son, come next; after these the "Love Ballads," one of which seems expanded from the amatory conceit "I'll be a park and thou shalt be my deer," in Venus and Adonis:—

> Be thou the Swan,
> I'll be the bubbling River,
> Be thou the gift,
> and I will be the giver.
> Be thou the chast Diana,
> and I will be as chast,
> Be thou the Time,
> I'll be the houres past.

"Local and Miscellaneous Ballads," "Sporting Songs," "Drinking Songs," and "Songs Naval and Military," make up the collection. One of the last-named examples, recording the adventures of a certain Captain Chilver of the Benjamin, supplies that hitherto unfound rhyme to "silver" which long ago taxed even the ingenuity of the author of The Mikado. On the whole, Mr. Ashton's compilation is exceedingly interesting, though it may be doubted whether regarded as literature it deserved so sumptuous a setting as a guinea quarto.

SOME VOLUMES OF VERSE.*

THE question whether man's capacity of silliness is greater in prose or verse has yet, we believe, to be decided. Statistics are wanted, for your poet is somehow able to struggle into print where your prosaist has perforce to remain himself his only publ[illegible]. We venture to think, however, that if comparison might be made and a balance struck, it would be found that the superior ass is the poet. In the very nature of rhyme there is something inimical to reason. The very greatest poets have not scrupled to write nonsense now and then; while others, quite eminent in their degree, have never written anything else. What, then, can we expect of the ordinary human being when he (or she) is tempted to drop into poetry? How should he escape the ironical fate that has snapped up so many of his betters? how, save to his utter destruction, dabble in a material the use of which has proved fatal to the liveliest wits of the world? To them it was sport, to him it is disgraceful death. Perhaps the wisest thing about him is the spirit in which he meets his doom. "'Thank'ee,' said Mr. Toots, 'it's of no consequence. Good night.'" He writes, he rushes into type, and there is an end of him. In the language of Omar of Nuishápúr:—

> The eternal Printer from that Press hath poured > Millions of Tootses like him, and will pour.

He fulfils his function (it must be owned) with a certain propriety. Thanks to him, we know the maximum of human foolishness.

In The Lyric of a Hopeless Love, the heroine of which, a certain Flora, has much to answer for, there are some four hundred mortal pages, each of which contains, on an average, two stanzas of nine verses apiece. It follows, on a moderate computation and allowing for breaks, that Mr. Wilson has found it impossible to mourn the hopes that leave him in less than seven thousand six hundred and fifty octo-syllabics, exclusive of the Sonnet introductory, or "Key-Note" (for so he calls it), which puts on to the gross amount the orthodox fourteen more. Has Flora read them all, we wonder? And if she has, does she regret her coldness? Or is she sensible enough to rejoice in it? If she had accepted her bard, the world had been the poorer by close on eight thousand verses; so that, if she is patriotically inclined, and has any kind of feeling for the tongue that Shakspeare spoke, she has ample ground for sorrow. For the fact is, Mr. Wilson's Muse is beyond conception fluent, and as Mr. Wilson is prodigal of words without even a show of consideration for their meaning, and selects his rhymes with a fine regard for sound and a magnificent contempt of sense, the confusion he produces in the reader's mind is scarcely to be paralleled elsewhere. Here is a stanza taken more or less at random from the eight hundred and fifty or so in which he has deemed it incumbent upon him to have it out with Flora:—

> Because thou art perfection ripe,
> I took thee for my theme,
> Knowing that if I sang the type
> Of esperance supreme,

My words will double import bear,
Thy love and that which man will heir
When beauty shall redeem—
The starry scope of what subtends
The apex in thy soul which ends.

Is it wonderful that Flora should have been cruel? What young lady who respects herself and her mother-tongue would calmly endure the reproach of an apex ending in her soul and being subtended by the starry scope of something that is dreadfully nameless? "No wavering thought," pipes the poet a page or two before,

Unfaithful roves
To any bower of secret groves
Where leman smiles or frowns.

One can imagine better news for Flora than that; and when Mr. Wilson, preparing to take leave of her (and his proofs), calls out in impassioned tones,

O, Flora, Flora, nevermore
Can bardic haunts to me restore
The shades with thee replete, one can imagine her a little puzzled as to the writer's meaning, but hoping dimly that he thus signifies his intention of resigning the practice of the Muse, and uncommonly glad in the prospect.

"The author," says Mr. Waldo Messaros, "offers this little cage of singing-birds to the public with much diffidence and hesitation, and only because the voice of friendship called more loudly than that of inclination." It is the old business—this of the "partial friends"; and the wonder is that it has never yet been recognized by anybody who happened to be furnished with them that, the truth is, they are the poetaster's deadliest enemies. But this is by the way. Mr. Messaros goes on to note that, however this may be, "they"—the singing-birds aforesaid—"have given him comfort in many lonely hours" (with which, one would think, he might well have been satisfied) "and have been the means of many lasting friendships" (what more does the young man want?); but he "hopes that some heart-gates may be open to them, and that, entering, they may make grateful music in return for gracious hospitality." The wish is touching; the sentiment is neither inhuman nor immoral. But in the name of all that is Apollonian, what sort of hospitality can be expected for, and what sort of friendship with what sort of people could have been engendered by, such verses as these—

Where are the heavens that stooped to thy spindles
Bosomed and bowelled with ominous gloom?
Swept by the besom of summer that kindles
The hearth of the gods with the glory of noon—

which Mr. Messaros is valiant enough to address "To a Pine Tree"? We should add that he is not always so original as here. His Muse is generally fluent, and is sometimes quite melodious; and now and then, as in "Spring in Hellas" (which begins, however, with the unfortunate statement that he "trummed upon the sasa"), he contrives to write verse that is both genuine and graceful. But he should not address his mother as "Form of Juno"; and, in singing such mysteries as the birth of Eros, he should know better than (like a sportive linendraper) to begin his song with the bathos of his first two verses—

When Chaos wooed the Virgin Night,
And tore her robe in tender strife—and imagine that any one will read further.

The poetry in Darkness and Daylight is too wonderful for description or analysis. The author's numbers are a trifle rugged; her rhymes, like ill-matched couples, often clamour for divorce; such "effusions of sensibility" as she contrives to produce in earnest were beyond the genius of the mildest parodist to produce in jest. Her morals (it is just to add) are unexceptionable, while her cast of mind is serious and pensive in no mean degree. Thus, she is found extracting the moral of a Calico Ball in a way that William Wordsworth himself would have approved—

It was all to me, just
As much worth as the dust,
And will serve throughout life as my guide;

though, like ourselves, he might have failed to catch the exact drift of it. The story of the life and death of the "young and beautiful Cashmerian maiden," who chanced "in her frequent wanderings among the mountains to form the acquaintance of an officer of the Christian faith"—a strange and novel term for a curate, by the way, and a strange and novel place!—and who—came to a bad end "under a cathedral porch" in merry England, is one long dream of delight; so is her "Ride with Oneiros"; so (in short) is everything she hrs done.

While shoeless she fled from her mountains
To roam where the great Earth-god reigned—

Mr. Ambler's initial poem, "A Leaf from Marc Antony," sends us back to our Shakspeare, and sets us quoting with a new rapture. His "Eurydice" has a certain lyric movement, tame and inefficient though it be; his "Alcestis" is lacking neither in dignity nor in sentiment; his "Proof" is a parable ingenious and by no means ineffective; his other essays are less to be commended. His intentions are strictly honourable; but he lapses now and then into such statements as this:—

My haughty passions soaring wild
Fold up their wings, and nestle mild
Beneath her soft affection;

or this other:—

Along life's byways come to me
Two tired feet and slender,
Whereon I gaze as reverently
As on a vision's splendour.

Perhaps the best thing in his book is this:—

Dear, if I to thee could bring Any gift that holds no sting,
Any cause for mirth the years
Never should transmute to tears,

I should tread where none have trod—
None, except the Very God:—

In which the thought is just and the expression at least adequate. Better craftsmanship than Mr. Ambler's and a richer vocabulary are to be found in Rachel: and Other Poems. The tone and sentiment are unaffectedly and simply pious; the manner is Tennysonian; the writer has a trick of moralizing—as in the copies of verse entitled "On a Faded Harebell," "Green Leaves," "A Raindrop"—to name but these—which suggests a devout student of Wordsworth. The Rachel of the opening number reminds us rather of a pupil of the Laureate and Miss Yonge than of the wife of Jacob; but her meditation is well written, and has a mild fervour of idea and expression which will commend it to readers of a certain class. In a little cycle of sonnets—"Nanlizel Bay," "Kynance Cove," and so forth—there is more art, and there is also a stronger inspiration. A "Child's Birthday Hymn" is quite a good thing of its kind. The whole book, in fact, is more or less above mediocrity; it is a gathering of echoes, but they ring true, and are prettily contrived and phrased. Much the same may be said of Mr. Hayes's new poem, David Western—a long narrative in blank verse. But for Lord Tennyson it would never have been written at all; so that it is no fit reading for such as hold all imitative work superfluous. Those who think otherwise will find it interesting enough. Mr. Hayes has the virtues of sincerity of mind and loftiness of aim; he looks at nature with a most constant heart, howbeit he has an all-too Tennysonian cast in his eye; he has plenty of thoughts and plenty of words; and he has caught so much of the master's manner that he may be said to have found it a liberal education. If that be enough to make him a great poet, then is David Western a great poem.

Mr. Kane appears to have suffered; at all events he prefaces his work with a familiar stave from the Inferno, and he dedicates it, with much solemnity and excess of particularity, "To the Memory of the Days When it was First Begun." It is called The Islanders; it is couched in the Spenserian stanza; it is described as "A Poem in Seven"—not books, as the modern fashion hath it, but—"Cantos," which takes back the swift-minded to the brave days of Byron and Scott, and from which, if the swift mind is master of its choice, it will probably decline to return. For the scene of Mr. Kane's epic is "an island in the far seas . . . peopled by a race sprung from a Grecian hero, and a maiden sprung from the Sea"; and the events he has to narrate are worthy of the scene and the race. "Love and liberty," it appears, "are the laws of the island, and as yet have never been transgressed"; but, as constancy is an essential in law the first, while the bearings of law the second appear to be capable of no particular application, there can be no doubt that the condition of things is far from ideal. This reflection occurs with force to Glaucus, the High-Priest of the Sea. He is happily married to a fair and faithful one, whose name is Evanthe; and the Island is pre-eminently a place of "white limbs," "lilied limbs," "sweet limbs," "white woudrous limbs," "naked white of limbs," "harmonies of limbs," "lovely limbs," "wondrous limbs," "white wonders of maidenhood," "warm white curves," and all the rest of it. But he pines for Paris (as it were), and therewith for "sensual delights, lawless loves, and enjoyments free from the fetters of religion." One night he has a dream of (so to speak) a classic ballet at the Eden Theatre; and after this his mind gives way, and he is moved to relate the principal features of his dream to the night-winds and the stars. Evanthe listens unseen, and is shocked by the story, as any decent matron would. She demands the renewal of his love, as wives will under such circumstances, and Glaucus is so much incensed thereby that he slays her on the spot. That done, he addresses her in a speech of sixty lines or so, concluding in this wise:—

Lo, for this one last night we lie again,
Bosom to bosom as in hours of yore,
Lips laid to lingering lips—hearts full and fain!

As he says, so he does; and in the morning he tells the Islanders that "his life-dream is lost, and all its beautiful rivers fail." The Islanders are content, and some days after a babe of the female sex is cast upon their shores in a golden casket. This is the beginning of their woe, for Glaucus (to put things briefly) comes in time to regard the foundling as (metaphorically speaking) a substitute for Paris and the Eden ballet. She is more or less betrothed to his son Dion; but to this bold bad man, this viveur manqué, that matters nothing. He pursues her with improper overtures; she withers him with refusal; and he takes advantage of the fact that she has ideas of her own about religion to have her offered up, Andromeda-wise, to the Sea-god. She is rescued by Dion (who takes care to bring with him "the garments meet for her white maidenhood") on a raft, and the two float out together "to a deathless Now," while the Island, stricken with earthquake and a tidal wave, sinks comfortably to the bottom of the sea.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE Memoirs of the late M. de Falloux (1) make so much the most important book in their own department of French literature which has appeared recently, that they deserve not merely a first place, but a place to themselves. Taking literary and intellectual ability together with excellence of character, and adding the advantages of station and general accomplishment, M. de Falloux was not far from being the best man that the Royalist party in France has had to show since Chateaubriand. If he had not the eloquence of Berryer or of Montalembert, he was a much better Royalist than the latter and had other advantages over the former. In his literary work he for the most part chose to serve as herald to his friends, Mme. Swetchine, Lacordaire, Cochin, and others, but he was quite worthy of the "green palms" of the Academician. He must evidently have taken considerable pains over this book, of which he lived to see some proofs, and which his nephew, M. de Blois, has completed. Its interest is certainly great. To the merely general reader that interest may appear to diminish after the first two hundred pages, in which M. de Falloux is chiefly anecdotic. He tells us first of the state of his country-side, the Angevin border of La Vendée, in his youth before the escapade of Mme. de Berry made the July Government reduce La Vendée to an ordinary condition of things. He gives personal accounts of divers delightful country gentlemen, the most delightful being a certain M. de Candé, who, in the severity of his principles, first attempted to unroof, and then did actually wall off, part of his château when it was contaminated by Orleanist troops, but whose natural hospitality led him to convey fruit, game, and so forth, by secret means, to his politically-detested guests. M. de Falloux tells, from the account of the yeoman who saw it, the story of the murder (for murder it certainly was by all the laws of war as well of peace) of Cathelineau, and he has anecdotes not merely of some of the men of 1830 who frequented Royalist society for a time (Hugo had ceased to be a Legitimist almost before M. de Falloux's day), such as Sue, Balzac, and Sainte-Beuve, but of others, such as Bourmont, whose supposed treason he warmly denies. He early made a pilgrimage to pay his respects to the twice-exiled royal family in their vast and dreary retreat of the Hradschin at Prague, and he may be said to have known Henri Cinq all his life.

The greater part of the book, however, is occupied with the part taken by M. de Falloux himself in politics, from the time when he first entered the Chamber in the late years of the July Monarchy to the last blunder of the Monarchists a dozen years ago. And here the interest, though by no means lessened, appeals to a smaller class of persons; for it is almost wholly political, and to understand the book it is necessary to be acquainted with the very intricate political history of France during the last forty years. It is almost unnecessary to say that the perusal leaves us with no lessened opinion, either of the probity of M. de Falloux, of the unwisdom of the extreme Royalists, or of the fatal irresolution and lack of judgment of their master. The Count's own mot when an enthusiastic fils des croisés, Théodore de Quatrebarbes, had discovered in Henri Cinq a "Henri Quatre corrigé par St.-Louis"—"Ah! mon cher, je me contenterais d'un Charles Dix corrigé par Louis XVIII."—is a sound as well as a smart epigram. But we are bound to say that the same perusal has, if possible, lessened our opinion of the wisdom, the practicability, or the adaptation to any possible good result of the policy of the Droite Modérée. M. de Falloux, no doubt, did not invent that policy, and was not responsible for its invention. But we know no example in history which gives any hope of success, and we are sure that this example gives a sure presage of disaster, to any plan of trying to serve two masters in a similar way. Let us grant that total abstention from all public life, except on occasions of armed insurrection, is not desirable in such a case as that of the French Royalists; that a man may even allow himself to be sent to Parliament by electors who know and agree with his principles. But we cannot ourselves conceive by what casuistry a Royalist such as M. de Falloux could have allowed himself to be the Minister and adviser of a Republican President, and that President a Bonaparte. We are no great admirers of "the people" in the ordinary sense of the word; but we are sure that "the people" always judges, and rightly judges, a party which condescends to such a policy as a party which is either lost or deserves to be lost. Independently of this general error, the Moderate Right seems to have constantly committed two particular errors. It never quite knew whether it meant to serve Pope or King first; and it always blenched when matters came to the drawing of the sword, though it was quite ready to blow the horn. It has always seemed to us most ungenerous to accuse the Count of Chambord of hesitation and cowardice when these wise counsellors of his were constantly deprecating any attempt at a Loch-na-Nuagh or a Fréjus. It is at least possible that the White Flag might have been thrown to the winds in 1848 with success; we are afraid we must say that it could have met with no disaster more ignominious than the series of draggings in the mud by its own bearers, especially the Moderates, which it has undergone since. At the same time, no qualified historical student will deny a hearing to a policy represented by such men as Berryer and M. de Falloux himself, and they will find everything that can be said for it here. We cannot spare the book more space at present; but it may be repeated that the general reader can hardly fail to read part, at least, of it with pleasure, while every page is instructive to the politician. Especially may it be commended to any politicians who look forward some day to having to play a part such as that of M. de Falloux, and who hope to play it, not with purer intentions or greater abilities, but with better luck.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE Autobiography and Reminiscences of Sir Douglas Forsyth (Bentley), edited by his daughter, is the record of a distinguished career in Anglo-Indian diplomacy and exploration set forth within the reasonable limits of a single volume. We learn from the Autobiography—which is unfinished, and occupies only the first four chapters—that Sir Douglas Forsyth in his school days was considered a dull boy, and it was the mere report that his father had described him as the dunce of the family that spurred him to action. Other reported dullards have been moved to assert themselves by similar salutary yet galling means. By his success at Haileybury College, when preparing for the Indian Civil Service, his shortcomings at Rugby were speedily forgotten. A pleasant story is told of his early experience of official life in India. It appears that he declined an appointment at Simla at Rs. 400 per month, because he found by the rules of the Service he was entitled to draw Rs. 500 monthly if on sick leave only. This not unnatural decision provoked a strong letter from Lord Dalhousie's secretary, in which Forsyth was soundly rated for preferring idleness on Rs. 500 to doing his work on Rs. 400. The little misunderstanding, however, was soon rectified. The Autobiography ends somewhat abruptly with the story of the mission to Russia in 1869, when the interminable Afghan boundary question and British relations with Shere Ali engaged the diplomatist's skill and tested his tenacity. At this date Sir Douglas Forsyth had been led to study Central Asian politics, while endeavouring to open up fresh commercial channels between India and the North-West, from which attempts resulted the important expeditions of 1870 and 1873 to Kashgar and Yarkund. Every one interested in the geography of Thibet and Eastern Turkestan and the extension of Indian trade with Central Asia is familiar with the story of these missions. It is a story that well repays perusal in this lucid and entirely readable book.

The period embraced by Lady Jackson's latest studies in French history—The Last of the Valois, 1559-1589 (Bentley)—is peculiarly rich in contemporary records, and possibly for this reason is extremely seductive to writers who attempt what may be called the sectional presentment of history. This method possesses obvious advantages to the picturesque writer, who is more allured by the glow and movement of the memoir-writers and annalists than intent on sifting their contradictions and discrepancies. Periods also are easily determined, being of perfectly arbitrary limits. The danger lies in the errors of accent that spring from over-concentration, by which incidents of little moment assume mirage-like proportions. Lady Jackson has not altogether avoided diffuseness, though in the selection and use of material these volumes show an industry that is well applied on the whole. The historic muse is perhaps not dignified by the sensational headings of certain pages, or the too frequent allusions to Catherine de' Médicis's "flying squadron" of light ladies, and such phrases as the "Demon of the South."

Mr. Joseph I. C. Clarke's historical drama Robert Emmet (Putnam's Sons) is made up of six acts of dialogue or declamation, written throughout in prose, and illustrated by an "arto-type" of the Comerford miniature, facsimiles of pencil drawings taken during the trial of Emmet, and other sketches. There is not much to be said for the dramatic quality of Mr. Clarke's play, though his book is nicely got-up. To judge from the character of Emmet, as here presented, the drama is written for the theatre. Emmet is made too stagey, and the "business" directions are sometimes a little difficult. In the first act the hero observes to his friend, Lord Wycombe, "They are taunting me, and they cannot put down my indignation with a sneer" [stands grimly]. At p. 94 this strange direction is repeated.

Jack's Yarn: or, Perils in the Pacific, by Robert Brown, A.B. (Griffith, Farran, & Co.), appears to be a belated Christmas book, though a capital book for any season, original in conception, brightly written, and full of excitement and diversion. Jack's yarn is the fruitful source of many, some of which are likely to lift the eyelids of seamen as well as landfolk, and Jack himself is a superb specimen of the ancient mariner, who saw the battle of Trafalgar, and ought to have been promoted from "A.B." long before he arrived at the age of ninety-four.

The reader of Mr. H. C. Davidson's Manx story, Mad or Married? (Allen & Co.) will probably find the question as hard to solve as the Manx joke "Hi, Kelly!" So far as the heroine of this extremely sensational tale is concerned we are inclined to think that she is less mad than her admirers. Whether in her astral body she was married on the Scottish shore to a sympathetic landscape-painter must be left to some subtle-souled psychologist.

A Ride through Syria, by Edward Abram (Abram & Son), is a brief, but readable, account of a journey from Jaffa through Damascus to Baalbec, the fruits of a vacation ramble undertaken in the commendable spirit that defies disappointment.

Mr. H. Halliday Sparling has edited for the "Camelot Series" the translation by Messrs. Eirikr Magnússon and William Morris of the Völsungasaga (Walter Scott).

Among our new editions we have Mr. Stephen Dowell's History of Taxation and Taxes in England (Longmans & Co.), in four volumes; Thackeray's From Cornhill to Cairo, in Messrs. Routledge's "Pocket Library"; The Caxtons, the "Pocket Volume Edition" (Routledge); and Mad, a novel, "by the Marquis Biddle-Cope" (Ward & Downey).

Dr. WALDSTEIN (whose presence at a political meeting at Cambridge was announced in some daily papers and was commented on in the SATURDAY REVIEW of January 28) is M.A. and Litt.D. of Cambridge. He received an honorary degree in 1882; and he became by the operation of the statute and by residence a fully qualified Master of Arts. Dr. WALDSTEIN, who is also a member of King's College, University Reader in Classical Archæology, and Director of the Fitzwilliam Museum, can therefore vote at Cambridge, though he passed no undergraduate career there. The Librarian cannot vote in the House of Commons. We believe that Dr. WALDSTEIN did not attend Mr. DILLON'S meeting as a Home Ruler or as a Unionist, and that he desires to take no active part in English politics.

Demy 8vo. paper boards, 3s.; cloth boards, 4s.

The Sixth Issue of this Important Work presents an authorised and comprehensive record of the condition and work of the Church of England, and of all Churches in communion with her throughout the world.

Several additions of considerable interest and importance will be found in this volume, giving it a peculiar value of its own.

In the interest of the National Church the circulation of this Book is of immense importance, as the records it furnishes must greatly tend to remove common prejudices and misconceptions with regard to the position of the Church of England and her relation to the spiritual wants of the people.

BULGARIA, PAST AND PRESENT:

HISTORICAL, POLITICAL, AND DESCRIPTIVE.

By JAMES SAMUELSON,

ILLUSTRATED WITH A MAP OF UNITED BULGARIA,

Collotype Views and Portraits from Seventeen Photographs by Karastojanoff of Sofia, Cavra of Philippopolis, and O Marcolesco of Tirnova,

And numerous Woodcuts and Vignettes, from Original Sketches by the Author.

"Mr. Samuelson gives the earlier portion of his volume to an easy historical survey of the Bulgarian past, followed by an accurate account of the reign of Prince Alexander, the Russian intrigues, the Servian war, and the accession of Prince Ferdinand.........Our author's last chapter upon the present condition of Bulgarian trade and finance, and his chapter on travelling, describing the most interesting spots within the country, are full of sympathy and of insight, yet he gives the reader the impression of being a perfectly fair writer.........The volume is well illustrated from photographs and sketches of places and of men."—Athenæum.

"The first part of the book gives a rapid sketch of the history of the young nation...... The second part of the work describes the natural aspects of the country, the condition of its peasantry, its cities, and its prominent public men—its national life, in a word—in a manner at once instructive and agreeable......may be recommended to the attention of all interested in the progress of the country. The work is illustrated by a series of photographs of men and places, which adds considerably to its value."—Scotsman.

THREE CENTURIES OF A SCOTTISH LEGAL HOUSE.

Edited from the Family Papers by GEORGE W. T. OMOND, Advocate; Author of "The Lord Advocates of Scotland." With Etchings, Woodcuts, and Lithographs. 1 vol. 8vo. 21s.

"This handsome volume—handsome by reason of the excellence of its typographical appointments and by a fine equipment of portraits and pictures etched admirably by Mr. W. Hole and of minor woodcuts and facsimiles—enriches the literature of the Scottish family history. It is perhaps best described as a compilation of the domestic papers of the Arniston branch of the family of Dundas; but the Dundases of Arniston maintained through so many generations a position of the highest legal and political eminence in Scotland that their history is to a very great extent the history of the progress of law and politics in this country." Scotsman.

"He has done his task with taste and skill."—Athenæum.

"The documents from which Mr. Omond has made this most interesting selection seem to have had a narrow escape."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Regarded alike from the political and from the social point of view, this book, based chiefly on family papers, is very valuable as a contribution to and an elucidation of the history of Scotland."—Spectator.

SCOTLAND and SCOTSMEN in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

Edited from the MSS. of JOHN RAMSAY, Esq., of Ochtertyre, by ALEXANDER ALLARDYCE, Author of "Memoir of Admiral Lord Keith, K.B." &c. 2 vols. 8vo. 31s. 6d.

"The contents of these two volumes are of unquestionable value. They show us, through the eyes of a shrewd observer, many of the men, and not a little of the manners of Scotland when, chiefly by reason of more intimate contact with England, the country was awakening or had just awakened to a new and more progressive life........ Altogether these volumes form the most interesting addition that has for some time been made to Scottish social, personal, and anecdotal history."—Scotsman.

"To the lovers of Scottish poetry Mr. Ramsay will always be memorable as one of the most faithful and candid friends of Robert Burns .... There is hardly one of the figures included in Kay's wonderful etchings of legal lights, from the Lord President Dundas to Robert Macqueen of Braxfield, who does not find a place in this most interesting gallery of literary portraits. The anecdotes and repartees of these worthies, which were wont to set the table in a roar a century ago are brought forth from these long-neglected manuscripts with all their original freshness and vigour, and we are treated to a glimpse of the social life of those days photographed with accuracy by one who had moved in the midst of it."

Dundee Advertiser.

COMPLETION OF MR. KINGLAKE'S HISTORY.

Vol. VIII.—FROM THE OPENING OF PÉLISSIER'S COMMAND TO THE DEATH OF LORD RAGLAN.

Illustrated with numerous Maps, Plans, and Index to the complete Work. Demy 8vo. 28s.

"The descriptive power of many passages cannot be exceeded........The brightness and finish of the work show the hand of the master. All in all it is delightful reading, and the gallant deeds of gallant men are recorded in language which will ever enshrine their memories amongst English-speaking people all over the world."—Contemporary Review.

"Mr. Kinglake's last volumes come as a welcome gift, touching so very closely on the very issues of the day that it seems to us for the moment that hardly in any year since 18.. could they have been more valuable. There are not a few of his words that will seem as if they had been written of design to enlighten Englishmen as to the part which it most behoves their country to play at the present hour; still more there are, both in these concluding volumes and in those earlier ones to which one may hope that these will again direct attention, lessons of the most profound interest as to the perennial dangers, the perennial strength, and the perennial weakness of England."—Macmillan's Magazine.

COUNTESS IRENE. By the Author of

"Lauterdale and Caterina." 3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"The girl who gives the title to the book, and the development of whose character forms the main issue of the plot, is a figure drawn with marked ability—a lovable, good-natured, wilful girl with a proud nature........The interest of the work, however, lies not so much in its incidents, though these are well conceived, as in the character drawing........all these are drawn on the lines of nature, with truth and with a refined humour........The novel, as a whole, is pleasing in no ordinary degree."—Scotsman.

"The book has a cosmopolitan tone of good society, which is not one of its least attractions. Bright and pleasantly realistic, it is one of the most agreeable novels of the season."

Morning Post.

"The author has achieved a distinguished success in 'Countess Irene.'........The descriptions of character and incident are clear, the account of the moonlight fight in the chapter headed 'Vendetta' being particularly graphic........Among the many other characters the Baron, who fancies he lives in the seventeenth century, and that existing dates are entirely inaccurate, may be singled out as a happy and original sketch. Altogether the novel is far above the average and well worth reading."—N. B. Daily Mail.

The writing is bright and animated, the research thorough, the presentation of old Venetian life brilliantly vivid. It is an entirely workmanlike piece of work by an artist who knows how to mix the colours on her palette to the best advantage, and by a story-teller who can translate the lay figures of the past into real men and women........We are grateful to Mrs. Oliphant for this very charming and instructive volume."

CHURCHES and TITHES, ANCIENT

FACTS and FICTIONS CONCERNING. By ROUNDELL, EARL OF SELBORNE, Author of "A Defence of the Church of England against Disestablishment" &c. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

The Times says:—"Such is the nature and character of this little volume: unpretending, learned, accurate, painstaking, impartial. It is a valuable, almost necessary supplement to Lord Selborne's previous work. It will be an aid to the ecclesiastical historian; and, not its least merit, it shows how a scrupulous mind prepares itself for engaging in a momentous controversy."

POPULAR EDITION. Crown 8vo. 6s.

JAMES FRASER, Second Bishop of Manchester:

a Memoir, 1818–1885. By THOMAS HUGHES, Q.C. With a new Portrait.

NEW NOVELS.

THE SECOND SON. By Mrs. OLIPHANT,

Author of "The Curate in Charge," "A Country Gentleman," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Morning Post says:—"Mrs. Oliphant has never shown herself more completely mistress of her art than in her new novel........The story is clever and powerful."

The St. James's Gazette says:—"Of 'The Second Son' it may be said that it ranks among Mrs. Oliphant's best books; it is inferior to none of them in that illusion of reality which it is her special gift to produce. To read one of her stories of country life is to be living for the time amid the scenes and in the society that she is describing."

FOUR GHOST STORIES. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

PAUL PATOFF. By F. MARION CRAWFORD,

Author of "A Roman Singer," "Mr. Isaacs," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Times says:—"There is much to fascinate us in 'Paul Patof.' We are given a vivid picture of Modern Constantinople; and the author's instinct has told him in what dark corners of Stamboul the Western mind finds the deepest fascination."

The Athenæum says:—"The originality of it, the charm of the description, and the brilliancy of the narrative are undeniable. Mr Crawford's pictures of Constantinople and the Bosphorus show some of the highest qualities of his vivid and graceful style."

The Guardian says:—"'Paul Patoff' is undoubtedly a clever story."

The Spectator says:—"The reader will be repaid by finding a really surprising amount of able and suggestive writing."

THE NEW ANTIGONE. A Romance. 3 vols.

Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The St. James's Gazette says:—"Without doubt 'The New Antigone' is a remarkable book........To sum up, the author has shown that he is gifted with a poetic imagination, a large feeling for the pathos of life and a deep insight into the complexities of the human heart."

The Saturday Review says:—"The story of 'The New Antigone' has many merits. ......The awakening of Hippolyta's conscience through the misfortune of Annie Dansie is described with both power and pathos, and takes a firm hold of the reader's sympathy. If this is a first novel the author is to be congratulated on her possession and excellent use of many good gifts."

THE ENGLISH IN THE WEST INDIES; Or, THE BOW OF ULYSSES.

By JAMES A. FROUDE.

One Volume 8vo. price 18s.

The Times.—"Mr. Froude's brilliant book on the West Indies is, perhaps, the most enjoyable he has ever written, and has a wider interest than might be inferred from the title. Never has he thrown himself with more intensity into those broad and burning questions which concern the future of the empire. Never has he found happier opportunity for fervent eloquence or picturesque description, and he has seldom displayed his powers to greater advantage. He has ingeniously searched out analogies and contrasts; he has drawn wide political deductions from the facts that have come under his observation; by turns he is persuasive, indignant, or sarcastic, and not infrequently he breaks out in scathing invective. Consequently, the book is full of a double interest, for it reflects on every page the opinions and personality of the writer."

A FARCE ON TWO STAGES.

THE various proceedings of last Monday in reference to Irish matters would supply as good a text as can reasonably be expected to be supplied by the proceedings of any one day for the consideration of the intelligent foreigner or the intelligent anybody else. In the morning one of the farces which long-suffering London permits from time to time to interrupt its business and its more rational pleasures was got up by the usual persons in the usual way. The meeting having been permitted, wisely or unwisely—we think on the whole wisely—by the authorities, and there being no danger of broken heads or "six weeks," Professor STUART was fortunately not prevented by any of the accidents which kept him out of Trafalgar Square from giving the assembly the benefit of his presence. With him were some dozen more or less obscure Radical members of Parliament, and Mr. TIMS and Mr. PERCY BUNTING and Mr. ÆNEAS SMITH and other famous men. The imprisoned Irish members were represented by Mr. SULLIVAN, an amiable person, who appears to have suffered nothing from his imprisonment except a bad attack of versification. The attendance consisted of the usual thousands—more or fewer—of loafers and roughs. The utterances were as usual; the decorations—crownless harps, and so forth—were as usual; the enthusiastic reports in the present tense were as usual; and the meeting, as most usual of all, dispersed, after the pleasure of marching, to the business of picking pockets. They had been prisoners themselves, and they could enter into Mr. SULLIVAN's feelings; but they remembered that, as one of their panegyrists has it, this sympathy "involved the loss of a day's wages," and they owed it to their families to make that good.

The diversions of the evening were twofold—in the House of Commons and out of it. The banquet of the night was very much like the procession of the morning. The same persons were present, and, to the great disgust of some enthusiasts, who have brought railing accusations in consequence, the same persons were absent. As before, no one of Parliamentary calibre heavier than Mr. STUART and Sir WILFRID LAWSON could be got to be present, and the place of the Liberal leaders was again supplied by Mr. TIMS and Mr. PERCY BUNTING and Mr. ÆNEAS SMITH. Professor STUART again introduced the Hero and bard of Tullamore to the meeting, and the meeting again heard impassioned language from the hero and Bard of Tullamore. The fact that Mr. SULLIVAN is not one of the newer and businesslike kind of Nationalists at all, but an amiable, feather-headed survival of the feather-headed amiability of '48, a Young Irelander grown old, with his head as green as ever, was almost a sufficient comment on the silly business, if any further comment had been wanted than the utter absence of serious weight, political authority, or anything else in the whole affair. The wildest estimate of the total attendance in Hyde Park, pickpockets, loafers, and all, does not reach the population of an average London borough—of one of those boroughs in which Home Rulers and Gladstonians have been beaten so soundly. The speakers and occupiers of the platforms included not one single politician of even second-rate ability, and very few of even second-rate notoriety. Nothing said shows either the sense of a real political cause in the speaker or a hope of producing such a sense in the audience.

Yet, if the intelligent foreigner had augured badly of Home Rule from the pickpocket processionists and the platform platitudinizers, he could hardly have had his spirits raised by shifting his place of observation from Hyde Park and the Criterion to St. Stephen's. A mighty constitutional question was going to be raised. The Arrest of the Three Members was to be elevated once for all to a position beside the Arrest of the Five. But it is always dangerous to arrange incidents of historical importance beforehand. It is improbable that much could have been made out of the question anyhow; but any little chance it had was extinguished by its raiser in Parliament. Mr. PICTON, with Nonconformist wit, compared Mr. O'BRIEN to St. PAUL, and indulged in a reminiscence of his schoolboy days, apparently at a very odd school, so utterly pointless that the merciful Daily News suppressed it in its Parliamentary report. The SPEAKER took two-thirds of the wind out of the Opposition sails by promptly, and in accordance with the strictest rule and precedent, deciding that the House had nothing to do with the arrest of Mr. GILHOOLY and Mr. PYNE, and the Government took the rest by as promptly making a proper and sufficient apology for the mistake which had been committed in the case of Mr. O'BRIEN. And then the thing was practically over, and might as well have gone at once to the division, which finally, in a House not extraordinarily full, affirmed the decision of the SPEAKER and of Ministers by something like the full Ministerial majority. But, of course, this would not have suited either the obstructive or the ostentatious instincts of the Opposition. So the House was treated to the spectacle of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT correcting, first the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, and then Sir HENRY JAMES, on questions of law. Mr. BRADLAUGH expressed a constitutional aversion to detectives. The Mr. O'BRIEN in question took occasion for some minutes of the usual vapouring, which at his own next real arrest will no doubt be exchanged for the usual whining. Mr. PARNELL thought it might kill a man of nervous disposition to be pounced upon by constables—in reply to which it can only be said that Mr. PARNELL's partisans in Ireland know better ways of killing than that. Even Mr. GLADSTONE was put up; for the service of Mr. PARNELL is a hard service, and it was no doubt felt that some night's exploit at Westminster must gild the day's absence of the Liberal leaders at Euston. All this talk, as the defenders of the Government had no difficulty in pointing out, simply amounted to an evasion of two simple truths. The first is that privilege of Parliament does not cover crime. The second is that, whether it does or not, a mistake at once acknowledged and apologized for cannot constitute a breach of privilege in the eyes of any reasonable assembly, however much disposed it may be to stand on that privilege itself. Yet privilege, as Sir HENRY JAMES enraged the Parnellites and Gladstonians by incidentally remarking, is an altogether undemocratic thing.

It can hardly be necessary, but may be instructive, to complete the survey of unreality and charlatanism by noting some comments on Monday's displays. A single example shall suffice. One commentator says that the array of pickpockets and professors was a review of organized Liberalism in the capital, and that every captain of fifty on that occasion "knows where to find five hundred on the voting day." The same authority puts the combined strength of professors and pickpockets at seventy thousand. Therefore the captains of fifty know where to find seven hundred thousand Liberal voters in London. As a matter of fact, the entire constituency of the metropolitan district, in which Gladstonianism is at a ruinous minority, does not amount to half a million. Perhaps it may be thought that stuff of this sort is unworthy of serious refutation. It is sometimes worth while to take rant of the kind seriously and to show what rant it is. But it may be admitted that it is rant strictly in accordance with the proceedings which occasioned it, and with the utterances of the spokesmen at those proceedings, from Mr. PARNELL and Mr. GLADSTONE in the House to Mr. PICKERSGILL and Mr. TIMS on the platform. In this pretended Home Rule movement, as the novelist said of his heroine, "there is nothing real." Its arguments are hollow, its statistics are false, its rhetoric is rotten, its poetry is Mr. SULLIVAN'S, its law is Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S, its eloquence is United Ireland, its processionists are honest tradesmen only after the fashion of yet another character of fiction. What there is not in but behind it that is real is unavowed, and studiously kept in the background. The desire of Irish peasant criminals for the property of their landlords and the blood of their personal enemies, the desire of Irish agitators for office and its profits, the desire of English politicians for office and its power—these things are real enough, but they make little open figure either in Hyde Park or at Westminster.

LORD DUFFERIN.

LORD DUFFERIN'S intention of resigning the Indian Viceroyalty in a few months has caused universal regret. In the highest office, except that of Prime Minister, which can be held by a British subject, as in many public appointments in different parts of the world, Lord DUFFERIN has been highly successful. His whole career has tended to counteract the vulgar prejudice that genial humour is in any degree incompatible with practical vigour in affairs of State. The hereditary gift of wit was transmitted to him from SHERIDAN in uninterrupted succession. In LORD DUFFERIN'S early youth his Letters from High Latitudes recalled, notwithstanding the dissimilarity of form and of subject, the gaiety and brilliancy of the School for Scandal:—

> Olim juventas et patrius vigor

but, like the hero of HORACE, he soon after tried his strength in severer labours. Lord PALMERSTON must have thought highly of the capacity of a novice in diplomacy and administration when he sent Lord DUFFERIN as Commissioner to Syria with the duty of repressing the disturbances in the Lebanon. The choice of the Minister was justified by the prudence and energy of his agent, who had not shrunk from the responsibility of inflicting capital punishment on one contumacious offender. From that time Lord DUFFERIN was marked out for political employment, but vacancies were rare during Lord PALMERSTON'S long administration; and in the course of several years he only held secondary Ministerial offices. His rise would perhaps have been more rapid if he had not been deprived by his early accession to the peerage of the opportunity of serving an apprenticeship in the House of Commons. On the whole, he had no reason to complain of neglect or discouragement. When he had scarcely attained middle life he became Governor-General of Canada, where he adapted himself with characteristic tact to the peculiar duties of his position. Although the representative of the Crown in a self-governing colony has no initiative and little power of independent action, his personal influence may have great political value. The social qualities of Lord DUFFERIN rendered him generally popular, while his sound judgment and his experience in affairs commanded the respect of the leaders of colonial opinion. He was also liked and respected by the statesmen of the neighbouring Republic with whom he had occasion to come in contact.

Lord DUFFERIN had received his Canadian office from the Liberal party, to which he had always belonged. His next appointment involved the high compliment of selection for an important post by a political opponent. Lord SALISBURY, then Foreign Secretary, offered Lord DUFFERIN the Russian Embassy; and he could have no hesitation in accepting the proposal. It is difficult for any observer, except superiors and colleagues, to judge of the conduct and merits of a diplomatist; but there can be little doubt that Lord DUFFERIN avoided unnecessary friction with a Court and a Cabinet which were not uniformly friendly to his Government. It was thought that he made himself personally agreeable to the aged Chancellor who still either really or ostensibly directed the policy of the Empire. Before his mission was ended, Lord DUFFERIN was almost an eye-witness of a terrible occurrence. He had an audience of the Emperor ALEXANDER II. only a quarter of an hour before his atrocious murder, and he heard the explosion, which he at once attributed to its real cause. He was afterwards removed to Constantinople, and it was as Ambassador to Turkey that he was instructed by Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government to investigate on the spot the condition of Egypt. The remedy which he suggested for the misgovernment and for the distressed condition of the country was to copy as closely as possible in Egypt the method by which Indian kingdoms and principalities have been effectually reformed. A "masterful Indian Resident" would, in Lord DUFFERIN'S judgment, supersede the necessity of any detailed measure of improvement. He could, of course, not insist on the acceptance of a suggestion which was not necessarily practicable. French jealousy, perhaps, furnished a sufficient reason for a less vigorous course, and the English Government had neither the wisdom nor the energy which would have been required for the regeneration of Egypt. It is possible that Lord DUFFERIN may again be employed in the diplomatic service. One of his immediate predecessors in the Viceroyalty is now Ambassador at Paris, and there is no doubt of Lord DUFFERIN'S fitness for a similar post. It may, indeed, be said that there is no official duty which he would not be competent to discharge. He has had the remarkable felicity not only of being equal to the demands of any post which he has held, but of satisfying the expectations which had been formed of his success.

As soon as it was known that Lord RIPON was about to return from India, Lord DUFFERIN was almost by acclamation designated as his successor. He was appointed by Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government, and he would almost certainly have been preferred to any rival if the Conservatives had been in office. Scarcely any public servant has received the same degree of recognition, although he has passed the greater part of his life abroad. Except in Canada, Lord DUFFERIN had held no great administrative office; but it was rightly thought that general ability and resource were the conditions of fitness for a post which might require the highest qualities of statesmanship. It was impossible to foresee the demands which might be made on the capacity of the VICEROY. He might, perhaps, have to conduct a great defensive war, and it was certain that he would have to deal at home with the results of a rash and feeble policy. The necessity of taking some decisive means of repressing the insolence of the Burmese Government was already becoming evident, and there was reason to apprehend complications with a European Power which was busy with intrigues at the Court of Mandalay. The danger of war with Russia afterwards become more imminent, and even the Government of Mr. GLADSTONE was prepared for a rupture in consequence of the incidents of Pendjeh. The solution of the Burmese problem was perhaps not wholly Lord DUFFERIN'S work; but he cordially approved, and he executed with laudable vigour, the policy of annexation. It is not his fault that the conquest has left many relics of strife behind it. There has now for some time been a sporadic contest between the English authorities and the turbulent part of the population under the name of Dacoits. Those who best know the state of the country express a confident belief that disorder will gradually be suppressed. There is no doubt that English rule, when it is permanently established, will greatly increase the prosperity of Burmah; and there is reason to believe that the occupation of the province will be not only inexpensive, but profitable. In the meantime the primary object of the enterprise has been fully accomplished. The French adventurers who surrounded King THEEBAW, and who would probably soon have concluded an alliance with his Government, are effectually baffled.

The settlement of the Afghan frontier postpones, and perhaps removes, the danger of a rupture with Russia. It would be unwise to rely on promises and diplomatic agreements as a complete security against aggression; but Lord SALISBURY is apparently disposed to trust the assurances of Russia, and it is obviously prudent not to furnish a pretext for irritation by unnecessary displays of suspicion; it is not known whether the VICEROY has directly contributed to a result which must be accepted as satisfactory. There is no doubt that he has to the utmost of his power made preparations which may discourage invasion by rendering it more perilous to the aggressor. There is no duty more incumbent on a Viceroy than provision for the security of the frontier. Lord DUFFERIN has at the same time continued the policy of supporting the AMEER. It is probable that ABDURRAHMAN may not be a model ruler, but he has so far been a faithful ally. It would appear that he has defeated various attempts at rebellion by dissatisfied chiefs. It is necessary to choose among the numerous claimants of the succession of SHERE ALI, and the preference has properly been given to the de facto ruler of Afghanistan. Lord DUFFERIN'S domestic and financial policy has been safe and unambitious. No encouragement has been given to the native agitation which had been stimulated by foolish English politicians. On the other hand, nothing has been done to discourage legitimate aspirations, nor is the VICEROY responsible for imprudent encouragement of jealousy between Hindoos or Bengalees and Mohammedans. That the finances are not at present prosperous is not the fault of the Government. The mode by which the deficiency of the year has been met seems to approve itself to the best Indian financiers, and it has not been severely blamed by English critics. It is unfortunate that the expense of the annexation of Upper Burmah should have largely exceeded the estimate; but desultory warfare in conjunction with a total change of government cannot but be costly. The railways and fortifications by which the Northern frontier is protected probably tend to economy, though they are in the first instance expensive. The financial difficulties which have been overcome by fresh taxation are perhaps only temporary.

As Lord DUFFERIN will not resign his seat before October, it is not absolutely certain that the selection of his successor will rest with the present Government. The proposed appointment of Lord LANSDOWNE will be generally regarded as judicious. There may, perhaps, be political reasons for preferring to members of the Conservative party a Whig magnate who is a zealous supporter of the Union. The Separatists have long since discerned the connexion between the maintenance of the English dominion in India and the continued integrity of the United Kingdom. Lord LANSDOWNE will be pledged to resist any policy in the East or in the West which leads to the dissolution of the Empire. He has incurred the special enmity of the Nationalist agitators. One of their principal leaders not long since undertook a voyage to Canada for the purpose of denouncing the Governor-General. Mr. O'BRIEN's self-imposed mission ended in ridiculous failure, and there is reason to believe that Lord LANSDOWNE enjoys the confidence of the Canadian people. The appointment of a Liberal-Unionist to the Indian Viceroyalty will tend to cement the alliance between the Conservative party and the Liberal-Unionists. It is improbable that his appointment should have been publicly announced unless the Government felt confident that no rupture was to be apprehended. The personal fitness of Lord LANSDOWNE is undoubtedly more important than any political combination of English parties. The office of Viceroy requires qualifications of so high an order that they can only be tested by success; but it is satisfactory to know that Lord LANSDOWNE possesses undoubted ability, and it is an advantage, as Lord DUFFERIN remarked, that he is in the prime of life. Some great political issues which have demanded the attention of some of his predecessors are, it may be hoped, finally settled; but there is abundant room for the exercise of sound judgment and of statesmanlike foresight.

THE NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE.

WE should be very slow to assume that Mr. GLADSTONE's disposition towards the further reform of Parliamentary procedure is as amicable as his attitude. It may be remembered, indeed, that he qualified his professions of good-will to the Government, in respect of the matter, with the for him significant proviso that the new Rules must not be "of a nature to lead to protracted debate and "vehement differences of opinion among large sections of "the House." And, if we attempt to define hypothetically a series of procedure proposals which Mr. GLADSTONE could not describe as "of a nature to lead to protracted debate and "vehement differences of opinion among large sections of "the House," we shall probably have to confess to having found our imagination exhausted in the effort. PROTEUS is perhaps a little easier to confine within the bonds of the positive proposition, that the new Rules to secure his approval must "aim rather at giving effect to the general "principles of good government and to the general sense "and feeling of the House than at attempting to esta-"blish domination by mere triumphs of one party over "another." For, if we except the Rule by which it is proposed to reduce the minimum majority by which the Closure can be imposed from two hundred to one hundred, there is no one of Mr. SMITH's proposals which even perversity could represent as of a partisan character. And as to the Rule to which we have just referred, it ought to secure the support of Mr. PARNELL on the principle recently avowed by him—namely, that it is to the interests of the present minority to strengthen machinery which they will so soon require for the enforcement of their triumphant policy on a discomfited Unionist Opposition; and, if this is Mr. PARNELL's view, it may possibly become Mr. GLADSTONE's also.

As regards the other proposals which the Government have laid on the table, the most important of them in appearance is that with respect to the hours of sitting. Whether the House will, on the whole, gain much by meeting at three o'clock instead of four, and adjourning from eight to nine, instead of at the present uncertain period, for dinner, is perhaps open to some doubt; but as to the wisdom of peremptorily closing debate and discontinuing business with a view to a fixed adjournment at 1 P.M. on four nights of the week, there can hardly be two competent opinions. But this reform is, in our judgment, even more valuable for the ulterior steps to which it commits the House than for what it naturally effects. It is true that the indefinite prolongation of debates has mainly profited the Obstructionist; but it must be remembered also that one reason why debates, especially in Committee, have had to be protracted so far into the small hours is because, Obstructionists having monopolized so much of the earlier part of the night, the prolongation becomes absolutely necessary in order to find speaking-time for Ministers and others whose business it is to address the House on the subject before it. Hence the immediate effect of the new Rule, unaccompanied by any other alteration in procedure, might merely be to surrender the whole working-night to one or two Obstructionists who might be the first to catch the Speaker's eye. Once fix an absolute limit to the duration of debate, and the Government will be bound to take care that the time so limited is distributed among members of the House with some sort of reference to their relative claims to appropriate it. The proposal to discontinue the Committee and Report stage of the Address, to forbid the introduction of amendments to the motion to go into Committee, and the limitation of the right to move amendments on the Report, are all steps in the right direction. They are aimed, that is to say, at the abridgment of the too abundant opportunities for talk which our Parliamentary system at present affords. Any one who takes a bonâ fide interest in the improvement of legislation will find plenty of facilities left him for bringing his suggestions before the House. The proposed authorization to the Speaker to take divisions at his discretion by calling upon members to rise in their places will, if assented to by the House, remove another cause of useless delay, and disarm the Obstructionist of one of his most potent weapons. Perhaps the least satisfactory proposal on the list is that relating to disorderly conduct. Its tenor is certainly somewhat of a disappointment to general expectation. Apparently it does no more than enable the Speaker to order an offending member to withdraw immediately from the House during the remainder of that sitting, with the further proviso—so as to prevent a technical compliance with the order by the delinquent's merely retiring below the bar, or taking a seat under the Speaker's Gallery—that the member so dealt with shall withdraw "from the precincts of the House." It is surely doubtful, however, whether this is a sufficiently formidable addition to the present punishment of suspension to make it worth while to attach it thereto. We would much rather that the Government had proposed some effective method of dealing with deliberate and habitual offenders against Parliamentary decency—a point which they have left entirely untouched.

THE STORY OF LEFEVRE.

[Communicated by a Nephew of Mr. T. A. D-ck-n.]

CHAPTER VIII.

"IN a day or two, or less than a week," added my uncle THOMAS smiling, "he might march home again." "He "will not march, with all submission, this week," said the Under-Secretary. "He will march," said my uncle THOMAS rising from his chair. "With all submission," said the Under-Secretary, "he shall never march, but to a gaol." "He shall march," cried my uncle THOMAS; "he shall "march to his place in Parliament." "I will not stand "it," said the Under-Secretary. "He will be supported," said my uncle THOMAS. "He'll be dropped at last," said the Under-Secretary, "unless, indeed, he drops of himself, "as I hear is likely." "He will not drop," said my uncle

THOMAS firmly. "Well, well, good day," said Sir W-ST, maintaining his point; "do what you can for him; I "believe the poor creature will fly." "He will not fly, "by —— !" cried my uncle THOMAS.

The reporting gentleman who sped back to the office with this oath blushed as he handed in his flimsy, and the sub-editor, when he went over the proofs, ran his pencil through the word, and altered it to "GL-DST-NE."

CHAPTER IX.

My uncle THOMAS went closer to the Under-Secretary's bureau, and put the case more clearly before Sir W-ST R-DGW-Y, reminding him that LEFEVRE was a lieutenant in H-RC-RT's company, and would not be likely to incite to any breach of the law, adding that the purpose of the Loughrea meeting was to induce the tenants, not to withhold their rent, but to purchase their holdings under Lord ASHBOURNE'S Act. Having satisfied the Under-Secretary with these assurances, my uncle THOMAS returned to his inn, and, telling the Boots to wake him in time for the first train westward, he went to bed and fell asleep.

CHAPTER X.

The sun looked bright the morning after to every eye in Loughrea but LEFEVRE'S; the hand of funk pressed heavy on his eyelids, and hardly would the pump-handle of stump-oratory have made a shift that day to describe its arc had not my uncle THOMAS, who had rose up an hour before his wonted time, entered the Lieutenant's room, and, without preface or apology, sat himself down upon the chair by the bedside, and independently of all modes and customs, opened the curtain in the manner an old friend and brother officer would have done it, and asked him how he did; how he had rested in the night; what was his complaint; where was his pain, and what he could do to help him; and without giving him time to answer any one of the inquiries, went on and told him of the little plan which he had been concerting with the Under-Secretary the night before for him.

"You shall come home directly afterwards, LEFEVRE," said my uncle THOMAS, "to my house; and we'll send for a "reporter to revise his account of the matter; and we'll "have an interviewer; and the Under-Secretary shall see a "report of your speech; and, in short, I'll see you through "it, LEFEVRE."

There was a frankness in my uncle THOMAS—not the effect of familiarity (which had bred another feeling in his mind), but the cause of it, which let you at once into his soul, and showed you the cuteness of his nature. To this there was something in his looks and voice and manner superadded, which eternally beckoned to the chicken-hearted to come and learn courage from him; so that, before my uncle THOMAS had half finished making these kind offers, the Lieutenant almost insensibly became stronger at the knees, and he had stretched out his hand for his dressing-gown and was drawing it towards him. The blood and spirits of LEFEVRE, which had been waxing cold and slow within him and retreating to their last citadel, the heart, rallied back; the film forsook his eyes for a moment; he looked up wishfully in my uncle THOMAS'S face, then took a look at the situation, and his confidence, somewhat slight as it was, was for a moment shaken. Suppose Mr. B-LF-R should take a different view of the matter from Sir W-ST R-DGW-Y?

Nature instantly ebbed again, the film returned to its place, the pluck wavered—sank—revived—wobbled—sank again—revived—squirmed—recovered again. Shall I go on? No.

[It is not necessary. The issue of this severe mental struggle is to be found in the reports of the newspapers.—ED.]

THE DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

THE earlier part of the debate on the Address and on Mr. PARNELL'S Amendment turned on the time-honoured issue of post hoc and propter hoc. It was agreed on both sides, for the purpose of the argument, that Irish crime had diminished, in consequence, as the Government contends, of the vigorous execution of the Crimes Act. The Opposition loudly deny the connexion between coercion and the partial restoration of order. The Crimes Act is certainly a vera causa, or, in other words, an existing fact. But it happens that Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. PARNELL, with the whole body of their adherents, are convinced that it has no relation to the tranquillity which it was intended to promote. They have another and an anterior hoc of their own to explain the improvement which it is not their immediate interest to deny. According to Mr. PARNELL, a miracle has been worked by Mr. GLADSTONE, and the Irish people abstain more or less from murder and outrage because they now rely on English sympathy with their demand for Home Rule. As the convictions of all the disputants uniformly follow their party organization, the contest would, as far as the House of Commons is concerned, have been simplified by beginning with the division and omitting the speeches. It is, however, natural and right that an appeal should be made to public opinion; and there are perhaps some impartial politicians out of doors who are still open to argument. Attacks on the policy of "the accursed Act," as one Irish orator called it, are only relevant to the present discussion as far as they tend to show that it has failed to accomplish its object. If it has succeeded in its main purpose of crippling the National League, it will be regarded by the Separatists as doubly accursed. It may be remarked that, while Nationalist members repeat Mr. PARNELL'S explanation of the diminution of crime, Home Rule is scarcely mentioned in Ireland. Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE and Mr. WILFRID BLUNT are welcomed at Nationalist meetings, not as advocates of Irish independence, which is seldom or never mentioned, but because they encourage tenants to combine against the payment of their rents. Mr. PARNELL has not succeeded in communicating to the mass of his partisans in Ireland the sentimental gratitude to Mr. GLADSTONE which he expresses in the House of Commons.

The protest against obstruction with which Mr. PARNELL began his ingenious speech was probably sincere. His motive for abandoning the tactics of the last Session are fully understood. The combined Separatists then fully believed that they would be able to break up the hostile majority, either on Procedure or more probably on the Crimes Bill. It was thought that pertinacious delay would give time for effective appeals to the popular prejudice against coercion; and hopes were entertained that the House would be prevented, by want of time, from passing some of the clauses. The obstructionists were greatly disappointed when the Ministerial leader induced the House of Commons to pass in bulk the clauses which would otherwise have been the subject of endless debate. The conduct of the Opposition had provoked general disgust and indignation, and it had provided the Government with a sufficient excuse for the scanty legislation of the Session. Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. PARNELL have had the good sense to learn by experience. They now see that their chance of dissolving the majority depends on its own possible dissensions, and that it is not to be effected by external pressure when it is, as last year, indiscriminately applied to both its sections. The Government is now promised the support of its enemies in all beneficial legislation. Mr. GLADSTONE beams with amiable toleration for the proceedings of the only country in Europe which, as he informed the Shorncliffe audience on the previous day, keeps another country in subjection. Mr. PARNELL was, at first, almost equally amiable, until he entered on the recapitulation of Mr. BALFOUR'S delinquencies. The Ministers will scarcely be imprudent enough to rely on the forbearance of either of the Opposition leaders. The frivolous debate on the blunder of a policeman indicated more clearly than any set speeches the temper in which the Separatists begin the Session. The debate on Mr. PARNELL'S Amendment was to have been finished on the second night; but as it raised the main questions which are at issue between the Government and the Opposition, an extension of time was perhaps not unreasonable. The damaging effect of the speeches of Colonel SAUNDERSON and Mr. T. W. RUSSELL is, of course, not acknowledged by the Separatists; but they can scarcely dispute the representative character of either member. One of them expresses the opinions of the Conservative minority throughout Ireland, and the other is equally entitled to speak for the Liberals of Ulster. If the determined opponents of the National League and of Home Rule are satisfied with Mr. BALFOUR'S defence of their rights, the contention that the Crimes Act has proved to be ineffective can scarcely be well founded.

All the attacks on Mr. BALFOUR'S administration assume that he had a discretion to enforce the Crimes Act or to leave it in abeyance. It might as well be held that a commanding officer in time of war is at liberty to neglect the duty of inflicting damage on the enemy. The Parliament which first passed the Crimes Act and then authorized the Proclamation of the National League imposed on the CHIEF SECRETARY the important duty of punishing violations of the law. If statistics and credible reports may be trusted, the vigorous enforcement of the Act has produced highly beneficent results; but, even if the experiment had failed, it was necessary that it should be tried. The assailants of the Government, and especially the foul-mouthed calumniators of the CHIEF SECRETARY, have carefully abstained from all notice of the consequences which would have followed an inactive policy. In many parts of Ireland, and especially in Clare and Kerry, branches of the League, urged on by unscrupulous demagogues, were threatening and persecuting those who ventured to disobey their commands, including tenants willing to pay their rents who might contravene the Plan of Campaign. Mr. DILLON, MICHAEL DAVITT, and Mr. W. O'BRIEN were perhaps the most daring instigators of violence and tyranny; but other popular orators were zealously preaching resistance to law. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN and other opponents of coercion, when it is not practised by themselves, virtually suggest that the most active and most dangerous promoters of sedition should have been allowed to pursue their avocation in security. The weapon which Parliament had forged for the repression of disorder ought, in their opinion, to have been deliberately allowed to rust. Perhaps the Crimes Act would have been regarded with comparative toleration if it had provided for the trial of offences by juries which could be trusted in all cases to acquit. Some of the Separatist speakers applied the strongest terms of vituperation to the resident magistrates, really on the ground that they have done their duty. The fact that most of them had been appointed by Lord SPENCER to the same or to equally responsible posts was conveniently forgotten. One of their judgments only has been reversed on appeal; and in the greater number of cases the accused persons scarcely pretended to be innocent. The apologists of sedition and of local tyranny contend on behalf of their clients, not that they have refrained from breaking the law, but that disobedience to its enactments was morally justified. The same argument is implied in the pretended distinction between political and ordinary offences, and for the present purpose political crimes may be defined as illegal acts committed by members of Parliament, priests, journalists, and other persons of similar position.

Probably most Irish Nationalists would admit that agrarian murders are not entitled to immunity as political crimes. In such a case as that of FITZMAURICE, who is the latest victim of assassination, the branch of the League by which he was boycotted, including the priest who presided at the meeting, were morally, if not legally, involved in guilt of the same nature with that of the actual murderers, inasmuch as their action was, though perhaps without their distinct purpose, one of the probable causes of the actual crime. Whether they were culpable or not, their denunciation of the unfortunate man was not a political proceeding. Mr. T. W. RUSSELL protested with creditable vigour against the doctrine that the ringleaders should be spared, while their agents and dupes are held responsible for their less criminal obedience to orders. Mr. PARNELL indeed complained that newsvendors and other lawbreakers of humble station had in some instances been apprehended. It would probably appear on inquiry that the lowest class of servants of the League has not been held responsible, except in cases of continuous defiance of the law. If the hawker of a prohibited document obstinately refuses to discontinue his occupation, he can scarcely be allowed to escape the consequences of his perversity. Mr. PARNELL prudently abstained from mentioning the sentences which were passed on offending newsmen. He mentioned the case of a foreman in a newspaper office who had been prosecuted instead of his employers. It appeared that he was the registered proprietor of the paper, and that there was no one else in the office on whom process could have been served. The real and pretended indignation which has been provoked by the punishment of more conspicuous personages is much more vehement than Mr. PARNELL's protest on behalf of petty offenders. It may be doubted whether the mass of the community disapproves of impartial dealing with priests and laymen, with barristers and with peasants. It is certain that, if Mr. BALFOUR had made a distinction in favour of offenders of a superior order, he would have been attacked for undue aristocratic preference. Some of the agitators who have undergone short terms of imprisonment have been guilty of the gravest crimes. Intentional and systematic violation of law is not a venial offence, even when it is not aggravated by participation in conspiracies against property and life. It is not a little strange that scarcely any speaker on the side of the Opposition attempted to maintain Mr. PARNELL's second proposition. The improvement in the condition of Ireland was declared to have nothing to do with Mr. BALFOUR's administration. That it was in any way connected with Mr. GLADSTONE's deferred Home Rule Bill was not seriously urged; and, indeed, the pretence was generally forgotten. If the Opposition holds itself bound by the promises of its two leaders, there will not be many more debates on a subject which is thoroughly exhausted. It is impossible that any speaker should sink below the level of Mr. ELLIS and Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

THE Memorandum published by the War Office on Saturday last shows that Mr. STANHOPE is really trying to give effect by the beginning of this Session to the promises made before Parliament rose in 1887. He then undertook to put his department on a sound basis, and briefly showed how he proposed to do it. The Memorandum is simply his speech put into the imperative mood. In that condition it looks very well. We may now take it as settled, as far as this Memorandum can do so, that in future every War Office herring shall hang by its own head. The Military Department is to work together under a recognized chief, and the civil side likewise. Each subsection is to have its own definite functions all to be performed in a rational way. The ten paragraphs on the Military Department deal each with a general or director of something who is to be responsible in future if anything goes wrong in his office. Seven paragraphs define the duties of the Civil Department in an equally luminous way. All this, as we have said, looks very well, and might inspire enthusiasm if it was not read by the light of some experience. Unfortunately these army reorganization schemes have a certain resemblance to the hundred years' truces with SALADIN which made WAMBA the son of WITLESS feel so very old. There have been so many of them, and they have always been going to settle everything, and yet after much less than a hundred years it is to do again. Even if Mr. STANHOPE's plan is such a very good one (and we have no doubt that an army could be well administered on it), there is cause for much modesty on the part of some of us in the reflection that it has taken our rulers exactly two hundred and twenty-eight years of experience in the management of standing armies to learn how to organize a War Office. To be sure the Memorandum cannot be said to contain absolute novelties, but that again is not an altogether encouraging consideration. If, indeed, this last change is only a return to the practice of the days before the Crimea (which is to some extent the case), then, with the recollection of what that war was to guide us, we have excellent reason for not being enthusiastic about this last reorganization of the War Office. In the Crimea, though more outcry was made about it than was quite just, there was abundance of mismanagement and confusion, and there was certainly an abject slavery to red-tape among military men as well as civilians. The present reorganization will give no security against a recurrence of the same sort of blundering; nor, indeed, will anything except a general agreement to cease grumbling at the system, and to take to punishing individuals when things go wrong, so as to make all understand that in war the object is to beat the enemy, and not to play the great War Office game.

Examination of the Memorandum does not by any means inspire confidence that the evils of the old system will be wholly removed by the new plan. The current work of administration may doubtless be better done under it; but mere delay in doing routine work is not the worst fault of the department. Its vice has been that it was managed, not with the primary object of supplying a good army, but in subordination to the temporary political interests of the body of gentlemen forming the Cabinet for the time being. The new scheme affords no sort of security that the same sort of mismanagement will not be repeated. Much is said and implied about the responsibility of the Military Department, but we do not learn how far its responsibility is to go. There is nothing to show that in future the military men in the War Office will be better able than in the past to prevent the depletion of the stores whenever the Secretary finds it convenient to make things pleasant for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is nothing to show that in future the Secretary will be less able than in the past to go over the heads of technical Committees, and order the choice of a certain rifle at an immense ultimate expense to the nation. It would perhaps be too much to ask of any scheme of departmental reorganization that it should secure us against the inevitable vices of Parliamentary government; but then that is a reason for receiving such things very coolly. But even within the Office itself the new scheme allows of the continuance of that practice of endless letter-writing which would make an English Government office a paradise to the late Mr. MICAWBER. Under the head of "Proposals for New Expenditure, &c.," it is provided that, when the Military Department has to ask for more money, its claim must go to the Financial Division before being submitted to the Secretary of State. We entirely fail to see what purpose this can serve, except to encourage the practice of wasting time in mere useless scribbling. The Financial Division's business is to do the accounting and bookkeeping for the Office. It has no power to stop the final reference to the Secretary, and can only waste time and multiply the already enormous mass of letters all folded in four and neatly docketed which cumber the archives of all Government offices. One explanation may be given with some plausibility for this part of the Memorandum. It is that Mr. STANHOPE is in mortal terror of finding himself at the mercy of a Military Department truculently clamouring for more, and has set up the Financial Division as a dyke, or, at least, as a remora to protect himself. This may be natural and even pardonable in a Secretary conscious of human weakness, but it does not afford any reason for believing that there will be less endless scribbling by deputy inspectors to second clerks, or less tugging and riving by different sections over the Budget. Now these were just the tiresome old vices of the War Office, and any new scheme which leaves them untouched must expect to be received with at least very tepid welcome.

THE METROPOLITAN BOARD.

THE Metropolitan Board of Works Inquiry Committee has issued an appeal to the metropolitan members of Parliament, asking them to support an investigation into the charges made against the Board. Those to whom this request has been addressed saw the desirableness of complying with it, and supported Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S motion yesterday morning. Two of them, indeed, who are or have been members of the Board—Mr. HUGHES and Mr. WEBSTER—announce that, in their opinion, it is a perfect body, assailed, from the worst motives, by a corrupt press and unprincipled agitators. But even Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. HUGHES—the Gog and Magog of Spring Gardens—will find few people to share their views, and even they shrank from burking inquiry. For, if the miscellaneous crew of select Vestrymen, under whose dominion Londoners have the privilege to dwell, do really add the innocence of the dove to the wisdom of the serpent, they have nothing to fear, but everything to hope, from the most searching and minute examination of their acts. It is obvious that if any member of the House of Commons, who either is or has recently been a member of the Board, had opposed the appointment of a Commission, he would have laid himself open to a very unpleasant construction of his motives on the part of the uncharitably disposed. Mr. DE TATTON EGERTON, a colleague of the two gentlemen already mentioned both in the House and on the Board, though not a metropolitan member, has been amongst the strongest advocates for a Commission, and he is understood to be supported, at the eleventh hour, by the Board's Chairman, Lord MAGHERAMORNE. The scandals with which the Board has been for some time unpleasantly associated culminated the other day in the case of the Assistant Architect, who had confessed to just that sort of indiscretion which is least excusable and tolerable in a public servant. But this is only the last straw; though the behaviour of the Board is a straw of another kind—the straw that shows which way the wind blows. Every one remembers what serious accusations were made against the Board last summer, and how they were evaded. At last, after much pressure from what the incriminated parties doubtless regard as a venal press and an ignorant public, the Board solemnly resolved itself into a Committee, consisting of itself, to decide whether imputations made upon itself were true. Most of the complainants refused to take part in so degrading a travesty of justice; and the Metropolitan Board had the proud satisfaction of acquitting itself from guilt, and declaring that it left the court, or rather remained in the room, without a stain upon its public character.

But this was a little too much for the licentious journalists and the clamorous mob of whom the Board stands in such wholesome awe. During the recess the self-exonerated Vestrymen have enjoyed rather warm times, and with the opening of the Session Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has taken up the cudgels against them. Lord RANDOLPH represents South Paddington in Parliament, and Mr. FARDELL, who represents Paddington on the Board, has been conspicuous among the sensible and honourable minority who protested against submitting in silence to grave allegations of official corruption. The notice which Lord RANDOLPH proposed, and which, with some verbal alterations suggested by the SPEAKER, was carried yesterday morning, is sufficiently important to be quoted in full. It runs as follows:—"That an humble Address be presented to the Crown "praying that a Royal Commission, empowered by statute "to take evidence on oath, to compel attendance of wit- "nesses, to grant certificates of indemnity to witnesses in "such cases as may be desirable and proper, and to call "for all necessary records and documents, be appointed to "inquire into and report upon the working of the Metro- "politan Board of Works, and into the irregularities which "are alleged to have taken place in connexion therewith." This motion having been passed, it becomes the duty of the Government to introduce a Bill conferring the necessary powers upon the Commission. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has removed the objections which were at first made to the appointment of a Royal Commission, on the ground that it would not be able to enforce the attendance of witnesses, or to insist upon their answering the questions put to them. Those objections were perfectly valid, for without compulsion the truth will never be got out of the Board. A Select Committee of the House of Commons, upon which compulsory powers might be conferred by the House, has been suggested as a preferable tribunal, and it might certainly be appointed far more speedily, without the elaborate formalities of a Bill and without the assent of the House of Lords. But Lord RANDOLPH argues, on the other hand, with some force, that the taint of party politics always clings to a Parliamentary Committee. Names are canvassed, the balance of parties has to be more or less accurately observed, and the Irish Nationalists insist upon having a voice in the matter. A Royal Commission, though it must of course be nominated by the Government of the day, may be framed without any regard for the issues which divide the political world. There are men of great and acknowledged eminence whose political opinions, if they have any, are quite unknown; and, at all events, nobody would think of asking in such circumstances as these whether the Commissioners were Conservatives, or Liberal-Unionists, or Home Rulers. The matter is one which concerns the ratepayers of London, who have a right to know whether their money is being spent and their affairs administered by men of common sense and common honesty.

The case of the Committee is set forth in a letter from the Chairman, Mr. MARK JUDGE, to the members for London constituencies. We must confess that we do not quite understand why the question has been left for Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL to take up. HER MAJESTY'S Ministers might with advantage have forestalled him. The present Leader of the House of Commons is a metropolitan member. So is the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. Mr. SMITH is, indeed, regarded as the doyen of the body, while Mr. GOSCHEN is the most intellectually distinguished. If it be necessary to give a night for the rant and fuss about Trafalgar Square, of which most sensible people are heartily sick, it was, we should have thought, far more incumbent upon the FIRST LORD of the TREASURY and his colleagues to entertain the question whether the chief rating authority in London is a nest of jobbers and a den of thieves. For this is really what it comes to. Mr. JUDGE talks somewhat vaguely about "improper proceedings in connexion with "the sale of the Board's lands, which have resulted in "serious loss to the ratepayers." This is the case of Mr. ROBERTSON and Mr. VILLIERS known as the Pavilion scandal. But on two points he is precise enough, and they alone justify Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S motion. It is said, and Mr. JUDGE offers to prove, that "dan- "gerous and unsanitary property belonging to a member "of the Board" has been "repaired by the Board's work"men at the expense of the ratepayers." It is further alleged, and this time at least we know where we are, that "members and officers of the Board" have "made use of "their position for the purpose of obtaining advantages "for themselves from persons doing business with "the Board." Mr. HEBB, the Assistant Architect, has admitted that he asked for and obtained gratuitous tickets of admission to theatres by virtue of his official position, which enabled him to insist or to refrain from insisting upon structural alterations being made by the lessees. Why was not Mr. HEBB dismissed? It is impossible to suppose that even members of the Metropolitan Board did not know him to have been guilty of gross indiscretion, or that they were not aware how injurious their condonation of it would be to them in public opinion. The charge of repairing private property at the public expense is, if possible, more serious still; but the evidence in this case has not, so far as we are aware, been given to the world. Mr. JUDGE, however, on behalf of the Committee, pledges himself to lay before the Commission the names of the persons incriminated, together with the names of the witnesses who are prepared to prove the charges. After all that has passed, it is not wonderful that the House of Commons unanimously adopted the motion of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. To reject it would only have left the Metropolitan Board in a worse position than before, while it would have refused to metropolitan ratepayers that which they had a clear right to demand.

Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL's political position and the intrinsic importance of the subject combined to prevent his motion from being blocked, and therefore it could be taken at one in the morning. There are very strong reasons against delay, and no objection whatever to the utmost conceivable promptitude. The case for the prosecution is ready, and the defendants have had ample time to prepare their answer. If the sword had been kept hanging over them much longer, there is no saying what might not have happened. Documentary evidence is often the most valuable of all, but it has an unfortunate habit of disappearing just when it is most wanted. A paragraph in the Report of the Committee of Inquiry is most significant. "Some of these charges," it says—meaning the charges which we have already mentioned —"are based on evidence which refers to Minutes of Com- "mittees of the Board, and as the object of the Inquiry "Committee is simply to get at the facts, two applications "were addressed to the Board asking that permission might "be given to the Chairman and Treasurer of the Inquiry Com- "mittee to examine the records of the Board's Committees. "The Board declined to grant this request, though on each "occasion a minority of the members of the Board supported "the application." We have seldom read a more instructive statement. We trust that Parliament will take warning by it and lose no time in passing the Bill. Mr. BROADHURST moved that the scope of the Commission should be extended to the Vestries from which the Metropolitan Board is composed. We do not doubt that many London Vestries are very far from being what they ought to be, or that Mr. BROADHURST, before he was a member of Parliament, had opportunities of watching the way in which they did their work. But, as a practical man, Mr. BROADHURST must know the value of the principle "one thing at a time." Let the Vestries, whatever may be their shortcomings, wait until the Curia, to which they all contribute, has been thoroughly inspected and overhauled. So thought the House of Commons, and rejected Mr. BROADHURST's amendment by a large majority. To one request of the Committee Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL returned a judiciously indefinite reply. The Committee asked that the members for Paddington, Lord RANDOLPH and Mr. AIRD, should invite Sir CHARLES RUSSELL and Professor STUART to co-operate with them. The aid of Sir CHARLES RUSSELL would no doubt be invaluable, if he had any time to spare from conducting half the sensational cases and attending half the public meetings in London. But the less said about Professor STUART as an instrument for obtaining accurate information the better. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL is himself quite equal to accomplishing the not very arduous task he has undertaken. After settling the affairs of Europe, and disposing of the Triple Alliance, he must almost want a microscope to observe the proceedings of the Metropolitan Board.

"MATERIAL ACTION."

MR. LABOUCHERE is not likely to be offended if his interpellations to Sir JAMES FERGUSSON on the subject of the engagements of England are described as mischievous in the highest possible degree. For he means them to be mischievous, and intelligently adopts the proper mischief-making means to arrive at ends of mischief. It is the asserted conviction of the school to which Mr. LABOUCHERE belongs that anything which engages England in foreign politics is bad, and anything which disengages her from foreign politics is good. This conviction may, except in those Irish members of the party who frankly avow a desire to damage England in every possible way, be incomprehensible enough; for you can as well keep a European nation great and prosperous but disengaged from European politics as you can keep a mouse well and lively under an exhausted receiver. But, granted the end, the means are sufficiently well chosen. If it were possible, not only to demand, but to obtain, minute particulars in the House of Commons as to the engagements and intentions of Government in regard to foreign policy, a very few years would simplify the task of the catechizers, inasmuch as there would be nothing to tell them. Even as it is, the mere exposure of English Ministers to such catechizings seriously hampers them in acting for the good of the country. Such an extension of the practice as Mr. LABOUCHERE desires would make every foreign Government boycott England altogether in the matter of common understandings. Fortunately the nuisance has at present gone no further than this—that injudicious or ill-willed members of Parliament may ask what they like, and that judicious and well-meaning Ministers may answer what they like. There are perhaps few positions in which answers like that of the Saint—"He is near you"—are not only so excusable, but such a positive duty, as in the position of a Secretary or Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs. There are departments of the public service where it is hardly possible for things to be too much open to the public eye; in this particular department it is hardly possible for some things at least to be kept from that eye too closely until the proper and safe minute. Therefore the questioner in such cases is for the time being a public enemy, and is to be treated according to the fashions and on the moral principles recommended by Lord WOLSELEY and other authorities. "The Under-Secretary's "Pocket-Book" would not be a bad book to write, though Sir JAMES FERGUSSON in particular has shown himself fairly independent of such aid. We have not the slightest intention of criticizing the terms of his answers to Mr. LABOUCHERE. To do so would be to do exactly what Mr. LABOUCHERE desires, and what the enemies of England abroad desire and are trying to do. In matters of foreign policy it is the right and the duty of every public writer and speaker to point out what line, in his opinion, Ministerial policy ought to take; but it is still more the duty of every such writer and speaker to abstain from extracting compromising declarations of the line that it will take. And, indeed, in these days the process is not only mischievous but idle, for the complications of things are so great, and the changes of them so rapid, that the most indiscreet Minister could hardly tell on Monday what he should do in a given state of things on Saturday.

The latest elements in the great problem of peace or war have been, besides this question of the engagements of England, the other questions of the position of Italy, of the chances of Russia taking some steps to benefit by Prince BISMARCK's curious recognition of her right to "sway" in Bulgaria, and, lastly, the fantastic notion still caressed by some French and Russian journalists, and supposed to have sprung from Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL's tour, that England may be coaxed into a Franco-Russian alliance. The first and the last-named go together, and the mere consideration of them together is almost enough in the case of any reasonable person to decide both. The duties and interests of England are very simple and plain. Duty bids her see that the Turkish Empire, especially in Asia, is not further broken up without imperative reason, and interest bids her see that a new Mediterranean Power is not created in the shape of Russia. In neither of these respects is an alliance with either Russia herself, or France, desirable, or even possible. For such an alliance must be directed to the detriment of the other Powers, and the detriment of those other Powers can by no possibility benefit England. She might profit by the disasters of France; she certainly would profit, if only negatively, by the disasters of Russia; but she has nothing to gain by the disasters either of Austria or of Italy, and so little as to be next to nothing to gain by the disasters of Germany. On the other hand, the three allied Powers by keeping Russia in check can give England much more securely the only thing that Russia herself can give—a guarantee against further encroachments in Central Asia. Only a madman or a traitor, therefore, could propose an Anglo-Franco-Russian alliance, and there is no reason to suppose that Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL is a madman, while he certainly is not a traitor. Yet the amount of positive support which England could, should, or would give to the new tripartite alliance against French and Russian aggression is clearly a matter to be determined in the event of the case arising, and not before.

Much curiosity has been shown on the point whether Russia will endeavour to obtain the benefit of Prince BISMARCK'S offers. It is true that those who express this curiosity do not seem to be aware that these offers are uncommonly vague offers, and that they have practically been made many times before. French is the language of diplomacy, and there is a certain French adjective which exactly expresses Prince BISMARCK'S genial suggestion that Russia shall make some proposals to regain her sway and his genial assurance that these proposals shall have the support of Germany. This geniality is of course not treacherous or traitorous; but it is traître. If, of course, one assertion which has been rather rashly made were correct, and if Germany had given a positive undertaking, not only that she would not interfere in Bulgarian matters herself, but also that she would not even regard an attack on Austria, if Austria objected to Russian violence in Bulgaria, as a casus fœderis, then matters would certainly be different. But, if that were the case, the Austro-German alliance would be a pure farce, and we should probably before this have seen a fleet of Russian transports off Varna. Short of such a pledge on Prince BISMARCK'S part—a pledge which would amount to a contradiction of his whole speech—his suggestions to Russia in the Bulgarian matter are most emphatically hollow ground for any wise Russian to walk on. The Russian proposals are to be consonant with the Berlin Treaty, and yet Prince BISMARCK knows, and, indeed, with charming frankness, admits, that certain Powers very directly concerned refuse to see anything about Russian sway in that treaty. It is obvious that in any conference on the subject, even supposing that Germany and France blindly backed Russia, Turkey would have to be introduced to give the casting vote, and to give it in favour of an abolition of the SULTAN'S own rights. Otherwise it would be impossible to get a majority. Almost everybody who has looked into the matter believes that it is still more impossible for Russia to frame any proposals, do what she may, which shall satisfy at once the Berlin Treaty (even on the Bismarckian interpretation of that d cument), the objections of Austria, Italy, and England, her own desires, and the determination of the Porte to surrender as few of its rights as possible, and those only when forced. Prince BISMARCK'S offer, then, amounts practically to a suggestion that Russia shall make two straight lines enclose a space or construct a triangle the angles of which shall be equal to less or more than the normal amount. He, the PRINCE, will then not only give this triangle his most distinguished consideration, but will—foi de Bismarck—press its acceptance on assembled Europe with all the means at his command. No doubt he would, for his honour and honesty are both beyond suspicion. But somehow or other it is suspected that there may be a difficulty in first constructing the triangle.

MR. PARNELL'S AMENDMENT.

MOST Parliamentary debates, especially when they turn upon familiar political questions, consist, in the contemplation of logic, of not more than two speeches. That is to say, it seldom requires more than this amount of discussion to either establish or refute the proposition on which the debate has been challenged. Few issues submitted to Parliament are so complicated that a capable reasoner with the facts at his command, and from an hour to an hour and a half to array and develop his arguments, cannot put his case into a condition to be pronounced upon by any fairly intelligent tribunal without more ado. Certainly there is nothing in the proposition submitted to the House of Commons in the paragraph relating to Ireland in the QUEEN'S Speech, and traversed by the amendment of Mr. PARNELL, to make it necessary for the Court to call upon any one else besides Mr. BALFOUR and Mr. PARNELL himself. We might say, indeed, that the question was ripe for judgment after Mr. MORLEY'S reply to the CHIEF SECRETARY, were it not that that singularly weak effort of an able man was made under somewhat disadvantageous circumstances. Mr. BALFOUR'S facts and figures were fresh, and, his predecessor at the Irish Office having to deal with them on the spur of the moment, it might have been thought unfair to take his speech as representing the best answer which the Opposition could make to them. There can be no such unfairness, however, in assigning this representative character to the speech of a man who is a greater master of the subject than Mr. MORLEY, and who had had three days in which to study his opponent's statement. We shall undoubtedly be safe in regarding Mr. PARNELL'S reply to Mr. BALFOUR as having put the Opposition case as strongly as it can be put; and so regarded, it leaves that case not one whit stronger than it came from the hands of Mr. MORLEY. Both of them admit the improvement in Ireland; both suggest the same explanation of it, in substitution for that propounded in the QUEEN'S Speech; but as regards amount of success in the attempt to discredit the Ministerial explanation, and to procure acceptance of their own, there is nothing to choose between them.

Mr. PARNELL, like Mr. MORLEY, can see no reason for supposing that this admittedly vigorous enforcement of the law against certain disorderly and illegal persons can have anything to do with a reduction in their number. He attributes it solely to the operation of the good advice addressed—or alleged to have been addressed—to the former law-breakers by certain virtuous and disinterested counsellors in England. Even if the cause to which he ascribes the change were as conspicuously present as he pretends, its assumed potency would rest upon much the same evidence as that of the charms which, according to an historic sarcasm, have been found so efficacious, when accompanied with the administration of powerful antiseptics, in the work of disinfection. But, as a matter of fact, the particular incantations which Mr. PARNELL declares to have charmed away Irish disorder have never been audible on this side of St. George's Channel. We may observe that it would in any case have been a somewhat doubtful compliment on his part to his Gladstonian friends to suggest that they have only just awakened to the duty of dissuading Irishmen from crime; but let that pass. It is with the alleged fact of these all-powerful dissuasions that we are alone concerned; and there seems here to be fair ground for retorting Mr. GLADSTONE'S demand for statistics upon Mr. PARNELL. It would greatly strengthen his argumentative position if he were able to cite any examples of these sedative exhortations on the part of his English friends, to say nothing of proof of their efficacy. The only manifestations of Gladstonian activity in Ireland which the English public can recall had certainly the reverse of a tranquillizing effect. They occurred at Mitchelstown and at Woodford; at the former of which places the counsels of calmness addressed to the Irish people resulted in the first instance in a riot, in which the mob had to be fired upon by the police, and several lives were lost; while at the second there occurred the rough-and-tumble fight in the course of which Mr. WILFRID BLUNT was rolled upon the ground, and as a consequence of which he is now undergoing a term of imprisonment. We do not know whether these are the sort of incidents which, in Mr. PARNELL'S words, have "done wonders, worked miracles, changed the nature "of the people," because they are the only noticeable instances of the active display of that "English sympathy" to which Mr. PARNELL ascribes such marvellous effects. Perhaps he will say that this sympathy was silently operative, and that the consciousness of its existence made the Irish people more amenable to the restraining counsels of their own countrymen. Let us see, then, what sort of restraint these counsels were themselves calculated to impose. As regards crimes of violence the leading Parnellites could no doubt quote a sufficiency (though at the present moment we can recall none) of those eminently conventional recommendations to abstain from crime which they are accustomed from time to time to address to their countrymen. But they have shown themselves throughout the winter as determined as ever in their support of that system of terrorism of which the sanction is crime, and they have some of them taken active and open part in holding up to public execration those victims of the boycotter who have shortly afterwards become the victims of the assassin. As Mr. HARRINGTON, however, and others dispute their responsibility for the latest of these outrages—and that although the Secretary of that branch of the National League in the district in which FITZMAURICE was murdered is at this moment collecting funds for the defence of the men pointed out by FITZMAURICE's daughter as the murderers—we will leave crimes of violence out of the account. But how stands the case as regards the boycotting tyranny itself—that tyranny the collapse of which is justly regarded by Mr. BALFOUR as the most gratifying of all proofs of the improvement of the situation in Ireland? Can it be pretended, even by Mr. PARNELL himself, that if and to the extent to which boycotting has diminished that result is or can be due to anything except the firm administration of the Crimes Act? Even he cannot and does not pretend that any change which has taken place in this respect is due either to the good advice of his followers or the sympathy of his English allies. It is because he cannot pretend this that he is driven to deny the fact of any diminution of boycotting. He knows that Mr. GLADSTONE has extenuated, and still extenuates, the moral and social guilt of those "coercive conspiracies" by describing them under the euphemism of "exclusive dealing," and absurdly comparing their organized attack on private liberty with the harsh or oppressive action of individuals. He knows that no single Englishman, from Mr. GLADSTONE downwards, has ever allowed compassion for the victims of the boycotter to mingle with the new-born "sympathy" which he is displaying towards Ireland, or has ever addressed a word of remonstrance to the persecutors. Lastly, Mr. PARNELL knows well that, so far from discouraging boycotting, his followers have strained every nerve to strengthen what they justly perceive to be their sole remaining weapon of power; that it is not many months since Mr. DILLON threatened that the man who brought himself under the ban of the League would be pursued by their tyranny even across the Atlantic; and that it is not many weeks since MICHAEL DAVITT exhorted an audience to treat such a man as a "social leper." Actively or passively, in fact, the whole Separatist party, Parnellites and Gladstonians, have supported the boycotter by every means in their power; and since the boycotter is losing ground every day, it is for them to explain his defeat, if they can, by any other cause than the administration of the Crimes Act.

The controversy was again taken up on Thursday night by Mr. MORLEY, under the renewed right of audience given him by the introduction of Mr. PARNELL's motion of amendment; but Mr. MORLEY did not succeed in strengthening his weak point to any noticeable extent. His only new argument, indeed, was one borrowed from the Irish benches, to the effect that the apparent reduction of boycotting is due to the fact that large numbers of formerly boycotted persons have now made their peace with the League. Mr. MORLEY's memory must indeed be short, or he would remember that, when the Crimes Act was under discussion, it was vehemently protested from the same quarter that the statistics of boycotted persons must be false because nearly the whole of the population of Ireland were in sympathy with the League already. "What you confound "with intimidation and pressure," Mr. MORLEY went on to say, "is, in fact, public opinion." Perhaps the late Chief Secretary may be able to recall a time when, in reply to certain questions from the Opposition, he admitted that the "state of feeling in Woodford was bad," or "rather bad," or described it by some other totally inadequate expression. Well, Mr. J. M. LEWIS, an Irish agent and Justice of the Peace, and a witness for the defence in Mr. BLUNT's action, has just described this state of feeling as displayed in March 1886. Here are some of his words:—"A man named "FINLAY had just been murdered. A crowd was assembled "round the widow of the murdered man jeering at her. "The murder took place in a wood three or four hundred "yards from the town. Witness saw FINLAY's body. A "ball had gone through his mouth. The jeering at the "widow took place half an hour after the murder." Let Mr. MORLEY read the further evidence of District-Inspector MURPHY as to the twenty-three families, consisting of ninety-two persons, boycotted at that time, and as to the details of the boycottings given by other witnesses; and let him consider whether the statement we have above quoted does not need revision. If the state of things described by these witnesses is a mere manifestation of "public opinion," as distinct from "intimidation and pressure," then we can only say that Mr. ELLIS's threat of proscription against the Irish Resident Magistrates must have been merely a mild and legitimate reminder to them to be careful in the discharge of their magisterial duties.

A PUBLISHER'S CONFESSIONS.

WHAT a Publisher's Confessions are really like is known only to his director, especially when he is a Limited Liability Company. What the author who writes as JOHN STRANGE WINTER thinks a Publisher's Confessions might be he has told the world in a shilling volume (F. V. WHITE & Co.) We confess that we have been rather disappointed than shocked. There is nothing revealed about "the trade" which has not been proclaimed by many authors on the housetop. The book is like books on the Eleusinian Mysteries—it tells you nothing that you are not familiar with as matter of report.

The confessing publisher has risen from poverty to eminence in his business. If he has behaved ungenerously to his partner's daughter, that is a vice inherent in a mean character; and probably nobody will assert either that all publishers are mean or that all other men in business are generous. The special crimes revealed by this publisher are that, when he promised to publish a book at cost price, he really charged "full retail prices," and that he saddled an author with certain expenses for advertising, which he never paid in money, but swopped with other proprietors of magazines. For these practices he quotes "the custom of "the trade"; and, if it be the custom of the trade to lie and cheat, so much the worse for them. But it is probable, or rather certain, that the evil custom is only practised by evil persons, and that we might as well call every author a plagiarist as every publisher a knave. However, this particular publisher is guilty of one particular and to the last degree improbable roguery wherein he cannot plead custom by way of excuse. A rich and pretty girl brings him a novel in manuscript, and pays 160*l.* towards expenses. There are publishers who do this kind of thing and publishers who don't. The authors who deal on these terms with publishers remind one of the proverb which, as the negro said to his master, "ends 'are soon parted' I dis-"remember how it begins." The confessing publisher sees that the novel is ungrammatical trash. He makes a hack author rewrite it for 25*l.*, publishes it, and it has a great success. The lady author never sees the proofs, and does not know that the story is not her own till it is published. She then accepts the situation, and the son of the publisher. The hack who really wrote the book now "puts a screw" on the publisher, and a variety of complications follow. By the way, this fellow is supposed to be an Oxford man. The style of his talk is the style of the gutter, and his conduct is little better than his style. Can any one, however inveterate an author, consider this intrigue of the money, and the manuscript, and the fair author who is not the author, a probable or even plausible account of what publishers are in the habit of doing and suffering? Mr. WINTER has written a great many books, which have a deserved popularity. Perhaps in none has he allowed more license to his imagination. But, when a critic says this, he is invariably met with the reply that "the story is true." This usually means that it was suggested by something which the author heard from somebody in conversation. Even granting that the story is true, is it typical? Could such a very soft-hearted rogue as the publisher, and one who knows his SHAKSPEARE so well, be a common kind of character? Are there many authors who will pay ridiculously large sums for the publication of books which they have not written, and will they put their names to them without even seeing the proof-sheets? If there are such persons, they will assuredly be fleeced, by one person or another, while the world stands.

There was once a not unpopular author whose good sense (except in certain transactions) was pretty generally acknowledged. His biography was written by the late Mr. LOCKHART, and Mr. GLADSTONE has regretted that the book "never had a really wide circulation." On the subject of publishers and their profits Sir WALTER SCOTT said (August 1807):—"Without any greater degree of fourberie than "they conceive the long practice of their brethren has "rendered matter of prescriptive right, they contrive to "clip the author's proportion of profits down to a mere "trifle." SCOTT's notion of what an author's profits should "fairly" be was twopence on the shilling in the published price. We have been informed that this is a very common rate in the trade of to-day, though we do not care to say how much the owners of the railway-stalls pay the publishers for the books which they sell at a shilling apiece. If this information be correct, the modern publisher must have somewhat deserted the "prescriptive right" spoken of by Sir WALTER. Talking of his own time, he adds:—"I do not quite blame the booksellers when I consider the very singular nature of their mystery. . . . They are the only tradesmen in the world who professedly, and by choice, deal in what is called 'a pig in a poke.' When you consider the abominable trash which by their ignorance is published every year, you will readily excuse them for the indemnifications which they must necessarily obtain at the expense of authors of some value. . . . I apprehend that upon the whole the account between the trade and the authors of Great Britain is pretty fairly balanced. . . . I do not know but this, upon the whole, is favourable to the cause of literature." But "this, all this, was in the olden time long ago." As in all other professions, there are honourable men and men not so honourable in the art of publishing. The former are not hard to discover, and if they will have nothing to do with an author's work, that author may be pretty sure that his work is not worth printing. If he then declines on other people, he should not be surprised at the treatment they give him, any more than he should be surprised if he litigates by the conduct of Messrs. DODSON & FOGG.

OUR COMMERCIAL POSITION.

WITHIN the last ten days two different and equally competent authorities have spoken on the commercial position of this country. Apart altogether from the intrinsic interest of what they have to say their statements are valuable at present. It is tolerably certain that an attempt will be made by the Fair-traders to employ some part of the Session in seeking after a remedy for the alleged progressive ruin of this country by foreign competition. The subject is excellently fitted to afford an excuse for much waste of time in talk, and nothing could serve better to ward off that evil than a general conviction that there is no such ruin going on. The two authorities are the Chamber of Shipping and the Board of Trade, and they agree thoroughly on this point. If the Board of Trade is suspect to the prophets of evil as being enslaved to the orthodox economist, the Chamber of Shipping is quite free from reproach. It is not a Government office, but a voluntary and representative association. If it says that things are going well, it must be because the members feel the influence of prosperity on their bankers' accounts. And if shipping is flourishing, so must business generally, for they are bound up together. A cheerful report from the shipping interest is particularly valuable, because no branch of industry has suffered more severely from the long depression of late years. If, then, it has gone on increasing in bulk, and is now preparing for a further extension, there would seem to be no excuse for croaking. To judge from the Report of Mr. THOMAS SCRUTTON, which was apparently approved of by the members of the Chamber who are competent judges, the progress of our shipping has been extraordinary even in these last ten lean years. Since 1876 we have increased our shipping, not only absolutely but relatively. Ten years ago the number of voyages made by our ships "in the carrying trade of the kingdom" was 578,016. Against this the foreigners made 66,813. In 1886 the figures were respectively 606,106 and 49,688. The increase in tonnage has corresponded to the increase in voyages made. In 1876 the foreigners had 19,232,400 tons to our 98,015,567. Last year the proportion was 18,575,820 foreigners to 125,691,294 British. It therefore follows that we have increased while our rivals have gone back. In the face of such figures as these, reported by an authority which is above suspicion, the talk about the driving of English ships off our own trade by foreign competition, which was so common about the time of the new postal arrangements on the American line, looks foolish indeed.

On the supposition, which we suppose no one will care to contradict, that shipping can hardly flourish during a general decline of commerce, this report of Mr. SCRUTTON'S gives further authority to Mr. GIFFEN'S account of the actual extent of foreign competition with English trade published by the Board of Trade. His Report is sure to receive not a little hostile criticism, for, compared with the pictures familiar in the prophecies of the Fair-traders, it is decidedly optimistic. Mr. GIFFEN is not able to show that nobody except the Englishman is doing any trade in the world, which is the only state of things the Fair-trader seems to think really satisfactory; but he does produce reasons for believing that in the general increase of the commerce of the world this country has a very fair share. There are several parts of his Report which would stand being given in greater detail. It would be interesting, for instance, to learn why the trade of this country with Japan has fallen off, while the French has increased. From one set of figures which he has to give Mr. GIFFEN must have felt strongly tempted to draw a moral. They give the sums total of the trade of France. In spite of increase here and there it has decreased, and notably in the exports. While the trade of the other great nations with which Mr. GIFFEN deals has been on the increase, the French has on the whole fallen. It is matter for the reflection of Fair-traders that this shrinkage has coincided with a revival of Protectionist policy; or if they do not like the word Protectionist, then with a return to the practice of imposing penal duties. If Mr. GIFFEN is bound to confine himself to stating the facts, his French colleague, M. LEROY BEAULIEU, has amply spared him the trouble of drawing their moral. The limits imposed on him by the Board of Trade have confined Mr. GIFFEN to the main facts of the situation, and very rightly debar him from anything approaching to controversy in an official document. But he says quite enough for readers who can put the argument in for themselves. A general review of the export trade of the United Kingdom, Germany, France, and the United States, with a good list of countries given in one of the tables, shows that, if two of them have increased, so have we. In French trade there is a fall off of 909,000*l.* Germany and the United States have increased; but the additions of their trade put together just exceed the augmentation to our own. The figures are 39,134,000*l.* for us and 39,723,000*l.* for the other two. The sum total is made up by setting gains against losses. In China and Japan, for instance, our trade has gone back, which is sufficiently accounted for as regards the first of these countries by the impoverishment caused by the Tonquin business. On the other hand, business has immensely increased with British possessions. Taken altogether, the statistics of this Report prove that our trade with any given country is always either the best or the second best. Germany excels us in the Baltic, where it has Russia and the Scandinavian States for immediate neighbours. France does a larger trade with Belgium, Italy, and Spain, which are just over the border. Where the conditions are equal the United Kingdom has the advantage. We do an incomparably greater Baltic trade than France, and we greatly surpass the Germans in the Mediterranean. The competition of Germany has been the bugbear of alarmists for some years, and there is no doubt that the trade of the Empire has been increasing steadily of late. It is not at all surprising that a country inhabited by millions of hard-working people should do a great deal of business when it was released from the trammels imposed by internal division. It does not, however, follow that the prosperity of our neighbour must necessarily be our loss. The old belief that one man's gain is another man's loss in international trade dies hard; and many who have heard that Germany was doing more business have quite naturally jumped to the conclusion that room was found for it by elbowing out English trade. That the returns of the Board of Trade will convince them of the contrary it would be rash to assert; but they certainly afford proof that even in these late bad years our commerce has on the whole increased, and that our prosperity has kept abreast, and even ahead, of the prosperity of our neighbours. If the increase of German trade looks more striking, it is because it started from a much lower level.

Though both these statements, Mr. SCRUTTON'S and Mr. GIFFEN'S, are decidedly hopeful, they show that changes are going on in our commerce. Whether they are ultimately to be for the worse or not is a pretty matter of controversy. Perhaps the safest remark to make on the matter is that changes will do the least harm to people who meet them with their brains. Mr. GIFFEN gives it as his opinion that England is less an emporium than it was. The loss of our position as the great bonded warehouse of the world would doubtless be a misfortune, but to a very considerable extent it is inevitable. The opening of the Suez Canal, which was expressly made to be a nuisance to this country, the development of steam navigation, and increase of direct communication between all the countries of the globe must necessarily tend to make England less the common exchange of the world. The character of our shipping is being altogether altered by steam. The Chamber of Shipping is well enough pleased at the change, which means more voyages, quicker profits, and, according to the popular view, greater security for the lives of crews and passengers. For these reasons Mr. SCRUTTON is inclined to be almost jubilant over the steady diminution in the proportion of sailing-ships built to steamers. It is not improbable that this revolution may in time be found unwelcome, for other than sentimental reasons. Shipowners may before long find themselves less able to secure men competent to navigate their costly steamers, which have hitherto been officered by men who have been made into seamen on the sailing-ships. But the change cannot be stopped, and must be met. Alterations in the course of trade and the nature of shipping have taken place, and will go on. We must adapt ourselves to them; and men of business have to remember that a power must be retained by the arts which gained it. Among the arts by which we gained our commercial position sitting down and crying for unattainable circumstances was not one. Our very different practice was to make the best of what there was to deal with. It does not appear from what the Chamber of Shipping and the Board of Trade have to say that we have as yet been found wanting.

KENSINGTON GARDENS.

THERE is unwonted activity in Kensington Gardens just now. A new entrance in the Bayswater Road, new paths, new trees, and the addition of a small slip of land, formerly a walled-in plot of garden, must be numbered among the proofs of energy shown by the authorities. Among the improvements now in progress, the most important is the drainage of the lower boggy ground near Palace Gate—a most necessary measure advocated in our comments on the tree-felling carried out last autumn. The extensive tract now being drained proves to be even worse than was at first surmised. It is a swamp of the most unwholesome kind, sufficient in itself to account for the decay of the neighbouring belt of trees, apart from the ignorance of forestry displayed in planting those trees. In spite of more than twelve months of unprecedented drought the cuttings made for the drain-pipes flow with water as soon as cut, although much of the soil is an impervious yellow clay. Being near the surface this clay prevents the rainfall to a great extent reaching the subsoil, and renders the ground oozy and damp even in the height of summer. Though marsh lights and fire-drakes may not sport their thin blue flames by night, any observant person must have noted that the winter fogs are densest here, and misty exhalations prevail on summer evenings. As this open space has long been the favourite playing-ground of the children of the neighbourhood, its drainage was imperative merely for sanitary reasons. There is fortunately a good fall towards the lower end of the Broad Walk; and the work, if thoroughly completed, ought to be very beneficial. It is a pity, however, that deep trenching was not carried out when draining and planting were undertaken. There is not much to be said for the policy of planting before the dead or dying trees already marked for removal disappear. As to the planting, so far as it may be seen, it is of the old regulation type. There are a number of young trees planted, all of one species—the lime—planted at regular intervals, after one pattern, like peas in a pod. The old rule of landscape-gardening was to open out views. We reverse the process, till the trees are not to be seen for the wood. We plant trees with reckless profusion; any trees, anywhere, and anyhow. The old method inclined to making vistas and the noble art of perspective. REPTON and his disciples delighted in clearing, and often cleared too much by their amazing transformations. Without doubt, errors may abound on both sides.

The maligned art of landscape-gardening has suffered revolution in the matter of planting. When the gentle elegiacal SHENSTONE settled in his sequestered vale he was so enclosed by woods he could scarcely have seen those hills "white over with sheep" of which he sang. His adorned farm at Leasowes, with its zig-zag walks, votive urns, statues, fountains, and grottoes was full of vain attempts to force the hand of nature. His tortuous Lover's Walk ended, oddly enough, in a Temple of Pan, not in a draughty cavern of sighs or a fane dedicated to Hymen. So does the wayfarer from Lancaster Gate to Palace Gate find a fair and promising garden end in a swamp. Yet we are spared most of the artifices which GILPIN found so futile and irritating. We see nothing nowadays like the poet's inscribed tablets inviting naiads to sport in crystal pools, or dip their feet in purling rills, where there was nothing but stagnant water for their disporting. At Hagley, too, where another poet essayed the topiarian art, the father of picturesque tourists could find nothing but "minute and trifling" views, and thought the famous Palladian bridge and much-sung waterway altogether "beneath criticism." His strictures, however, are not to be taken too literally. As he said to MASON, "We "picturesque people are a little misunderstood"; and so it may have been with the ingenious PAYNE KNIGHT and the complacent REPTON. The student of REPTON'S treatise, if he compares the woodcuts that display the natural landscape with the transformation effected by the overlapping sectional cuts, will almost invariably prefer the former to the triumphs of REPTON. There is much to be said for the ancient garden state. It should at least be reverently treated, if treated at all; and this, it is only fair to add, has been the fortune of Kensington Gardens. Mr. MILESTONE, a typical landscape-gardener suggested by PAYNE KNIGHT'S book on Taste, is made to give unconscious illustration of the truth. He depicts Littlebrain Castle unimproved by the hand of taste, embowered in trees, with its Gothic casements, and its turret with an owl peeping from the ivy—"And devilish "wise he looks," says Squire HEADLONG. "And here," rejoins Mr. MILESTONE, "is the new house, without a tree "near it, standing in the midst of an undulating lawn; a "white, polished, angular building, reflected to a nicety in "this waveless lake; and there you see Lord LITTLEBRAIN "looking out of the window." "And devilish wise he looks, "too," says Squire HEADLONG. What is wanted in Kensington Gardens is to avoid both extremes in clearing and in planting. The monotonous crowd of decapitated trees by the upper edge of the forlorn swamp ought to be rigorously thinned, and there should be prompt removal of the more afflicted limes, whose gaunt dead tops rise high above their healthier neighbours. This ragged regiment, with its scaffold-pole extremities, is not without a picturesque aspect. It recalls the "one instance of sublimity" which COLERIDGE found in DRAYTON:—

> Our trees so hacked above the ground,
> That where their lofty tops the neighbouring countries crown'd,
> Their trunks (like aged folks) now bare and naked stand,
> As for revenge to heav'n each held a withered hand.

But gardens should flourish and be green and beautiful. These stricken trees are dangerous and should go.

THE LEWIS.

THE report of Sheriff FRASER and Mr. MALCOLM MCNEILL on the state of the Lewis is about the most melancholy reading which has been published for some time. It is the history of the production of squalid and hopeless pauperism by well meant philanthropy and flukes of good luck. Nobody need indulge in what Sir WALTER would have called big bow-wow, or in bullying moral rebuke to the people of the Lewis, and that for various reasons. It will lead to nothing, for one thing; and for another, it is more than a little unjust. The history of the island given by the Sheriff and his colleague shows that the islanders have suffered, on a large scale, from a misfortune which has often proved the ruin of individuals. They have inherited too many casual small legacies. Twice within the last century the starvation of the whole population has been predicted, and on both occasions the prophets have been discredited by the sudden development of industries. First came the kelp; and, when that was ruined by science (which is always upsetting something), then it was the herring-fishery. Each of these things enabled a still larger population to live in what, according to its notions, was greater comfort. Sir J. MATHESON, who spent a great fortune, made elsewhere, lavishly in the Lewis, was another version of the kelp and the herring-fishery. Now all these sources of profit have stopped. The kelp is gone long ago; Sir JAMES is dead, and his money spent to as good as no purpose; the herring-fishery is no longer a resource. The cadgers have taken to paying the fishermen by percentages. This system, which is praised by some as fair, practically means that the workman who has no capital must share the risks of the capitalist. Under recent pressure it has spelt starvation to the people of Lewis. Not much importance need be attached to the account Dr. ROPER, of the Jackal, gives of their dirtiness. They are not much, if at all, dirtier than the whole peasantry of Scotland were at no very distant period. Edinburgh itself was not exactly a model of cleanliness when WINIFRED JENKINS went on her travels, and the MUCKLEBACKITS would have been happy enough in the surroundings of a Lewis cottar. Yet the people of the East of Scotland are now a model to their countrymen of the West. Dirty as their houses are, they have not prevented the race from growing strong and healthy, on Dr. ROPER'S own showing; and what can any condition do for men more than allow them to be strong and healthy? The Doctor saw them loafing about with their hands in their pockets, but he might have seen English fishermen doing that at Whitby or Brixham. Nobody ever saw a fisherman doing anything else on shore. It is not said that the Lewis men are especially lazy when they go over to the mainland. If they do no work at home, one reason may be that they have no work to do.

An advocate of the cottars and crofters might on the whole make out a fair case for the class. The kelp was not their fault, nor the herring fishery, nor Sir J. MATHESON. More than that, they are not exclusively to blame if they are asking for useless, and even immoral, palliatives to their distress. Distinguished statesmen who have pandered to Irish anarchy, and British voters who have supported them, may bear their share of the stripes. Therefore the less bullying talk there is to the people of the Lewis for becoming numerous under every incentive to increase, the better it will be for the manners of all concerned. Then the less lying there is, the better it will be for our morals. It is sufficiently obvious, as the Sheriff points out, that, unless another kelp-collecting industry or another development of the herring fishery takes place, starvation will come upon the island. The rates cannot support the paupers thrown on them already. If the number of paupers is increased, there will be total bankruptcy and consequent famine. With this prospect before us, it is absolutely necessary, on every consideration of honour and interest, that some measure of prevention should be taken. The nature of the situation points out what the measures must be. They must not be anything which will tend to perpetuate the present misery. There is nothing which will do except a large measure of emigration. If this can be brought about by a spontaneous movement among the people themselves, so much the better. If not, then it must be produced by sufficient pressure—by steadily refusing to pass any more Crofters' Bills to perpetuate starvation, and by offering aid to the emigrants. It is clear that the State will very briefly have to choose between helping these people to go elsewhere or supporting them as paupers where they are. There can be no doubt which of the two is the more extravagant course. To leave the difficulty to settle itself is the one thing not possible. In other and perhaps happier times death by hunger and piracy would have afforded the necessary relief; but these rude old methods are no longer practicable. Law and sentiment alike forbid them. Therefore it follows that without more force than is strictly necessary, and under good, steady governance, the superfluous population of the Lewis must be helped to go where it may be a credit to the Empire, and can at least live a decent existence. Otherwise we may lay our account with having another Connemara on the West of Scotland, and we shall very briefly discover whether it is either cheap or convenient.

THE VICTIMS OF THE CRIMES ACT.

WE shall be excused, we hope, for not finding any transcendent importance in the dispute as to the numbers and character of the crowd by which the late Lord Mayor of Dublin was received at Euston Station, and subsequently preceded, accompanied, and followed to Hyde Park. On the question of numbers the controversy is of the idlest description. Almost any incident of the most trivial description taking place at a crowded part of London will collect a concourse of people at the rate of about a hundred a minute; and any ceremony even pretending to be of a political or otherwise public character, and of which due notice has been given beforehand, will assemble several thousand people betimes on the spot with a view to securing a good place for a view of the entertainment. When these thousands mount up to five or six, as they speedily do if the function takes any time, they reach the limit at which any trustworthy estimate of their numbers can, except by virtue of special and exceptional facilities for enumeration, be attained. If the crowd increases beyond this point, it may be estimated at anything from ten to forty thousand, according to the taste and fancy of the calculator. Now there are, we are informed, a certain number of Irishmen resident in London, and it is further a matter of general belief that among the metropolitan population there is an appreciable percentage of persons in want of employment. Out of these two classes—even allowing for the fact that they may to a certain extent overlap each other—there would be no difficulty whatever in getting together a sufficient assemblage of people at the reception of Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN to satisfy any reasonable expectations on their part. As to the character of the crowd, that is a matter on which it is much easier to form a tolerably safe opinion. No doubt it did not consist exclusively of the "dirty, ill-"favoured, and dissolute-looking boys" which it seemed to the perhaps jaundiced eye of a gentleman who admits that it lost him his train to be composed of. But when we are asked to believe that, even on a Monday—day of idleness as it often is for those who are exclusively known as the "sons of toil"—it would be possible to assemble many thousands of the "best type of English working-man" to greet the released Irish prisoners, we respectfully decline. We have very little doubt that the processionists in the street and the audience in Hyde Park last Monday had just about as much or as little claim to represent the best type of English working-man as the guests assembled at the Criterion had to represent the best type of English politician.

The whole question, however, would be of vastly little importance but for one consideration, which is this. The late occasion was the first which has presented itself for testing in the broad popular-demonstrationist fashion the general feeling of the outdoor English public about the victims of the Crimes Act. For a long time past we have been condemned to listen to the loud-mouthed protestations of the Gladstonian on the subject of "coercion," and the resentment with which it is inspiring the English people. Now there is not, of course, and never has been, the slightest reason for supposing that so far as the effective portion, so to speak, of the English public, the general body of the electorate, is concerned, there is any foundation whatever for these noisy boasts; but it is not unimportant to have had it also proved that, even among the least thoughtful and most impressionable portion of the English people, the rubbish about oppression and torture—such rubbish, for instance, as was "shot" in so remarkable a profusion by Mr. O'BRIEN on Thursday night—will in nowise "go down." Had any appreciable portion of the class of people who form the ordinary street crowds been taken in by it, they would certainly have assembled in strength last Monday afternoon, if only for the excitement of gazing at the victims. But the spectacular fiasco of the Euston reception, and the subsequent meeting in Hyde Park, has sufficiently shown that no body of English sympathizers worth mentioning could be got together for the purpose of the demonstration, and that its organizers, therefore, had to rely upon the ordinary masses of sightseers who can be got together for any cause, however trivial, in this largest city of the world. A few thousand Irishmen answered to the "whip," and, for the rest, the would-be manufacturers of a sensation had to content themselves with the same materials as are at the disposal of every troupe of street jugglers or every proprietor of a Punch and Judy show. The great majority of the citizens of London, even of the humblest class, are so far from sympathizing with the "victims of the Crimes Act," that they are not even interested in their personalities or histories, and are probably even unacquainted with their names.

THE CAMEL.

"L'ESTOMAC de M. de Cussy n'a jamais bronché"; which we choose to render—the Marquis de Cussy's camel never met with its last straw. It is a famous apologue and an applicable. De Cussy was a notable man enough in his day. It was he who was escorting the Empress Marie Louise back to Vienna when at Parma he heard of Napoleon's escape from Elba. Planting her there, he retraced his steps immediately and found his master back at the Tuileries, where he himself was an excellent prefect of the palace; but, the Hundred Days once over, De Cussy found himself suddenly a pauper, having always managed to combine indifference to his own interests with lavishness to others. This and his charms of manner made him popular, and he possessed that first talent of a born conversationist—a lending ear. But he was a born gourmet, too, and fully acted up to Colnet's line:—

Quand on donne à dîner, on a toujours raison

Great cooks struggled for his kitchen and stayed with him seven years. He gave a dinner once a week, never to more than eleven guests, and it lasted two hours. He cites with approval in his Art Culinaire one of the stories about that very unpleasant person Diogenes who, seeing a child eating too fast, fetched the boy's tutor a rousing cuff. De Cussy's own rigid rule was to eat moderately and to sip his liquors; and he preached putting down the knife and fork while still hungry, and then taking several glasses of an old wine, munching crisp breadcrust the while. Perhaps these were some of the reasons why the camel never refused, and explain his "easily digesting a whole red-legged partridge" on the very day of his death, at the age of seventy-four. Many a well-advised man nowadays would as soon eat Tom Jones's Partridge body and bones; and there have been what a vain world calls nobler deaths, to be sure, and different illustrations of Hamlet's grave dictum that "the readiness is all"; still we need not be too exclusive. This particular gourmet had the smooth-skinned, pink complexion of many an old-fashioned London merchant—in the daytime, that is; but a clever caricature of him by Dantan, which displays the bust of a heavy-chopped, bloated, old gormandizer, with a great Yorkshire pie for pedestal, must also have been but too near the truth, perhaps after dinner; for one of his sayings to Brillat-Savarin, who would have mirrors in his dining-room, was that a man should only look in the glass fasting. After this it would be of no use at all his telling us that he could take up his pen immediately after dinner in full repossession of his ideas, if we did not know from his sorry writings that he could not tack two ideas together, and that, whatever his practice was, his theories about cookery were not worth the charcoal for testing them.

His contemporary, Brillat-Savarin, to cite another of Colnet's lines, "mangeait en glouton et pensait sobrement." It must be a terrible blow to many a young enthusiast, light-heartedly entering his camel for a gourmet's career, when he first discovers that the reputation of Brillat-Savarin is all legend. He was a monstrous eater, and that is all. He kept no table, was a tall, heavy, vulgar sort of man, who went about in old clothes, and was well known as the drum-major of the Court of Appeal. He spoke little, and that little was curt and stupid. Like the parrot, he thought the more, and his posthumous masterpiece astonished none so much as his most intimate friends. Carême's secretary, who had opportunities of knowing, and De Cussy also, say that he gobbled without selection, spoke heavily, when he did speak at table, without any "look" in his eyes, and became absorbed—a nice euphemistic phrase—at the end of a meal. The Encyclopédie des Gens du Monde agrees that he was "thick," and a gourmand without any measure; making one of the nice distinctions between the gourmet (like De Cussy) who is hospitable, and the gourmand (like Brillat-Savarin) who is not. Carême wrote of him, that he never learned how to eat, which is extra hard upon him, for one of his aphorisms is, "L'homme mange; l'homme d'esprit seul sait manger." He liked coarse and vulgar meats, goes on Carême, and literally filled his —camel merely, "I have seen him sleep after dinner!" Dr. Joseph Roques, a great gourmet of the day, gives him the finishing stroke He was very fond of immense meat-pies, solid as a collared head. "They are exquisite," said he one day to the doctor, "you can eat as much as ever you like; and, if you do get a fit of indigestion, why five or six dozen of oysters will allay it. I never take any other remedy myself, and leave tea to weak constitutions." He died at the age of seventy-one, of a chill in the feet, caught at Louis XVIII.'s funeral.

Grimod de la Reynière came of a banking family, and no one had a bad word to say against either his palate or his camel. An accident in early childhood deprived him of both hands, which he replaced by many ingenious contrivances; and he even became a dandy in his youth, frequented the leaders of the Français, and visited Voltaire. He was muscularly strong, and had a strong constitution; eventually developed, let us say, a hump on his camel, and lived to be eighty. "For most people," wrote he in one of his Axioms, "a camel equal to any and every strain is the first requisite for happiness"; and, again, "The great thing is to eat hot, cleanly, long, and much"; and Victor Hugo might have said, "Roasting is at the same time Nothing and Immensity!" He was a charming talker in his best years, but latterly, wrote De Cussy, he got to be commonplace and garrulous about everything. The same Dr. Roques, exclaiming quantum mutatus, said in a sketch of Grimod's old age that > he rang for his servants at nine in the morning, shouting and scolding until he got his vermicelli soup. Soon after he became more tranquil, and began to talk gaily; finally becoming silent, and going to sleep again for some hours. At his waking the complaints began over again; he would fly into rages, groan, weep, and wish he was dead. But, dinner-time come, he ate of every dish, all the time declaring that he would have nothing, for his end was nigh. At dessert his face began to show some animation, his eyebrows lifted, and some light showed from the eyes, deep sunk in their sockets. "How is De C.ssy? Will he live long?" he would ask; "they say he has a fatal ailment. They haven't put him on diet yet, have they? The rains were heavy; we'll have lots of mushrooms in the autumn. The vines are splendid; you must come for the vintage"; and so on, always about gluttony. Then he would grow gradually silent in his great armchair, and the eyes would close. At ten they came for him—he could no longer walk—and put him to bed.

And this was the youngster who, at the age of twenty, was caught by his own father sitting down, lone as the ace of spades, to seven roast turkeys, merely for their "oysters," their "sot-l'y-laisse," as the French say.

"The sole depository of the entire tradition of the State," Talleyrand, even at the age of eighty, ate but one square meal in the day, his dinner; and every morning he required the menu of it from his chef. He would rise at ten, dressing himself even after the hands had got rebellious; and half an hour later would have an egg, a fruit, or a slice of bread-and-butter, a glass of water with a dash of Madeira in it, or perhaps only two or three cups of camomile tea, before beginning "work." No coffee, no chocolate, and "China" tea very rarely. He dined at eight in Paris, at five in the country, well and with appetite; taking soup, fish, and a meat entrée, which was almost always of knuckle of veal, braised mutton cutlets, or a fowl. He would sometimes have a slice off a joint; and he liked eggs and custards, but rarely touched dessert. He always drank a first-rate claret, in which he would put a very little water; a glass of sherry he did not despise, and after dinner a petit-verre of old Malaga. In the drawing-room he would himself fill up a large cup with lumps of sugar, and then the maître d'hôtel—Carême, no less—would add the coffee. Then came forty winks; and afterwards he would play whist for high stakes. His senile eyelids were so swollen that it was a vast effort to open them to any width, and so he often let them close, and "slept" in company that bored him. He still continued to call up a secretary at night, and dictate to him through the closed bed-curtains.

"The eaters of my time," wrote Carême in 1832, "were the Prince de Talleyrand, Murat, Junot, Fontanes, the Emperor Alexander, George IV., and the Marquis de Cussy. Men who know how to eat are as rare as great cooks. Look at the great musicians and physicians," he goes on, with enthusiasm, "they are all gastronomers; witness Rossini and Boïeldieu, Broussais and Joseph Roques." The last-named backed this up in his treatise on Edible Mushrooms, maintaining that doctors who make a name —Corvisart, Broussais, and half a dozen others—are epicures for their patients' sake as well as their own. They can get a convalescent to eat when nobody else can; a fact which explains their success. Modern London, too, we are proud to say, can boast its successful medical gourmets. De Cussy—it is vain to expect an authority from him—said that Leonardo da Vinci, Tintoretto, Paolo Veronese, Baccio Bandinelli, Guido, and Raphael, were all noted gourmands; a fact which has not yet perhaps had its weight in estimating the naïve abstinence of the pre-Raphaelites, who might even have been vegetarians almost to a man, to judge from the type of their landscape-gardening. None of the foregoing great men had the beatitude of dying at table like some of the smaller fry. Dr. Gastaldy, a man with a wit and a palate so often met with in the Almanach des Gourmands, died with a champagne-glass in his hand and a joke in his mouth. Grimod de la Reynière's great-grandfather's death was exactly alike—in a fit of laughter, his lips still wet with Ay. Here is a fact for Mr. Galton; financial instincts, too, were hereditary in this family of farmers-general of the revenue.

Napoleon, as all the world knows, ate very plain food, and little of it, though always with hunger and rapidly. A little claret was all he drank; a single glass of Madeira would flush his whole countenance. He was neither an eater nor a judge of eating, wrote Carême, but he was grateful (was he?) to M. de Talleyrand for the style in which he lived. He differed widely from that poor Stanislas of Poland who fondly studied onion soup in the inn kitchen at Châlons. Napoleon had a strange theory about his bile. There is no personal defect that a man cannot get himself to be vain of, for one reason or another. "Don't you know," said he to the Comte de Ségur, "that every man that's worth anything is bilious? 'Tis the hidden fire. By the help of its excitement I see clear in difficult junctures. It wins me my battles!" Carême himself ate sparingly and drank nothing—a sort of Moses of the Promised Land by choice.

The skeleton Paganini was an appalling glutton, being only beaten in that by Cambacérès. Such men should be objects of pity alone, like the great Athenian chef Archetrastes, who ate enormously and digested with extraordinary rapidity. It could not have been assimilation; for, according to Polybius, he looked as if the wind would blow him away, and one could almost see daylight through him. There is one dear old story that always comes up in talk about great eaters; it has been told of all sorts of guzzlers, from a City alderman to the Judge of Appeal at Avignon, under the ancien régime. "And then, sir, we topped up with a gorgeous turkey, a first-chop bird—never tasted a juicier—melt in the mouth—crammed with truffles to the eyes—bouquet is no word for it—left nothing but the bones." "How many were you?" "Two!" "What! only two?" "Yes. Two. Why not? The turkey and myself."

The woeful extravagance of the past in foraging for the camel often excites surprise amounting even to doubt. For example, when the Duc de Penthièvre went down to preside over the assembly of the States of Brittany, he was heralded by 152 kitchen-men; and the Prince de Condé's cook used up 120 pheasants a week. A dinner presided over once by De Cussy at the Rocher de Cancale cost 4*l.* a head; but, as old Magny told the writer of this, the year before he died, the moderns beat that record easily, for, with carte blanche orders, he had just given a meal to the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris and seven guests, in George Sand's low little room, which came to 1,800 francs, or 9*l.* a head. This went chiefly in primeurs, rarities, and Magny's wonderful wines—"quantity as well as quality," as he himself has said it. Who will say that the Princes of the Church are played out? Magny—may nothing lie heavy on his breast—was a grand old host; intimately interested to the last in every least thing put before you. Like Terré,

> Who'd come and smile before your table
> And hope you liked your Bouillabaisse;

his stout form would heave-to, as it were, and his round, strong, benevolent face would beam on you with a question or two, always to the point. And then, Pepper and Cheesecakes! to hear him row a cook for too much estragon in the tartare. Twelve months after he was gone his "gendre" had reduced the cookery to the greasy category.

Carême had 1,200*l.* a year from Alexander of Russia, and succeeded in disbursing for that potentate a total of 1,000*l.* a week. His accounts were as perfectly cooked as his dishes. "Economy," he wrote, with the lofty lunacy of genius, "is indispensable in our vocation; even the most exquisite and varied table must be logically restrained within exact limits." Economy must here be taken, a commentator might say, in the transcendental sense, as in "political economy," and such like phrases. Carême was proud of his mission—that was the word he chose—and of his literary talents. He kept a real secretary, and latterly turned in 20,000 francs a year by his cookery-books. He was nothing if not epigrammatic. When he was brought in contact with another eccentricity, Lady Morgan, at Baron Rothschild's, "she spoke to me of my works; I spoke to her of hers." He calmly mentions the King of England, his old master, by his Christian name. "I fully believe it, replied George, if Carême manages the table." There is a grandeur about these sayings which almost resembles death, in the levelling of all distinctions.

A gossip on cookery ought to end with something practical. To show we bear no malice towards the Vegetarians, let us take the Poluck's onion soup, at which no "runaway's eyes need wink." Take some crisp, hot, pulled-bread, in small pieces; butter it with the freshest butter; then toast it again well. Fry your onions, cut into dice, in some of the same butter, stirring constantly until they are of a light brown. Then add the pulled-bread, still stirring continuously, until the onions are well browned. Now dash in, still stirring, a little boiling water, to free the onions from the pan; add what seasoning you like, and the necessary quantity of hot-water, and let the whole simmer for a quarter-of-an-hour. Serve it scalding hot, and don't be deluded into putting broth into it instead of water, or the result will be ruinous all round.

TOPSYTURVITIS.

SOME ingenious persons have invented, or at any rate improved upon the fact so as to imagine, a kind of mental disease, in which the sufferer does and says everything in exactly the contrary sense and direction to that which he intends. If, for instance, he wishes to say "Bless you, my children!" he requests his offspring to go to the infernal regions; if he sets out to step westwards, he finds that his feet, like the ship, when it so puzzled Mr. Lewis Carroll's Bellman, "will travel due east," and if he wishes to assure a lady that she is exquisitely handsome, he candidly informs her that she is as ugly as sin. There seems to have been a good deal of this singular plague about during the past week. Even Mr. Punch's young men have caught it in a very odd fashion. That they should have "hit in" with certain notorious throwers of dirt at the police is odd enough, and is probably an example of the plague; but there is a stranger. As everybody knows, a certain "G." has been making a hare of Cardinal Manning not less ruthlessly and much less amiably than Father Tom made a hare of a greater even than the Cardinal. Now, the contrary-witted devil has made Mr. Punch's young man, when he meant to represent the Cardinal transfixed by "G.'s" arrow, represent "G" transfixed by the Cardinal's, though as Heaven and St. Aristotle know there never was one in his Eminence's whole quiver that even scratched "G." This is strange, but still stranger, and in exactly the same kind, was the heading of a note in the Daily News on Wednesday morning. The excellent Daily News has indeed had a series of attacks, for after admitting (D. N. Feb. 7) that the Marriott arrangement if open to some objection is "financially good" it has asked (Feb. 17) "to whom the arrangement is satisfactory?" Why apparently to its financial self. But to the other case. This heading was "The End of a Myth," and it referred to the remarks which Sir Charles Russell had made the night before about Mr. Gladstone and Colonel Dopping. The writer, of course, intended to write the "Confirmation of a True Story," if tricksy sprites had not turned the nib of his pen where the feather should be. But they had not done with him, for in the body of the note much worse symptoms of topsyturvitis (so the Scientific Man has named the disease) appear. First, it seems, Mr. Gladstone "inadvertently" made the original statement on the authority of Professor Stuart. What this means is, that Mr. Gladstone, with elaborate preparation and as an express illustration and example of his theory about evictions, accused Colonel Dopping of pointing a rifle at a child of tender years—a "boy in every sense of the term." Further, says the Daily News, "the alleged fact was of very little public importance," meaning, of course, as Mr. Gladstone meant, that if evictions were habitually conducted by agents who pointed loaded rifles at children, it would be a very serious matter indeed. "Having, however, ascertained that he had been partially misinformed, Mr. Gladstone, being an English gentleman, apologized, and expunged the obnoxious passage from the printed report of his speech." Alas! that the foul fiend should play such tricks with an honest journalist who meant to write, and no doubt thought he did write, something like this—the fact. "Mr. Gladstone, appealed to by the person he had calumniated, returned an evasive and rude answer; but, finding on inquiry that there was not a word of truth in his own statement, being informed by his own legal advisers that his case was awkward, and receiving a second summons, this time from Colonel Dopping's solicitors, he withdrew the passage, and protested solemnly that he never attached to it the only meaning it could possibly bear." This was what the poor man meant to say, and lo! the other was what he did say. "It's like some dèmd horrid dream" one can fancy him exclaiming, if he pursues the perhaps unwise plan of reading his own articles.

And the beauty of the thing is, or rather the horrid skill of the powers of evil is so great, that not only did this hapless Daily News man write exactly the contrary of what he no doubt meant to write about the history of the Dopping case, but he could not even see, or rather, though of course he saw, he could not, being an enchanted and bedevilled Daily News man, write, what Sir Charles Russell himself said. For Sir Charles, though he says that Mr. Gladstone consulted him before Colonel Dopping's solicitors wrote, forgot, in the first place, to mention that Colonel Dopping himself had written, and received a petulant and not in the least apologetic letter from Mr. Gladstone; forgot, in the second, to explain why it was that Mr. Gladstone came to him, a lawyer, to ask him what was the duty of a gentleman who had wrongly accused another gentleman; and forgot, lastly, to mention why Mr. Gladstone, having received this, his own, very judicious advice and determined to act on it, waited till the inferior branch of the profession on the other side gave him a hint before carrying it out. Nor was this all. Sir Charles has the credit of being a clever advocate; but heaven preserve us from such advocacy as one part of his speech! For he admitted that he had himself pointed out to Mr. Gladstone that it really did not matter whether he had used the word "loaded" or not, and that "an inference might unquestionably be drawn from the context that the words conveyed the idea" that the gun was loaded. The phrase is rather circumlocutory; but if it in its turn "conveys any idea," it conveys this—"if you did not mean that Colonel Dopping threatened to shoot the boy, you meant nothing at all." Now, it will be remembered that this is exactly what the persons whom the Daily News calls Mr. Gladstone's low-minded adversaries said. Mr. Gladstone, on the other hand, declared that he had "another meaning," which he has never revealed, though he has been implored to do so, and which Sir Charles Russell by implication confesses to be an impossibility. Instead, therefore, of doing Mr. Gladstone any good, this little attempt at whitewashing by his counsel learned in the law leaves him just a little blacker than before. You don't go and consult a legal friend unless you have a shrewd suspicion that some legal trouble is coming on you, and when the legal friend tells you that, whether you used this particular word or not, the fair inference is that you meant so and so, you most assuredly, unless you are Mr. Gladstone, do not publicly protest that you meant something different, but what neither you nor the legal friend nor anybody else in this wide world can make out. It is quite possible that there may be some people who do not see that the peculiar dinginess of the Dopping affair consisted in this last piece of gratuitous prevarication, much more than in the petulant refusal to come down at first, and the undignified rapidity of the descent afterwards. But we prefer to think it a case of the terrible disease referred to, and not of mere blindness. The poor man meant to write "The Beginning of a Certainty," and he wrote "The End of a Myth."

It may be a variety of the same disease which inspired Mr. George C. Warr with certain marvellous verses which he has published "To the Irish Patriots." Mr. Warr begins:—

> Prisoners, may Hope be with you and enfold
> Your vigil on the patriot's hard bed.

How does Hope enfold a vigil, and what does a vigil look like when it is enfolded? The verses, indeed, dimly suggest the poem which much more cheerfully described how angels not only made the bed of an Irish gentleman, but performed other kindly offices for him; but the expression is inferior. Then Mr. Warr proceeds to talk about

> Law, the fiend with felon eyes and cold.

Now, if this line is intended as an attempt in the style of the immortal Mrs. Brownriggo sonnet of the Anti-Jacobin, it is very good indeed. But, if it is serious—and, as Sir Charles Russell would say, "it is an inference that unquestionably may be fairly drawn from the context that the words convey this idea"—is not this a little strong? It is particularly awkward for another Mr. George C. Warr, a Professor of an institution which describes itself as founded on the principle that "the doctrines and duties of Christianity as taught by the Church of England shall be for ever held and taught," and the senior ex-officio governor whereof is "the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of the United Kingdom." We don't remember that teaching of the Church of England which says that it is one of the doctrines and duties of Christianity to regard Law as a fiend with felon eyes and a cold, and it certainly would be very improper, as well as incongruous, for the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper of the Great Seal to countenance such a regarding of it. Further, Mr. Warr describes poor Law as

"Beshrew thee if thou hast not a felon cold in thy murderous head," quoth the Poet to Law. It next appears that this unpleasant personage and something called "a loud-tongued gaoler overbold" will "not tread too long on Erin's heart." Here there seems a mixture of metaphors. Who ever accused poor Medusa, even in conjunction with a loud-tongued gaoler overbold, of treading on anybody's heart? But the Poet is pardoned a few fine frenzies like this. We are not so sure that Erin will pardon him for his next flight, which assures her that

> Born in gold
> That showers from her Heav'n across the sea
> To her, as was of yore the Gorgon's foe,

&c. &c. Now really, really, Mr. Warr, that myth of Danae has always had a rather ugly possible construction, and Erin, we all know, is the most virtuous of young persons. She never would dream of becoming a mother without the proper ceremonies, or under the persuasion of gold. Besides, we cannot quite get Perseus and Danae, and the American Jove with his dollars, and the two Erins, one of whom has her heart trodden on by the fiend with a cold, and the loud-tongued gaoler, on all fours. But quid dicimus? all fours? Mr. Warr is not on all fours; he ends on a single toe, a most fantastic toe:—

> And he, the Toe,
> (Poor toe, that deals the kicks of Salisbury)
> Will cower at the Nation's final No.

Toe what does this toe point? How does a Toe cower? why should a toe cower at a No? O toe-toe obscure Toe! What a toe-tal eclipse of meaning is here! We feel inclined to break intoe verse ourselves to finish; but the temptation shall be resisted. For, after all, poor Mr. Warr's case—a case of most felon and murderous topsyturvitis—is clear enough. He was thinking of that capital cartoon of Mr. Punch's twenty years ago—the cartoon in which John Bull and Jonathan are making a football of Irish ruffianism, and he meant to celebrate it in song. Alas! the result was quite the contrary.

SELECTION OF SIRES.

BEFORE noticing any details of the great show of stallions at Nottingham, there is one point on which we wish to make a few remarks. Regrets have been expressed at the absence of premiums for breeds of horses other than thoroughbreds. The reply is very simple and obvious. Why did not the complainers furnish the necessary funds to supply premiums for as many breeds of horses as they thought proper? The greater part of the sum producing the different premiums distributed at Nottingham was the gift of one individual, the remainder being made up from the funds of the Royal Agricultural Society and a grant of 1,640*l.* from the Government. Surely this ought to have been an eligible opportunity for beneficence on the part of those who, both by word of mouth and newspaper correspondence, professed themselves so anxious for the improvement of our breeds of horses. Unfortunately it has become the fashion to consider the 3,360*l.* which was formerly given in Queen's Plates and now transferred to the Horse Trustees as a Government grant. It is nothing of the kind. Indeed it is as much a private gift as the doles of coal which many cottagers receive from their landlords at Christmas; but, just as these cottagers are apt to look upon the invariable present as a sort of right when it has been annually received from several generations of donors, so the recipients of the Royal bounty in this case have learnt to regard it as something of their own, for which no kind of thanks or gratitude is due.

One result of the Premiums for sires has been to produce the largest show of thoroughbred stallions that has ever been held in this or any other country. We may add that the attendance of horsey men and women was fully equal to the occasion. It is but fair to acknowledge that much of the success of this great show at Nottingham is to be attributed to the experience derived from the stallion show held last year at Newcastle. More than a hundred stallions were exhibited at Nottingham, and on the whole they were a good-looking lot, although there were many weedy brutes among them. The chief feature—nay, the surprise—of the show was the enormous proportion of horses that were rejected as unsound by the committee of veterinary surgeons. Stallions which had been passed again and again were now objected to by the "vets," among them being one that is said to have been purchased for 1,200 guineas, and passed sound within the last few months. Another had been passed three or four times, and sold for 900 guineas as a stallion. Then there was a horse that had raced all through last season, and been passed sound at the end of it before being bought for 500 guineas; and many, very many, others were pronounced unsound, to the disgust and chagrin of their owners. But what shall be said of Scotland, whose dozen candidates were all rejected? That considerable dissatisfaction would be expressed at the wholesale refusals of the veterinary surgeons was certain, and even many experienced horsemen who had no interest in the disgraced stallions questioned the wisdom of some of the rejections. It is, however, undeniable that the three veterinary surgeons had far better opportunities of judging of the different horses' soundness or unsoundness than had anybody else. This much, at any rate, may be said—that, unless Professor Brown, Sir Henry Simpson, and Mr. George Williams made many and prodigious blunders, an enormous proportion of horses standing as hunters' stallions are unsound, and that some such attempt as the present to assist breeders in finding sound sires was very urgently needed. This becomes the more evident when it is remembered that many country stallions whose owners knew them to be to some extent unsound were probably unentered for the Nottingham show. When all this is taken into consideration, every cause for surprise at the large number of unsound hunters, hacks, and carriage-horses bred in this country disappears.

On the whole, a fair lot of stallions stood the severe veterinary test and were selected for the Premiums. For the ten Eastern counties, including Norfolk and Middlesex, Lion, Pedometer, and Soulouque were chosen. The most admired of the three was Pedometer, a fine, large horse, with plenty of bone, by King Tom out of Miss Peddie by Poynton by Touchstone. He is the sort of horse that ought to get either good hunters or good carriage-horses, according to the class of mares that may be sent to him. For the four English counties north of Yorkshire, Blue Grass, Even, and Moss Hawk were selected, the most popular of the party being Blue Grass, an American-bred horse that was well known on the Turf in his day. Like Pedometer, he has a great deal of bone and power, and he is a free mover into the bargain. He has filled out very much since he was unsuccessful at Newcastle last year, and, as he is a young sire, he ought to have a useful career before him. It may be remembered that he beat Ossian, the winner of the St. Leger of his year, at 5 lbs. at Goodwood, and he trained on till he was six years old, a good proof of soundness and strength of constitution. One of his last races was over a three-mile course, for the Alexandra Plate of 960*l.* at Ascot, which he won by forty lengths from the notorious stayer Althorp. Even, by Quits, out of a Carnival mare, and Moss Hawk, by Blair Athol, were not quite so much liked. The horses chosen among the stallions for the ten Southern counties, from Cornwall to Kent, were Aerides, Huguenot, and Westburton. The first of the trio is probably the best, and he is by Cremorne. Huguenot is by Lowlander, who was just the sort of horse to breed fine hunter-getting sires. Westburton, by Reverberation, has a good deal of bone, but some critics took exception to his shoulders. Among the Yorkshire stallions the chosen three were Escamillo, Linnæus, and Jarnac. It was generally considered that Escamillo was the best of these. He is by Pero Gomez, out of Bonny May, by Newminster, so his breeding is good enough even for that most horsey of horsey counties. He ran a good many times on the Turf without displaying any remarkable brilliancy. Linnæus, who is seventeen years old, is one of the many greys got by Strathconan, and his dam was by Voltigeur. Jarnac is older still, being of the venerable age of twenty-one. The horses chosen for a district including some thirteen counties between Warwick and Pembroke are Q.C. and Scherzo. The former is a five-year-old colt by Wisdom, out of Brenta. As a two-year-old he won a Nursery Handicap at Brighton, and after that he never won a race, although he ran both as a three-year-old and a four-year-old. Scherzo, by Galopin, is another five-year-old. He was only kept in training for a couple of years, and in the second of those he ran a dozen times between March and October, winning two races, one of which was the Kempton Park Grand Prize of 837*l.* He is a horse of great size and power. Cheshire, Lancashire, and North Wales are to be represented by Prescription and Suleiman. The first-named was liked by some people on account of his size; others thought him "coachy," and wanting in muscle. Suleiman, who is eighteen, is by Knight of the Crescent out of an Orlando mare. He also is a big one, and we may observe here that, in our opinion, the judges are to be congratulated on having, as a rule, given the Premiums to large horses. Many country stallions are small, and so also are a good proportion of farmers' mares; the consequence is that in some districts a number of horses are bred that are only high enough for hacks, ladies' horses, or park-phaeton horses, while those which are tall enough for hunters or carriage-horses have only sufficient bone to carry ten or eleven stone. Five prizes of values equal to those of the Queen's Premiums were allotted by the Royal Agricultural Society to stallions in Nottinghamshire and five adjoining counties. Jack Tar, Khamseen, Lancastrian, Silver Crown, and Tiber were the winners of these. Khamseen, by Favonius, has the advantage of both size and quality. He ran often and won several races on the flat, and when his career on the Turf was ended he became a very fair steeplechaser. Lancastrian was also a tolerable race-horse, and a stayer into the bargain. Silver Crown was greatly admired. It will be remembered that he beat a field of eighteen horses for the Crawfurd Plate of 700*l.* at Newmarket.

The very responsible task of judging was delegated to Lord Arthur Somerset, Mr. Robert Howard, of Temple Bruer, Grantham, and Mr. J. L. Napper, of Loughcrew, Oldcastle, Ireland. Their labours were considerably lightened through the clearance effected by the veterinary surgeons. There were many complaints among the spectators at the slowness of the judging. This was unfair. Judges ought on no consideration to be hurried, and onlookers should have remembered that the adjudicators were employed solely to decide as to the distribution of the Premiums, and not with a view to the entertainment of the public. The veterinary surgeons were Professor Brown, Sir Henry Simpson, President of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, late Mayor of Windsor, and knighted in the year of the Queen's Jubilee, and Mr. Williams. That they have incurred a certain amount of odium by their wholesale rejection of unsound stallions is probable enough. Disinterested people, however, ought to give them due honour for the courage with which they discharged what they believed to be their duty, at the risk of loss of popularity and possibly practice as well. Their task was an exceedingly unpleasant and thankless one. It has been suggested by an authority of great experience and high position that a six-year-old horse, passed sound by a board of veterinary surgeons, on leaving a training stable should be granted a certificate rendering him free from liability to further veterinary examination, so far as stallion shows are concerned, for the rest of his life. We should hesitate before condemning a proposition made by so able a judge; at the same time it strikes us that a horse might develop an hereditary infirmity, such as broken wind, after he had attained the age of six. It is objected, again, that if so many stallions are to be pronounced unsound at the competitions for the Queen's Premiums, owners may take alarm and refuse to send their horses, lest they should leave the show with the fatal stigma of unsoundness upon them. We cannot see that this should influence the Royal Commissioners, the judges, or the Board of Veterinary Surgeons in the least degree. It is either a sine quâ non that the selected stallions should be sound or it is not, and in the former case nothing should induce the authorities to pass any but sound horses. The improvement of our breed of horses ought to be the one object aimed at. The question of the success or failure of the shows should in no way hamper the action of the Royal Commissioners or their agents. Another suggestion has been made to the effect that the services of the successful stallions should be confined to mares which are bonâ fide the property of tenant-farmers. This sounds very plausible, and may be worthy of consideration; but, even if landlords and others are made to pay a higher fee, they ought on no account to be debarred from sending mares to the selected stallions. As far as we understand the principle on which the Queen's Premiums have been instituted, their sole object is the improvement of our breed of horses. The welfare of our farmers, much as it is to be desired, is another matter altogether.

THE "ZALINSKI" GUN.

THE dynamite pneumatic gun is the latest addition to the already long list of implements for the utilization in warfare of dynamite, gun-cotton, blasting gelatine, or any of the other various nitro-compounds known as high explosives. This weapon, like the automatic quick-firing gun, the controllable torpedo—on which so much money was recently expended—the submarine vessels with which, it is rumoured, we are to be provided within measurable time, belongs to that category popularly talked about as "weapons of the future"—an expression which may be taken to mean that, with the most admirable potentialities for destruction, they are open to great and rapid improvement. Indeed, pneumatic ordnance already possesses some of the characteristics of the ideally perfect artillery. Its action is noiseless, and unattended with any of the disadvantages of tell-tale flash and smoke. There is no recoil, on the one hand, and, on the other, the extreme lightness of its construction renders it especially adaptable to the disappearing carriage system, and admits of a minimum of hands for its service. The destructive power of its projectile—practically equivalent to a torpedo, hence its popular name of torpedo-shell—is perfectly terrific, and exerts itself over a wide area.

"The moral effect," as Captain Haig remarked in his recent lecture at the United Service Institution, "of shells falling noiselessly from the sky, fired by an unseen foe, with no report or smoke to indicate the point of their departure, must be appalling, especially when it is known that, should one fall anywhere near the ship, she is in all probability doomed." With all these qualities, however, the "pneumatic dynamite gun" is still in its infancy, and suffers from an important defect for an artillery weapon—shortness of range. Whilst a confident faith is professed in the possibility of achieving more satisfactory results, the greatest range hitherto obtained by the experimenters of the new weapon has not exceeded three thousand yards. But, even pending the promised development, it is undoubtedly capable of the most telling effect against armour, and should be compared, not with long-range or battering weapons, but with implements of the torpedo class whose power is due, not to the force of impact, but to the blasting power of their charge. Moreover, notwithstanding repeated assertions that shells filled with some of the higher explosives can be successfully fired from ordinary guns, it remains a fact that, whenever experiments have been carried on on an exhaustive scale with projectiles so charged, the danger of premature explosion has palpably asserted itself. Such was the case with the German Hellhofite, with the French Melinite, with the American Dynamite shells. The pneumatic system is undoubtedly the only one thus far devised with which anybody would venture to fire, for instance, a shell loaded with 600 lbs. of blasting gelatine.

The special characteristics of the torpedo-shell are essentially adapted to the purpose of coast defence, and it must be noted that the two Powers which at the present time happen to pay most attention to the protection of their coast line, the United States and Italy, have adopted the new invention. There is just now a certain amount of stir in military quarters on the subject of coast defence, and, notwithstanding Admiral Colomb's rather paradoxical opinion that the danger of England being attacked on her coast line is still extremely remote, it is to be hoped that an invention capable of achieving such results as the experiments in New York harbour displayed will attract more than passing attention. As Colonel Brackenbury remarked during the discussion which followed Captain Haig's lecture, there are not sufficient experiments in warlike matters carried on in this country.

WAGNER OPERA IN NEW YORK.

THE most potent element in the development of musical taste in the United States at the present time is the Metropolitan Opera House. Since that institution began its series of performances of German opera the increase of interest in the highest class of music has been very much more rapid than it was before. Before this the American public frequently heard such parts of the Wagner music dramas as could be properly given at orchestral concerts, and occasionally scenes were sung on the concert stage. Lohengrin and the Flying Dutchman were sometimes presented in a slipshod and unappreciative style by companies of Italian singers. Even Die Walküre was once butchered at the Academy of Music by the ill-fated company of which Mme. Pappenheim and Mr. Charles Adams were the bright particular stars. Through these various presentations of Wagner's work, or rather in spite of them, an anxiety to know more of the productions of the genius of Baireuth was created. When Die Walküre was finally produced in a tolerably effective manner four years ago, under the direction of the late Dr. Leopold Damrosch, it was a revelation to the Americans, and the impression made by it was profound.

Wagner has met with the usual opposition in America, where the principal patrons of opera have been in the habit of expecting and receiving amusement, not edification. But Mr. Edmund Stanton, who succeeded Dr. Damrosch as director of the opera, found that the works which in the long run were most profitable were those of Wagner. Fidelio alone has been able to dispute the palm with them. This important fact evidently led to the decision that the Nibelungen trilogy should be the central novelty of the season just closed. The forces of the Opera House have been hard put to it this winter. In fourteen weeks thirteen operas have been produced, of which five were novelties. These five were Nessler's Der Trompeter von Säkkingen, Spontini's Ferdinand Cortez, Weber's Euryanthe, and Wagner's Siegfried and Die Götterdämmerung. The first two were not successful. Siegfried was the third opera of the season, following on the heels of Tristan und Isolde and Die Meistersinger. It was given a number of times to large audiences. Die Götterdämmerung was produced a week before the trilogy was presented, and received two preparatory performances; while Die Walküre was sung once.

The characteristic omission of Das Rheingold was commented on by the American critics, but with by no means sufficient severity. The New York Times spoke of the production of the "trilogy" as acephalous. The difficulty which lay in the way of giving the first work of the series was a bad stage. The Metropolitan Opera House was constructed with a view to Italian opera, and was not furnished with the mechanical facilities necessary for the presentation of Wagner's spectacular effects. This deficiency has been made apparent in the present performances, the final scene of Die Götterdämmerung being sadly injured by the poverty of its scenic attire. It is the intention of the director of the opera to produce Das Rheingold next year after making the requisite alterations in the stage. The complete tetralogy will then be given. The present production, however, is an important achievement for a young opera-house in a country where a high order of music was slow in gaining a foothold.

The defects of the performances were unhappily numerous. First of all were those of the scenic department, and in this the mismanagement of light effects was most noticeable. American theatres are sadly behind those of Europe in this matter. Indeed, some of the "gas effects" in New York places of amusement are absurd, and nearly all of them are so arranged as to utterly destroy, instead of heightening, the illusions of the stage. In the first act of Die Walküre at the Metropolitan Opera House, the opening of the doors of Hunding's house and the revelation of the spring night were very badly done. The moonlight came from no less than three different directions; and that part of it which fell upon the faces of Siegmund and Sieglinde passed apparently through the roof of the house, where no opening had been made. On the other hand, the lighting up of the hilt of the sword in the trees, accomplished by means of a red electric light concealed just below the weapon, was admirable in appearance. In the second act of the same opera the combat between Siegmund and Hunding, carried on in a glare of white light behind a badly arranged gauze drop, was devoid of any aspect of mystery or tragedy. In the last act of the drama the flight of the Valkyries through the air was represented by luminous pictures thrown upon a drop scene by a stereopticon. The result was that, as the Valkyries moved across the sky from one side of the stage to the other they became sadly distorted as the angles of projection changed. The rising of the fire, accompanied by dense clouds of steam, around the sleeping Brünnhilde was well managed.

In Siegfried the stage pictures of the first act were excellent. The anvil rang beneath Siegfried's blows; the ruddy glow of the fire lighted his features; the forge was complete in every detail; the sparks flew commendably when he wielded the hammer, and the anvil with its oak pedestal was handsomely split to the ground by the grand stroke of the magic sword. The dragon in the second act was absurd. It was a preposterous-looking beast, and made the audience laugh. Its movements were awkward, and altogether it destroyed the design of the author. Everything in the last act was tolerable, save the painted curtain of fire, which was raised from below at the change of scenes. It was an execrable contrivance, badly painted, and destructive of all illusion.

In Die Götterdämmerung the scenery was acceptable, but by no means great. The Hall of the Gibichungs was painted in Vienna, and was a good piece of work. The break of day on the banks of the Rhine was not quite true to nature, but it was theatrically effective, and may be set down as a successful bit of stage art. The last act was ruined by the final scene. A picture of Brünnhilde, bare-legged, mounted on her steed, and bearing the body of Siegfried to some place not mentioned in Norse mythology, was projected on a drop by a stereopticon. Walhalla was seen on fire, while Wotan, wearing for some unaccountable reason his wanderer's hat, stood in front of the castle, surrounded by his family. The Rhine did not rise with good effect, and Hagen entered the waters as calmly as if he were taking a bath. Coming, as all this does, after the noble scene of Brünnhilde's immolation, the effect of anti-climax was produced.

On the other hand, in the labours of the artists engaged in the performances there was much to commend. The greatest success was achieved by Mlle. Lilli Lehmann as Brünnhilde. Her conception of the part was apparently the result of a careful study, not only of Wagner, but of the sources from which he derived his material. This was manifested in the gentle solemnity of her scene with Siegmund in Die Walküre, where she conveyed truthfully the idea of impending doom. Nor did she in the anguish of the last act diminish the heroic proportions of her embodiment. In the awakening in Siegfried she retained the nobility of her demeanour, but with exquisite art delineated the development of human passion in her bosom. In Die Götterdämmerung she was all woman. The first scene showed her a dependent, loving creature, absorbed in her pride of her husband. In the great scene before the hall of Gunther she presented an impersonation filled full with passion. Her immolation scene was a noble piece of acting, and stamped her as one of the best of dramatic sopranos. Vocally she was worthy of high praise. She has of late acquired one or two minor faults of method, but these were obscured by the vigour and earnestness of her work. Taken as a whole, her labours deserved the high commendation awarded them by the American press and the applause bestowed by the audiences.

Herr Niemann was the leading male singer employed in the production. It is a matter for wonder rather than congratulation that he should be on the stage at something like the age of sixty. His voice is not gone, strange as it may seem; for he is still able to touch all the notes set down in the score. The quality of the sounds which he produces, however, is usually distressing. He is compelled to constantly force his voice in a painful manner, and many of his notes are utterly without musical character. It seems as if a singer of this sort would be intolerable, and he would be were it not for the fact that his acting goes so far to atone for his other work. He appeared as Siegmund in Die Walküre, and again as Siegfried in Die Götterdämmerung. He was the original Siegmund at Baireuth in 1876, and it was owing to the reputation as a Wagner singer acquired by him at that time that he was engaged at the Metropolitan Opera House. His acting as Siegmund was admirable in spirit and execution; but he achieved greater success as Siegfried through the notable excellence of his death-scene. He conveyed to the audience in a most striking manner the operation of Siegfried's mind in recalling Brünnhilde, and gave a remarkable exposition of the emotions of the soul in which memory had been awakened. His dying speech was delivered with touching sincerity, and the whole episode was moving.

In the second drama, Siegfried, Herr Alvary appeared as the young hero. This young tenor, who was not successful on his first appearance in America, is improving rapidly. His intonation is now generally correct, the quality of his voice is far more agreeable, and his acting is gaining in significance. His Siegfried was buoyant of spirit and by far the best work he had done. He was alive with the enthusiasm and freshness of youth, and presented a fine appearance of manly energy and courage. There was a brightness, a wholesome vivacity about his acting that was in keeping with the design of the author, and made his impersonation pictorially delightful. He sang the music with a good quality and power of voice, and generally with commendable expression.

Herr Fischer was the Wotan of the series. Next to Mlle. Lehmann he was the most artistic singer engaged in the representations. His voice is rich and full, though not powerful, and his method better than that of the average German singer. In appearance he was dignified, but there were occasions when his acting betrayed too much of his natural good humour, which was so delightful in his Hans Sachs. He also sang Hagen. Herr Ferenzy appeared as Mime early in the season, but illness incapacitated him, and his place in the trilogy was taken by Herr Kemlitz, whose performance was wholly unsatisfactory. His conception of the rôle was borrowed from his predecessor, who had a respectable notion of acting, but he had not the ability for the execution. In singing he was wretched. The other characters in the three dramas were assumed by Fräulein Brandt (Fricka, Waltraute, Erda, and Flosshilde), Frau Seidl-Kraus (Sieglinde, the bird voice, and Gutrune), Frauen Meisslinger and Traubman (Woglinde and Willgunde and two of the Valkyrs), Herr Robinson (Gunther), Herr von Milde (Alberich), and Herr Elmblad (Fafner and Hunding). Herr Elmblad was tolerably good as the wild worm. Frau Seidl-Kraus was not equal to the demands of any of her parts, being a mediocre singer and an exceedingly feeble actress. Fräulein Brandt, whose voice is much worn, was only tolerable.

Herr Anton Seidl conducted the performances, and deserves warm praise for his work. The orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House is not composed of the best material in New York, nor is it properly balanced, the strings being too few. The score of Die Götterdämmerung calls for thirty-two violins, but at the Metropolitan there were not more than twenty-two. Two of the tenor tubas called for by the composer, four of the horns, and the bass trumpet were not employed; but still the brass held too great a balance of power. Nevertheless, the beauties of the scores of the three works were notably revealed under Herr Seidl's direction, and he overcame many difficulties with great patience and judgment. The ride of the Valkyries and their chorus was given with splendid energy; and the chorus of the vassals in Die Götterdämmerung was full of power. The Siegfried death-music, though deprived to a great extent of the proper stage display, was finely performed.

In spite of many defects, the presentation of the three operas of the trilogy was commendable. There can be no doubt that it will have a marked effect in stimulating the spread of musical taste in America. During the performances large numbers of persons from Boston, Worcester, Buffalo, Baltimore, Cincinnati, and other musical cities journeyed to New York to hear the Wagner dramas. The Opera House was crowded at each representation, and the principal artists were called before the curtain half a dozen times at the close of each act.

SIR SIMON AND SIR WILLIAM.

ONE of the latest utterances attributed, apparently on good authority, to Lord Beaconsfield is that he had invented a phrase for Sir William Harcourt. What it was he did not disclose. He died, and made no sign. He carried the secret with him to the grave, unless perchance it should be discovered when his literary remains are investigated. What would not one give for it? Whole volumes of Hansard would be cheaply exchanged for this perished sentence. The lost plays of Menander, the missing books of Livy, the unreported speeches of Lord Bolingbroke—all the sunken treasures of literature and time do not excite for the moment a keener regret than Lord Beaconsfield's silence, now incapable of being broken. We have got accustomed to the loss of these things, and do reasonably well without them; but the pang of knowing that Lord Beaconsfield had a description of Sir William Harcourt, and that it was not allowed to pass the bulwark of his teeth, is fresh and keen. We should have understood Sir William Harcourt the better for it, and one man's wit would have made a contribution, though not, indeed, upon a very important matter, to all the world's wisdom. No one, probably, regrets more profoundly this undiscoverable secret than Sir William Harcourt himself. It has left him the heir of unfulfilled renown. His chief title to fame has departed. If Lord Beaconsfield had spoken, Sir William Harcourt would have taken his place in that gallery of contemporary portraits which includes the arch mediocrity, the superior person, the great middle-man, the rhetorical sophist intoxicated with the exuberance of his own verbosity, and others less important, who have acquired such fame as belongs to the poetasters and criticasters pilloried in the Dunciad, though some of them, as was the case also with Pope's victims, have titles to remembrance independently of the satirist's tribute to them. Sir William Harcourt is not very likely to be long remembered on his own account. His speeches, though lively contributions to present contests, will scarcely rank among the eternal possessions of his countrymen. We must be content to deal with Sir William Harcourt as we ourselves can see him, and to relinquish as cheerfully as may be the inestimable advantage of seeing him through the eyes of Lord Beaconsfield.

Sir William Harcourt made during the recess many contributions to the better popular knowledge of him, and since the Session opened he has thrown additional light upon himself. Sir William Harcourt is abundantly endowed with the sense of humour; but he himself is a greater joke than any he has ever made. He is most amusing when he is most serious, or rather when he affects an air of seriousness. His gravity is more piquant than his persiflage. He never perpetrated a practical joke with a more solemn countenance than when he stood up in the House of Commons on Monday and assumed to overrule by his solitary authority the concurrent opinion of Sir Henry James and the Attorney- and Solicitor-General upon a legal question. To rely upon his judgment against theirs upon any point of law is as reasonable as it would be to quote the Comic Blackstone of the late Mr. Gilbert à Beckett against the Blackstone of Mr. Serjeant Stephens or any authorized commentator. A Foreign Minister not now in office once emitted the dictum that knowledge was practically a knowledge of references. A man, he argued, might fairly be said to know a thing if he knew where to find it. It was sufficient to possess that learning of the index "which turns no student pale, yet holds the eel of science by the tail." Unfortunately, some knowledge of the thing is required in order to know where to find it, and to know, further, whether you have found it or not; otherwise you may possibly produce as the thing itself quite another and different thing. Sir William Harcourt is as dexterous as any one can well be in offering brass for gold, and no doubt he sometimes honestly mistakes the inferior substance, which he possesses in abundance, for the more precious metal.

It is interesting, under the light of the new doctrine of heredity, to trace the persistence of family qualities in distant members of the same house. If there were time for it, and if it were worth while, an interesting parallel, for which Lord Campbell's Lives of the Lord Chancellors supplies abundant material, might be instituted between Sir William Harcourt and the most distinguished of his ancestors. The faculty for making a little law go a long way was possessed in an eminent degree by the first Lord Harcourt, of whom Lord Campbell says that he had "at least learned where the law on different subjects was to be found, so that, as the occasion required, he could get up an argument well upon any question pro re nata, and appear more learned than others, who had laid in a larger stock of law, over which they had less command." Sir William Harcourt does not perhaps possess this equivocal gift in the full degree in which Sir Simon Harcourt had it; but he has a very considerable power of dressing up ignorance in the garb of knowledge. Like his ancestor, he is an effective orator and well enough versed in literature; but the parallelism between Sir Simon and Sir William naturally fails in some points. Sir William, in spite of his strong sense of personal fitness and hereditary appropriateness, failed to persuade Mr. Gladstone that he would be the best of all possible Lord Chancellors. He was not, it would seem, the destined heir in his soft cradle to his great-great-grandfather's chair. In other particulars, too, it would be improper to insist upon a resemblance. Swift, in his poem called the Fagot, apostrophizes Sir Simon in the words, "Come, trimming Harcourt." Who would venture to couple this adjective with Sir William Harcourt's name? Mr. Speaker Onslow described Sir Simon as "a man very able, but without shame." Mr. Speaker Peel, we are sure, has never said, and never will say, anything like this of Sir William. Sir Simon Harcourt was more than suspected in the dynastic contests of the time of being secretly on the side of King James while he ostensibly served King William. Our controversies now are happily not dynastic; and no one will venture to accuse Sir William Harcourt of being one in heart with any political James while he serves as the lieutenant of any political William. Sir Simon Harcourt's loyalty to his chief was held in some doubt. A correspondent of Swift's, describing an interview with Harley, then Lord Treasurer, says, "the great attorney Harcourt kissed him at parting, and cursed him at heart." "They eat and drink and walk together, as if there were no sort of disagreement; and when they part, I hear they give each other such names as none but Ministers of State could bear without cutting throats." Sir William Harcourt is quite incapable of the Judas kiss of Sir Simon. He has boasted that his loyalty to his chief is his only claim to public esteem; and as we do not know of any other, it would be unfair to throw doubt upon this.

THE BANK OF FRANCE.

THE Bank of France concession will expire at the end of 1897—that is, in a little less than ten years—and already an active agitation has been got up hostile to the Bank. It is not very clear what the agitators want. They contend that the privileges of the Bank are too great, and that the return it makes to the State is too small, and they ask, therefore, that an inquiry should be instituted, and a very great change made if the concession is renewed. The agitators almost all belong to the Radical party, and perhaps they are actuated largely by political feeling. Not only in Paris, but at all the branches, there are Boards of Directors, and the Boards consist of the leading commercial men of the place. Practically, therefore, the whole of these Boards form a kind of commercial aristocracy in France. At the same time, the connexion of these various Boards one with another forms a very powerful body; and it is urged that the influence they wield is injurious to the State. While the agitation has been going on there has been a very considerable fall in the shares of the Bank. They stood at nearly 350 per cent. premium, and they have fallen fully 20*l.* per share in the course of a few months. The fall is believed to be entirely speculative. The shares of the Bank of France are allowed to be held by trustees, and consequently it is believed that the vast majority of the shares are in the possession of trustees and of quiet investors who are not likely to be alarmed by the present preliminary agitation. Whether there is any connexion between the speculation for the fall and the political agitation we do not pretend to say; but it is not uncharitable to assume that, even if the political agitators are entirely innocent, they may have been prompted by persons interested in bringing down the price of the shares in the hope that they may be able to buy them more cheaply than they had sold them. A speculation of the kind would seem very rash, for shares which are held so well as those of the Bank of France are supposed to be are not likely to be sold in very large quantities. Therefore, if speculators have largely sold what they do not possess, they may sooner or later be called upon to deliver the shares, and they can fulfil their contracts only by offering so high a price as will tempt holders to sell. Whether the speculators win or lose, however, is a matter of slight concern to the foreign public; what is of real interest is the political agitation and its probable result. The result does not seem likely to be great. As stated above, the concession has yet to run nearly ten years, and in ten years much may happen; so much, indeed, that the concession to the Bank of France may be completely cast in the shade. If war should break out, the Bank of France will be necessary to the French Government, and will doubtless then take care to have its concession renewed. If peace is maintained and the Moderate Party remains in power, Moderate Republicans will not risk making enemies of the monied classes by acting hostilely to the Bank of France. And even if the Radical party should gain the ascendency, it is not easy to see how they can very materially modify the existing concession.

Theoretically, there are undoubtedly strong objections to the giving of a great monopoly to a single bank. If the ground were completely clear, no doubt it would be much better to have a number of powerful institutions discharging the functions of the Bank of France than to have one single great corporation. The Bank of France, for example, has a monopoly of note-issuing in France. It would be much better either that the Government should reserve to itself the right of issuing notes, just as it reserves the right of issuing coin, or else that all banks fulfilling certain conditions should be free to issue notes if the public will accept them. But it is extremely difficult, under all circumstances, to undo accomplished facts, and in nothing is it more difficult than in the domain of finance. The Bank of France exists; it has branches in every town of any importance in the country; it has agencies even where branches would not pay; it is administered most ably; no institution in the world enjoys higher credit, for even during the war with Germany its notes fell to only a slight discount. It does an immense business; indeed, it plays a far larger part in the commercial life of France than does the Bank of England with ourselves. To a large extent it may be said to be the bank of the poor man. The bills which it discounts average only a few pounds—if we remember rightly, 12*l.* or 16*l.* in amount—showing that small shopkeepers, peasants, and other people deal very largely indeed with the Bank of France, and the notes of the Bank are held in the remotest corners of the country. It is almost inconceivable that an institution so ably managed, so firmly established, and enjoying so highly the confidence of France can be interfered with. Of course the Bank will shrink from a direct quarrel with the Government, supposing the Government were to try to impose unfavourable conditions; that is to say, the Bank will do much rather than lose its privileged position; but, on the other hand, the Bank is a commercial institution. Its raison d'être is to make profits; and, if an attempt is made to force upon it unprofitable conditions, it may refuse to accept the concession. Even then its position would perhaps be as strong as that of any bank in the world, and in all probability it would be far stronger for years to come than any State bank that could be set up in opposition to it. If the Bank were unable to come to terms with the Government and the concession were refused, the first result would be that the existing note issue would have to be called in and paid off. The Bank would have lost its right to issue notes; and, as those notes are only promises to pay, they would have to be honoured. As a matter of course, a notification would be issued requiring all notes to be presented for encashment within a certain time. The banknote circulation at present is a little over 110½ millions sterling. In times of inflation it has been much larger; but, while the political condition of the Continent remains such as it is, inflation does not seem probable. Assuming, then, that the circulation remained about this figure, the Bank would have to provide 110½ millions sterling to call in and pay off its notes. Against this liability, however, the Bank holds at the present time somewhat over 92 millions sterling in coin and bullion; it holds also somewhat over 24 millions sterling in bills which it has discounted and securities upon which it has lent; and, lastly, it has lent to the Government nearly six millions sterling. In actual cash, therefore, or in securities readily realizable, the Bank holds at the present time nearly 122 millions sterling, against the 110½ millions sterling liability upon its notes. Without serious inconvenience to itself, therefore, it could pay off the notes within a stipulated time. Of the coin and bullion held by the Bank, a little under 44½ millions sterling are in gold and a little over 47½ millions sterling are in silver. Now, our readers will recollect that both silver and gold are legal tender in France. Naturally, therefore, the Bank would cash its notes entirely in silver. The 47½ millions sterling and a little over which it holds in silver would be paid out to the holders of the notes, and the 44½ millions sterling in gold would be sent abroad and sold, silver being bought against it, and used in paying off its notes. Thus by exchanging gold for silver in redeeming its notes, the Bank would make a very handsome profit. On the other hand, France would be flooded with silver, and she would be almost entirely drained of gold. It will be seen, therefore, that the Bank has a very formidable weapon in any struggle that may be forced upon it. Practically it can say to the Government that, if compelled, it is ready to pay off its notes, and that it will leave France without a gold reserve. Our readers know how great is the importance attached by all commercial countries to the possession of a gold reserve, and how formidable, therefore, would be such a threat. At the present time more particularly, when the political condition of the Continent is so uncertain, France can least of all afford to part with its gold reserve; and as has just been pointed out the gold reserve held by the Bank of France is immense. It is about double the stock of gold held by the Bank of England, and it is larger than any accumulation of gold held by any Government or institution in the world—the Treasury of the United States alone excepted.

Supposing, what is extremely improbable, that a conflict is forced upon the Bank of France, and that it threatens to refuse a modified concession, while adopting the course we have just indicated, it would be in the power of the Government, it is true, to legislate adversely to the Bank. It might, for example, forbid the Bank to pay its notes in silver; but it is scarcely conceivable that any Government that may be established in France would adopt such a policy. The Bank, as we have seen, holds over 47½ millions sterling in silver. It has accumulated that vast stock of the metal on the faith of the law making silver legal tender equally with gold, and to forbid the Bank to use in paying its liabilities coin and bullion which it had itself paid value for would be an unheard-of invasion of private rights. It is true that the oppression might be covered by a general demonetization of silver, but that is too big a measure to be adopted merely to coerce the Bank of France. Practically the Government would have no means of preventing the Bank from adopting the course sketched above. It is, we need hardly say, extremely improbable either that the Government would take up such an attitude as would compel the Bank to refuse a renewal of the concession, or that the Bank will prove so unmanageable that it will be obliged to drain France of the whole of its gold. Either, as said above, the concession will be renewed without question, or it will be modified in a fair and reasonable manner to all parties. The Bank, in fact, is the centre of the commercial organization of France. Anything done hostile to it would shake credit to its very centre, would alarm the rural as well as the urban population, and would cause widespread suffering and loss. On its side, the Bank will be eager to avoid strained relations with the Government, and doubtless if it is thought reasonable that the Bank should pay more than it does at present for the monopoly it possesses, the directors will offer no serious resistance. It is the Bank of the State; it is largely under the influence of the Government; its privileged position gives it an advantage over all competitors, which is indirectly, as well as directly, of immense pecuniary value; and the directors under all régimes throughout the past have been so fully sensible of all this that they have been ready to assist the Government of the day in every way possible. In the future they will no doubt be actuated by the same motives as in the past, and therefore we are rather inclined to think that the present agitation will die away; but unquestionably it is more serious than in some quarters it is represented to be. The prominence in the agitation of some of the Radical newspapers and of some of the Radical leaders has perhaps obscured its real importance; undoubtedly the whole commercial community feels a strong interest in the questions that have been raised. The Chambers of Commerce have applied to leading firms in the City for information concerning the Bank of England and its relations with the Government; and, on the other hand, amongst bankers here at home there is a strong interest felt in the issues that have been raised.

THE ANATOMY OF ACTING.

IN the February number of Longman's Magazine Mr. William Archer continues his rather purposeless investigation of the feelings of actors upon the stage. Throughout, as we read his essay, a trivial sentence from Miss Edgeworth's Frank keeps ringing in our ears—"And good little Frank believed him." The fallacy of Mr. Archer's system is contained in a sentence towards the end of his article, when, after quoting an actor's description of his feelings, he adds, "and he, of course, should be the best authority on this point." There are two reasons why this statement is open to question. In the first place, an actor, as a rule, knows neither the effects he is producing nor the methods by which he produces them so well as a skilled onlooker; and, in the second, he is, as a rule, too much prejudiced by various considerations to truthfully describe his method when he knows that his description is to be given to the world. The actor knows well that the illusion with which it is his business to deceive and entertain the public will be infinitely more complete if he can persuade them beforehand that he is actually experiencing the emotions which he has to display. Accordingly, in nine cases out of ten, he has sufficient professional discretion to assure Mr. Archer that he suffers when he weeps stage tears and that he is exhilarated when he makes stage laughter. "And good little Frank believes him." Mr. Archer might just as well accept as an established fact the conjurer's assurance that "he has nothing up his sleeves," or a clown's that "he didn't do it—upon his honour." But, however valueless the result, we find no fault with Mr. Archer for collecting these rather untrustworthy statistics, any more than we should blame him for collecting foreign postage stamps if it amused him to do so.

But, considering the peculiar temperament of the class to which he addressed himself for information, we are sorry that he should not have shown more editorial forbearance in the selection of answers which he publishes this month. His Question 2—"When Macready played Virginius after burying his loved daughter, he confessed that his real experience gave a new force to his acting in the most pathetic situations of the play. Have you any analogous experience to relate? and what was the effect upon the audience?"—is one to which we should have thought no one with much delicacy of feeling would have wished to reply; at all events, in detail or with personal illustrations. But so great is the actor's craving to talk about himself, and still more (when he possesses that accomplishment) to write about himself, that when the opportunity is offered to him he throws off all sentimental reserve, and glibly and elaborately describes how the death of some near relation has affected his acting. Surely it would have been kinder to the writers if Mr. Archer had suppressed such tasteless performances as these. At all events, he might have been sufficiently gallant to have destroyed or rather to have locked up in a jewelled casket and reverently buried the rather jarringly-worded contributions of some of his lady correspondents—ladies whose genius is so delightful and so highly appreciated—on the stage, that we regret that it should ever be allowed to risk tiring or over-straining itself in other fields. We are surprised that Mr. Archer, who is usually so conscientious in appending little explanatory notes, makes no comment on Mr. Wilson Barrett's statement that he has "seen an emotional novice drown herself in tears." We should quite have expected Mr. Archer to add, "Presumably Mr. Wilson Barrett was unable to reach the young lady in time to save her. Or the phrase may be purely figurative. In any case . . ." &c. Mr. Wilson Barrett tells us further on that he has "again and again held a mirror to a young actor, and when he has evidently been feeling deeply, his face, to his astonishment, has borne a peaceful, placid smile."

Mr. Leonard Boyne gives a picturesquely tangled account of an international incident which, he assures us, has affected his acting very considerably:—

> In the streets of Cardiff [he writes], I once saw an Italian stab another fatally. I was on the opposite side of the road, and I gave a yell or scream, and rushed to take the knife. This incident is always vividly before my eyes when I see Tybalt stab Mercutio, and I have ever since, when playing Romeo, used the "yell." I have noticed a dead silence come over the house immediately, as if something beyond mere acting had happened.

When actors write with such simplicity and singleness of purpose as this, it is to be regretted by people who like to be amused that they do not write more.

The next question discussed relates to laughter on the stage. But the only really important and world-stirring discovery made by Mr. Archer in this connexion is that the "extraordinary 'Kch!' (like the sound of a saw) with which, according to stage tradition, Sir Peter Teazle and Charles Surface accompany the back jerk of their thumbs to indicate the presence of the little French milliner behind the screen," must have originated in the "mechanical imitation by inferior actors" of "explosions of ill-repressed merriment." The remainder of Mr. Archer's article is taken up by an intimate discussion of the effects of acting upon the pores of an actor's skin—with regard to which we will preserve the masonic virtue of silence. As we said before, we desire in no sense to blame Mr. Archer for finding pleasure in the investigation of other people's business. On the contrary, we envy him the possession of so simple and conventional a taste. But we regret that the result of his researches—which can surely be of interest only to those who have assisted him in them—should take up so many pages of Messrs. Longmans' excellent Magazine.

THE MONITEUR DE ROME ON IRISH AFFAIRS.

THE interpretation which we ventured last week, on grounds of internal evidence and general probability, to put upon the Pope's allocution to the Irish pilgrims and which the Parnellite organs have peremptorily contradicted, has just received an unexpected and very decisive confirmation. The Times' Correspondent quoted last Wednesday an article of the Moniteur de Rome, which is the more remarkable because that journal, while not venturing to insert anything likely to expose it to papal censure, is not the official organ of the Vatican, and is, as the Correspondent words it, "anti-English in the extreme," and "has never before seen any reason or justice in any English contention about Ireland." Its testimony therefore, grudging and imperfect as it is, must be regarded as the unwilling admission, and a very significant one, extorted from a bitter opponent. We may be sure that it makes the least it dares of any censure conveyed in the reply of Leo XIII. and the most it can of his alleged sympathy with Irish "aspirations." Had his Holiness really explained his meaning to the Irish bishops in anything like the sense attributed to him by Archbishop Walsh, the Moniteur would have struck a very different note. For what does it now tell its readers? In the first place they are informed—in the teeth of the entire chorus of Parnellite and Gladstonian prophets—that there has been "real progress" and "many ameliorations" in the condition of Ireland during the last few years through the operation of a milder and more intelligent system of legislation. And then the Moniteur—magnificently ignoring the famous "last link" pronunciamiento—proceeds to console its Irish friends with the somewhat ambiguous assurance that they will obtain "complete legislative autonomy" when—but not until—England is convinced that they have no desire for "the rupture of the Union." That we are afraid will seem rather cold comfort to Parnellites who know anything of their own mind.

But the next exhortation addressed to them by their too candid monitor is of a still more dispiriting kind. They have been told again and again by their English allies, from Mr. Gladstone downwards, that they are the oppressed and persecuted confessors in a righteous cause, and that all the ills of Ireland are due to the lawless tyranny of a brutal Coercion Government. But the Moniteur, speaking with the recent deliverance of the Pope before its troubled gaze, is unkind enough to press upon them the disagreeably suggestive warning that "in any case the surest means whereby Ireland will produce the change of public opinion which will permit of the concession of an honourable and legitimate autonomy is to restrain the present movement within the limits of justice, legality, and morality"—which their leaders are never tired of assuring them have not been exceeded. "From this point of view," adds the Moniteur, "the advice of the Holy Father is inspired by a sound understanding of the interests of Ireland." The Holy Father therefore has evidently given them to understand that they have not hitherto paid due regard to the claims of justice, morality, or law. Dr. Walsh and Dr. Croke may with advantage take that lesson to heart; they hardly seem to have learnt it yet. Nor is even this the worst. In order to accentuate the indictment thus unceremoniously pressed home, the Moniteur contrasts the past conduct of the Irish agitators with that of an earlier generation of patriots, who by the way did very undisguisedly "aspire to a rupture of the Union," but whose methods of action were—we so far agree with the writer—decidedly more respectable than those adopted by the party who claim to be the modern representatives of their policy.

"We know," says the writer, "how much there was at first that was great, noble, and pure in the Emancipation movement in Ireland which began half a century ago"—or rather which closed nearly sixty years ago—"O'Connell was the eloquent and sublime incarnation of it." One may be excused for repressing with difficulty a disposition to smile at the apotheosis of O'Connell in the form of a "sublime incarnation." At the same time it may be allowed that, in comparison with Messrs. Ford, Davitt, O'Donovan Rossa, and the like—to say nothing here of Mr. Parnell himself—there is a kind of relative sublimity even about Dan O'Connell. He was generally speaking open and above-board; he not only never dirtied his fingers with "daggers and dynamite"—the one and sole ultima ratio of Parnellism—but he always exerted the whole weight of his influence to put down appeals to violence. He announced plainly that if Repeal could not be procured by peaceable means, he would not incur the responsibility of carrying on the contest. And after full allowance has been made for an inordinate vanity and love of notoriety, it may fairly be conceded that his leading aims were patriotic—as he understood patriotism—and not self-seeking. In all these respects he stands out, not indeed as a "sublime incarnation," but distinctly superior to those who claim the inheritance of his emancipatory mission. In the studiously-guarded but significant phrase of the Moniteur, "since then the current, in swelling, has received in its bosom elements which here and there (!) have corrupted its primitive purity. More than once (!) violence and crime have come to compromise and befoul the sacred cause of Ireland." The Moniteur is careful to explain that it does not hold the entire nation to be responsible for the "excesses of those who aim rather to make use of Ireland than to serve her"; but still, not only on moral grounds but for their own interests, "this noble Irish people, so good, so religious, cannot too earnestly seek to disengage its patriotic cause from all impure alliances." At all events, unless it will do so, it cannot expect the aid or sympathy of Rome. "How indeed can Ireland count on the sympathies of Catholics, how can the supreme and moderating power of the Church work in her favour, if it be shown that culpable and revolutionary elements mingle their action with that of the National movement?" Leo XIII. has testified his sympathy for them by the mission of Mgr. Persico, which will bear its fruits, "provided they give willing ears to the voice of the Sovereign Pontiff"—which is not quite the same thing as saying that "their political Pope is Mr. Parnell."

No doubt, as the Times' Correspondent observes, all this "points unmistakably to a severance of Irish interests from the plottings of those Americans who are using Catholic fires to cook their own revolutionary messes, and who will, when they have no longer any use for the Church, show themselves as little mindful of its interests as other revolutionists have been." No rational Catholic can doubt that the interests of his Church are on the side of maintaining intact those rights of property and orderly government on which the organization of society rests, or that such a state of things as the agitators are striving to force on Ireland would prove equally fatal to all discipline in Church or State. An eminent Irish ecclesiastic resident in Rome expressed this, we are told, by saying that "if ever laws were sanctioned against the Church in Ireland, it would be by an Irish Parliament." Sic vos non vobis would be the record of Catholic Home Rulers if they had the misfortune to succeed. Their Graces of Dublin and Cashel may not choose to see this, or may think it prudent to ignore it, but the Pope at all events can have no illusions on the subject. His reply to the Irish pilgrims supplied good evidence of that, and the Moniteur article puts his recognition of it beyond a doubt. The Duke of Norfolk is not indeed, as has been persistently alleged, the official representative of the English Government at Rome, but, no doubt, "like all other educated Catholics, he sees that an agitation of this kind carried on in Ireland will eventually turn its fury against the Church and other Conservative interests." The point may be worth emphasizing in view of a little pamphlet on Ireland and the English Catholics published the other day, with the object apparently of suggesting that, with the exception of "Mr. de Lisle and Lord Denbigh and the Duke of Norfolk," almost all English Catholics are Parnellites. The exact contrary is of course notoriously the case. We have no intention whatever of wasting powder and shot on a brochure which is beneath all serious criticism; for when you have once said that the anonymous writer appears to have learnt his lingo in the pothouse, his honesty at the Old Bailey, and his logic at Hanwell, there is little left to say. One characteristic passage however may be cited for the amusement of our readers from its mingled silliness and effrontery. "The balancing power which has beaten the [Home Rule] Bills is hatred of Catholicism and contempt for the Church. Were the Irish people faithless to their pastors they would win the support of the English Atheistic Poets and Dissenting Politicians." We had imagined that "Dissenting Politicians," and littérateurs who have at least as good a claim as Mr. Swinburne to the sobriquet "Atheistic," were just the kind of supporters "the Irish people" have won. "The price they pay," proceeds the pamphleteer, "for their fidelity to Heaven [as represented by Dr. Croke and the estimable Canon O'Mahoney] is still, as much as ever it was, the refusal of English Protestantism to think 'Papist rats' fit for Freedom." The anonymous author of this eloquent twaddle has evidently quite forgotten that the phrase he pillories in quotation marks, "Papist rats," was originally coined several years ago by no less distinguished a Protestant—though not an "English Protestant"—than Mr. Parnell himself, before he had seen his way to mounting to power on the shoulders of the creatures he described by that unsavoury name. It was certainly a fine stroke of unconscious irony to claim the palm of Catholic confessorship for a party whose acknowledged leader is the Protestant associate of Parisian Communists, while they, headed by some twenty of their bishops, have just been welcoming with open arms the one English politician who is the avowed and uncompromising apologist of the Jacobins. On one point we are afraid the unmannerly pamphleteer is right enough, when he boasts that "the Metropolitan himself"—i.e. Cardinal Manning—is on his side. His Eminence took the trouble to inform the world in the columns of the Times, during the General Election of 1886, that he was a Parnellite.

EXHIBITIONS.

THE Dudley Exhibition is not a bad collection of water-colours for a small Society. It takes rather after the Royal Institute than after the Royal Society in tending towards a certain realistic breadth of treatment. We speak of the better class of work; from the commoner sort, niggling and false colour are by no means entirely absent. Characteristic work of distinguished men—not members—such as Sir John Gilbert and Messrs. Birket Foster and Carl Haag, adds an interest to the show. Amongst the many contrasts of style which are to be seen we may mention two neighbouring drawings, excellent of their kinds—Mr. Sutton Palmer's "Bells of Ouseley" (249) and Mr. Rupert Stevens's "Langham Sketch" (249*). Mr. Stevens's sketch, like most of his work, is very large in manner and fresh and inspiriting in colour; Mr. Palmer's picture, though elaborated to smallness, preserves a soft refinement of colour and a considerable feeling for atmosphere. Work as delicate as this, or as Mr. E. Wake Cooke's "Clovelly from the Hobby" (167), cannot be lightly condemned, though it would be doubtless more effective if treated personally, and with a view to a broader and more striking general aspect. Mr. Conway Lloyd Jones, in "A Rainy Afternoon" (72) and "A Towing Path" (75), has succeeded in getting good values and a sense of open air; Mr. G. R. Burnett, in "Ploughing" (81), is generally broad and telling in his treatment. Mr. Carlaw has hit the true aspect of the stormy scene in his drawing "In Danger—East Bay, Helensburgh" (192); and Mr. C. E. Hern in "Study of a Stack Barge" (177) has treated a natural effect in strong rich colour. Amongst other good things of a solid realistic sort are Mr. L. O'Brien's "Lake Louise" (187), Mr. P. Ghent's "Sunny Morning on the Conway" (74), Mr. Russell Dowson's "On the Shore" (189), Mr. J. Knight's "October Day" (97), and Mr. C. J. Adams's "Sands near Criccieth" (18). Artistic feeling is more particularly shown in certain other works. Mrs. Heathcote gives proof of an original study of different kinds of effects of light in her imaginative and poetical sketches "Plain below Assisi" (99) and "Interior of Church" (181). Mr. F. G. Giampetri's work, "Beneath the Portico of the Temple of Antoninus and Faustina" (142), and "Crypto Porticus in Caligula's Palace" (194), possesses the firm stylish elegance of mature art. Mr. Burnett Stuart deals in classic sentiment and warm decorative colour in "Jaffa" (178), "Jerusalem from the Road to Bethany" (261), "The Dead Sea from Jericho" (268), &c. Mr. Donne's Alpine scenes are well composed, and the same may be said of pictures by Miss Kate Macaulay and by Messrs. R. A. K. Marshall and J. Webb. Good intelligent work that we cannot mention in detail comes from Messrs. A. G. Bell, D. Green, L. Pocock, F. Burgess, Rapetti, F. C. Nightingale, from Miss Rose Barton, and from Miss Edith Somerville.

A good deal of honest endeavour may be seen in the Exhibition of the Nineteenth Century Art Society. Much of it is crude and uneducated work without doubt, but fortunately very little belongs to the category of unconscientious and clever facility. Landscapes outnumber figure paintings here, and small canvases big; but we have one large picture, at any rate, to speak of with decided approval. Mr. J. Olsson's imaginative landscape "Quivering Light" (224) is as good as anything in the gallery. The painter has chosen the same effect of early morning light that he treated in his picture exhibited in this gallery last year. He shows a serious improvement, however, in values and all the realistic side of his work. The quality of the blue of early dawn has been well observed, and the amount of relative definition of objects carefully considered. Artistic observation and refined colour are to be seen in some smaller works, and notably in Mr. Yglesias's "Walberswick" (44), with its lucid moving sky, rich green grass, and fine aerial distance; in the soft grey, umbery tones of Mr. R. West's "Riviera Washing Place" (201) and "Sketch in the Dargle" (34); in Mr. Blackman's soft, yet precise, "Evening: near Venice" (27); and in Miss Sheffield's simple and dignified sketch "Walberswick" (195), unfortunately skied. Mr. Archibald Webb draws and paints agreeably and artistically in "Rotherhithe" (32), though he is inclined to take a conventional view of the general aspect of nature. He obtains colour of pleasant decorative quality, as does Miss B. A. Brown in a "Study of a Corner of Old Chelsea" (185*). Flowers and pines are treated in a workmanlike manner by Mr. H. Franck in "Summer in Surrey" (55); a bridge and still water with some elegance by Mr. R. M. Chevalier in "On the River Mole" (202); and the sea by Mr. P. F. Walker with force and reality in "A Sou' Wester" (196). A certain dash and ease characterize Mr. Norton's "Dutch Fishing Boats" (174), Mr. Corner's "Towards Home" (98), and Mr. Yeend King's "October" (152). As most deserving of notice among the painters of the figure we may mention Messrs. Edgar Anderson, Izzard, and Dunsmore. Water-colours as usual abound, and some are good, such as Mr. M. Tuke's silvery-grey note "Inspecting Falmouth Pilot Boats" (291), his "On Board the Old Brigantine" (329), which recalls Mr. H. S. Tuke's excellent oil in last Academy; Mr. A. H. Foster's pleasing "After Rain" (338); Miss K. Macaulay's strong and bright sketches, "Laying down Lobster-pots" (327) and "Among the Hills" (328); Miss N. Davison's fresh-looking "Stranded" (313); and work by Messrs. J. M. Mackintosh, W. J. Boddy, R. H. Nibbs, David Green, and some others.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

THE plot of the one-act piece by Messrs. Bellingham and Best, entitled Darby and Joan, which was produced at Terry's Theatre last Saturday afternoon is simple enough. The curtain rises upon a scene representing a cosy old-fashioned parlour, wherein we discover Admiral Darby and his wife Joan, discussing by the fireside the propriety of an alliance between their granddaughter Joan and a certain "young" Darby, a poor naval lieutenant. The Admiral, for good reasons, is opposed to the wedding, whereas his wife is entirely in its favour, and consequently uses her persuasive powers to change her husband's mind. But it is not until the excellent couple fall asleep, as, it seems, is their after-dinner custom, in their favourite chairs, and dream of their own courtship fifty years ago, when the course of true love ran the reverse of smoothly with them, and wake up again, with the vision of their happy past still before them, that the matter of the disputed wedding is amicably settled. The dream is shown in action. Mr. Terry and Miss Clara Cowper, who impersonate Darby and Joan, by a clever arrangement of their seats, which are turned with their ample backs to the audience, contrive to slip out and effect behind the scenes what is known as a "quick change," so that presently Mr. Terry re-enters, in a naval costume of the early days of the century, as young Darby, and is seen stealing over the balcony into the apartment, and Miss Cowper, as young Joan, attired in the garments of our grandmothers, receives him in her arms, and they forthwith make ardent love to each other, and go through a passionate leave-taking; for young Darby must be on board his ship within the hour; but he swears before he parts eternal fidelity to his sweetheart, just as old Darby did half a century before to good Dame Joan. The piece, which we commend to amateurs, is gracefully written, and it is, on the whole, very well acted. Mr. Terry appears, however, to much greater advantage as old Darby than he does as the more youthful edition of that venerable sailor. Miss Cowper, on the other hand, is delightfully prim as the handsome, grey-haired Dame Joan, and she also looks and acts very prettily as the young girl. The chief defect of this piece, in an artistic sense, is that the "quick-change" business, which, after all, is a trick, deprives it of much of its sentiment, the attention of the audience being much more occupied with the manner in which the rapid disguises are effected than with acting.

Mr. Jerome K. Jerome's Sunset, performed for the first time at the Comedy Theatre on Monday evening last as a lever de rideau, met with some success. It is founded, "by permission," on a poem by Lord Tennyson, called "The Sisters," which must not be confounded with the more popular poem of the same name. It is a pity Mr. Jerome K. Jerome did not adhere more faithfully to Lord Tennyson's work, for he has rather diminished the interest of his little drama by the introduction of uninteresting characters, who are supposed to be north-country folk, and who distinguish themselves by talking of what is not in any way connected with the story, sometimes in a northern accent, and sometimes in a London drawing-room drawl. They were at their best but poor padding. The scenes between the two girls, who unknown to each other are in love with the same man, are prettily written; and the last, in which the elder sister discovers how deep-rooted is her sister Joan's passion for the hero, and announces her determination to sacrifice herself by persuading the lovers that her heart is still untouched, is so well contrived that it saved the fortunes of the piece, which was admirably acted by Miss Cissy Grahame and Miss Cudmore. The minor characters, hero included, have so very little to do, that it is scarcely fair to mention their work at all, especially as it was not particularly interesting. The night on which this piece was produced saw the popular Arabian Nights reach its hundredth performance.

Yet another one-act play, The Postscript, was produced on Tuesday at the Prince of Wales Theatre. The author is Mr. F. Hamilton Knight, a young actor, whose experience of the stage was evident in the neat manner in which his work is constructed. It is written with a good deal of skill and elegance. The plot deals with the self-inflicted sorrows of a pretty young English girl, named Marjorie Fleming, who somehow or other has got herself engaged against her will to her guardian, an Indian Colonel, who, however, in due time discovers that she is in love with a very nice young gentleman of her own age, who has recently heroically saved her life from a terrible fire. The Colonel, however, in a letter kindly tells Miss Fleming that she is quite free to marry Harold Treherne if she likes, but odd to relate he gives her this pleasing information in the postscript, which she does not read until the very last scene of the play, a neglectful act, which leads her into considerable trouble. Fortunately, Mr. Knight had secured the services of those two excellent actresses, Miss Norreys and Miss Enson, who acted charmingly. Mr. Brandon Thomas was a rather stiff and formal Colonel, and Mr. Lewis Waller a somewhat lackadaisical lover.

The new comedy in four acts, His Romance, which was put upon the stage at a matinée at the Olympic on Thursday, is an adaptation of a comedy by Herr Michael Klapp which is very popular in Germany. It contains several well-written scenes, and the dialogue is frequently amusing. The plot, however, is a mere thread upon which has been hung an amazing amount of well-contrived, but often superfluous, trivial incident. The Duke of Lovebrook's son, the Marquess of Hilton, has been affianced to a young lady he has never seen. In order that he may sow his wild oats before marrying her, he is sent on a Continental tour with his tutor, Major Rosenkrantz. The Countess of Southmoore, the mother of the young lady, fearing that she may lose him as a desirable son-in-law, starts off with her daughter in pursuit, and arrives at the same hotel on the borders of a Swiss lake. But the young gentleman in the meantime has fallen in love with Miss Sybil Baring, and determines to evade the scheming Countess and the Lady Clara, by pretending to be an actor. Hence arise some comical situations, and many which the adapter possibly imagines are such. In the end all comes right; the Marquess marries Miss Baring, and his confederate, the Major, wins the heart of Lady Clara. There is altogether too little material in this piece for four acts. It chanced that the performance, which was under the supervision of Mr. Henry Neville, was exceedingly good, and therefore the piece went with spirit and proved sufficiently amusing to warrant the applause with which it was received. It served to introduce a new actor, Mr. Meyrick Milton, who has much in his favour. He has youth, a pleasant appearance, a nice voice, and acts agreeably. Miss Norreys, as the heroine, was very quaint and fascinating, provoking a good deal of laughter by her artless delivery of slightly risqué speeches. Miss Agnes Verity, as Sybil, was also excellent. Mr. Bassett Roe was made up to look like a highly respectable, old-fashioned Duke, and Mr. Brandon Thomas was a gentlemanly Major, after the kind affected by Mr. Bancroft.

The season of French plays at the Royalty Theatre is marked by much variety, and it is due to M. Mayer to say that the performances have been on the whole of an interesting and creditable description. Mme. Mary Albert and M. Morlet, fair representatives of the lighter French opera, have gone, and the stage has lately been occupied with Mam'zelle Nitouche, in which an actress new to England, Mlle. Wittmann, was the principal figure.

The original Denise de Flavigny, when Mam'zelle Nitouche was first given at the Variétés five years ago, was Mme. Judic, and she is inimitable. To a certain extent the part is easy. Mlle. Wittmann, a pleasant actress, is well able to indicate the demeanour of the schoolgirl in the presence of the Superior, her slyness, and the love of adventurous fun which is veiled under an aspect of strict propriety. Mme. Judic possesses extraordinary finesse, and without any sort of effort gives point to what are apparently the simplest remarks; she has, indeed, a veritable genius for such characters. Mlle. Wittmann is without the artful artlessness of her distinguished predecessor, but she is agreeably vivacious, and sings M. Hervé's music as well as her limited means allow—for they are, in truth, very limited. M. Dekernel's aptitude enables him to get safely through any reasonable task, but he is not well placed as Célestin. M. Dekernel is primarily a vocalist, and as it may be presumed that the part was written for M. Baron, it is obvious why Célestin's music is of the simplest description. An admirably adroit comedian, M. Baron has no voice. M. Feroumont plays the Major, Comte de Château Gibus, who is attached to Corinne, the leading actress in the opera of M. Floridor, it being Corinne's flight from the theatre in a moment of pique that makes it necessary to requisition the services of Denise. M. Feroumont does what is probably the wisest thing he can do, and that is to imitate M. Christian. M. Christian was remarkably successful in catching the tone and manner of the Ramollot type of field officer, and this study M. Feroumont fairly reproduces. The performance is generally entertaining.

We are happy to join in the acknowledgments which have been made of the improvement in Partners at the Haymarket. Mr. Buchanan's dramatic perception is limited, and it is a pity that Mr. Beerbohm Tree did not do what was necessary to be done before the drama was first acted; however, it is now cut and revised, and the result is satisfactory. As regards the acting there is also improvement. Mr. Tree has reconsidered his study of Borgfeldt, and the result is to strengthen the character. The man's simplicity of heart constitutes his chief charm, and this is not inconsistent with a moderately well fitting coat and a head of hair not wholly strange to brush and comb. In truth, Mr. Tree has made what is, after all, a very little change. He is somewhat neater, and he has to some slight extent softened his German accent; but the advantage gained is considerable. We no longer feel that Borgfeldt is an incongruous figure in his own house. Sincerity, tenderness, and emotional strength are notable features of Mr. Tree's performance. Mr. Charles Brookfield's Bellair could not have been better than it was, and cannot be better than it is. The young actor's versatility, the finish by which every character he undertakes is marked, and the fresh humour with which it is rendered, place him high in the front rank of comedians. Miss Marion Terry's Claire has gained in impressiveness. The play of Cupid's Messenger has been added to the programme. Of the débutante, Miss Freake, we shall hope to speak in terms of praise in the future.

IN THE TWO HOUSES.

EVIDENCES of Mr. Gladstone's peculiar method of managing his party were visible in the Upper no less than in the Lower House on the first night of the Session. The Leader of the Opposition in the Lords was apparently altogether unprepared for his colleague's ostentatious waving of the white flag in the Commons. Lord Granville's speech was framed in strict conformity with old-fashioned precedent; and, accordingly, while Mr. Gladstone was complimenting Ministers on the judicious selection of their legislative programme, he was himself engaged in a laboured attempt to demonstrate to them that every article of their last year's legislation has turned out a more or less complete failure. Abstractedly speaking, there is, of course, no inconsistency between these two positions. It is in theory conceivable that a Government who, according to Lord Granville, have not even succeeded in passing a satisfactory Mines Regulation Bill should be able to fulfil Mr. Gladstone's professed hopes of a "distinguished" Session by successfully coping with the large and difficult question of County Government. But things which are theoretically conceivable may be practically most improbable, and the tone of Lord Granville's speech would undeniably have been in closer harmony with that of Mr. Gladstone's, if he had been a little less anxious to represent the Government as a set of hopelessly incapable legislators. Nor was he much happier in his excursions into foreign policy. Even if Prince Bismarck's account of his services to Russia at the Berlin Congress had been inconsistent with Lord Salisbury's estimate of the success of our plenipotentiaries in maintaining English interests, the personal views of the German Chancellor would not have had any necessary claim to be accepted as the final deliverance of history on the matter. But in point of fact there is no such inconsistency between the opinions of the two statesmen; and it argues a certain lapse of dialectical acuteness on Lord Granville's part to have supposed that there was. To say that Prince Bismarck successfully seconded all the efforts of Russian policy so far as he was acquainted with its aims is not the same thing as saying that all those aims were attained.

On Mr. Gladstone's opening speech we have already commented. Histrionically speaking it left nothing to be desired. It would have been impossible to recognize the reckless and unscrupulous stump-orator of the recess under the well-draped disguise of the grave and moderate statesman, so tenderly solicitous of equity in criticism that he hesitated even to reassert the opinions to which he is irretrievably committed without first inquiring whether any statistics were forthcoming to demolish them. Nevertheless we are disposed to think that those militant members of his party whom his pacific attitude has disappointed may take courage. The debate of the following Monday quite sufficed to show that the old Adam is not altogether crucified with his affections and lusts. We do not apprehend that Mr. Gladstone's new-born desire for a Session of real work will prevent his lending a hand to any attempt to waste the time and exasperate the temper of Parliament which may be extemporized hereafter, as occasion serves, by his Parnellite allies. Moreover, it must be remembered that Mr. Gladstone's attendance in the House is likely to be at least as intermittent as it was last Session; and that, in his absence, his promises of co-operation with the Government will probably be interpreted by Sir William Harcourt in the same liberal spirit which animated his wholly gratuitous intervention on Monday last. On that occasion a debate which was on the point of expiring of itself was prolonged by his public-spirited efforts for a couple of hours. The resumption of the debate on the Address was marked by a speech from Mr. Parnell, in moving his Amendment, which, together with Mr. Balfour's speech on the Friday evening, may fairly be taken, as we point out elsewhere, to contain the gist of the whole controversy on the Crimes Act and its administration in Ireland. Equality of merit cannot, however, be predicated of the two performances. Mr. Parnell has often been more plausible in argument and more impressive in point of rhetoric than he succeeded in being last Monday night. Mr. Balfour, on the other hand, was in his best debating form, and left to Mr. Morley, who followed, a task with which that now practised debater could but imperfectly cope.

The discussion as continued after the speeches of Mr. Parnell can hardly be described as profitable; but it has been distinctly less tedious than has been usual with debates on the Address in recent years. Perhaps the exhaustion of some of the regular Parliamentary performers by their extraordinary efforts during the recess has left the field clear for others who do not usually succeed in obtaining so early a hearing. Mr. T. W. Russell, for instance, has seldom had so good an opportunity as that which presented itself to him last Tuesday night, and of which he made such excellent use. It is perhaps to be regretted, however, that Colonel Saunderson, who always infuses liveliness into a debate, and who might well have been reserved to supply the antidote of comedy to the melodrama of Mr. O'Brien or Mr. Dillon, should have spoken on the same night as Mr. Russell. Bearing in mind, however, that the debate was resumed that night by Sir George Trevelyan, whose speech consisted almost wholly of a disquisition on the novel thesis that the Crimes Act is aimed at political combination, instead of the offences to which "Lord Spencer and I" confined our attention, it was, no doubt, desirable that every attempt should be made to lighten the course of subsequent discussion. And from this point of view the thanks of the House and the public are undoubtedly due to Sir Charles Russell for his explanation—the poverty of the language compels us to use the word—of the Dopping incident. The fact of his having advised Mr. Gladstone to apologize to Colonel Dopping even before he was requested to do so by the Colonel's solicitors is one of a deeply interesting character; but, after all, it only serves to whet one's curiosity to know what Sir Charles Russell thought of Mr. Gladstone's apology when it appeared, and whether he, like all the rest of us, is still puzzling over the question of what is the "purpose" of presenting an "unloaded" gun at a "boy, in the full sense of the word," and how a policeman can prevent the marksman from "fulfilling" that purpose by striking up that weapon.

The proceedings in the Lords since the voting of the Address have been devoid of public interest; and the prolongation of the debate on the Address in the Commons has, as usual, deprived it of any interest which it may have originally possessed. Mr. O'Brien's speech, however, of Thursday night was in its own way a curiosity, especially to the watchful student of the manners of the leading Parnellites, and the amused spectator of the desperate competition which is continually going on among the half-dozen members of the general's staff. The operation of this spirit of rivalry is comically noticeable in the case of Mr. O'Brien. That aspiring gentleman evidently feels that his hour has come. Mr. Sexton has not yet fully recovered from his recent illness. The astonishingly rapid (and studiously advertised) growth of Mr. Healy's professional practice—("Sawyer, late Nockemorf—what a business that young man has!")—detains him still in Dublin. Mr. T. P. O'Connor will doubtless be distracted by editorial duties. But Mr. O'Brien has just come out of prison the "idol of the Irish people," and now is evidently his time to assert his true place in Parliament. Accordingly he has at once "come out" as an orator of the "impassioned" and "withering" variety, a master of the alternate shriek and whisper, a gesticulator with the levelled and menacing forefinger, a professor, in short, of all those arts of third-rate transpontine melodrama which do duty nowadays for the rhetorical graces of the old Irish Parliament. Mr. O'Brien has entirely discarded his former style of speaking, which was effective enough in the frigidly acrid style, and has borrowed an entirely new elocutionary manner, in part, perhaps, of his own invention, but quite evidently suggested, as regards its most fantastic tricks, by imperfect recollections of some of the more eccentric mannerisms of Mr. Irving. In this strain he held forth on Thursday night for two stricken hours to the enthusiastic delight of the Irish members around him, and sometimes—usually in the more strikingly Jacobinical passages—of the English Radicals below him. How the Gladstonians below the gangway comport themselves towards Mr. O'Brien and his stage heroics is, perhaps, a matter of little moment. But the spectacle of their leader—all eyes and ears, half-turned on his seat that he might lose no word or gesture—the spectacle, we say, of Mr. Gladstone listening, apparently in breathless admiration, to this paltry fustian, and drinking in great draughts of coarse flattery from the lips which but yesterday were pouring out before him a torrent of insult and contumely, was, indeed, a sorry sight.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

THE Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace began again on the 11th of the month. The programme was chiefly of modern music, more fit to occupy the minds of professors than to soothe the savage breast. Mozart's enchanting Symphony in E Flat was set like a gem in the middle—a stately lady amidst a herd of advanced women. Wagner's Overture to Faust (in D minor) stood first on the list. It is a long work, consisting of a deep gloomy "Introduction" in slow time, and an "Allegro" conceived with more reticence and respect for a purely musical unity of feeling than is common with Wagner. It belongs, in fact, to the class of picturesque rather than of operatic overtures, and if not regular in form, it depends on a formal and not a dramatic connexion of ideas. It possesses plenty of marked melody, and the flowing themes on the oboe and flute are full of beauty, and stand in advantageous contrast to the fiery energy of the strings in quavers. A savage kind of grandeur is often obtained without undue noise, though elsewhere there is plenty of it. The performance was an excellent one, in spite of some slight discordance in the wind at the outset.

We have spoken of Mr. Franz Ondricek's playing on former occasions, so that we may be content to say generally that he was well suited to the task he undertook of introducing Mr. Dvorák's Concerto for Violin (Op. 53) to the Crystal Palace audience. By his brilliant technical powers and his spirited manner of playing he is amply qualified to bring out all its beauties. These are numerous, in spite of a certain meaninglessness in the figures, which in the first movement almost reaches the point of dulness and incoherency. The composer has not managed to impress any ensemble of feeling on his work. He flows on in pretty passages for the instrument, pleasantly enough it is true, but with something of the aimless rippling of a river on its banks. The "Andante" improves in this respect, and shows a fine quality of pathos and simple, direct melody. Mr. F. Ondricek played it with sentiment and yet with sufficient firmness. Curious and beautiful effects of wood wind, horn, and trumpet occur in the orchestral accompaniment, and simple melody is well relieved by passages of greater elaboration. The "Finale" no more than the "Andante" suffers from dulness. It sparkles with quaint and charming effects of instrumentation for horn, drum, &c., and Mr. Ondricek gave point and piquancy to its spirited dancing tunes and effective changes of accent and rhythm. Mr. Ondricek showed his power and fluency, however, in less artistic fields than the Concerto by his brilliant execution of the gymnastic feats of Laub's "Rondo" and Paganini's "Witches' Dance," which last he gave in obedience to a recall. Tschaikowski's "Sérénade Mélancolique," another solo, was too long and too consistently lugubrious to be agreeable. It is difficult to imagine any one enduring the dreary, shapeless wailing of such a "Serenade" when they might enliven or silence the performer with a jug of water. Mr. Charles Banks replaced Mr. Sims Reeves, who was too ill to sing; but, unfortunately, his excellent voice was hardly at its best, owing, we believe, to a cold. Nevertheless, he rendered Mendelssohn's Recitative and Air "If with all your hearts" and Sullivan's "Distant Shore" with taste and refinement.

The Symphony, as we have said, was Mozart's, in E flat, one of the most enduring monuments of musical art. During the hundred years of its existence, in spite of the many innovations in music, this work has probably lost none of its beauty or effect. Nothing can put it out of fashion; because no one has ever composed, in a strictly classic style, with such an easy inspiration as Mozart. The performance, fortunately, was worthy of the work, and the orchestra played with intelligent conscientiousness and with more enthusiasm than in any other part of the programme. That breadth of reading which Mr. Manns always aims at showed its effect in the dignity and massive majesty of the beginning. The lovely swaying grace of the first theme and the active supple gait of the second subject were excellently rendered, and a great part of the good impression of the movement was due to the solid body and fine ensemble of the strings. The "Andante," a most popular movement, was also admirably played. Mr. Manns and his orchestra mapped out with clearness and delicacy the charmingly natural intricacies of the counterpoint. The movement under such playing passes through its evolutions, learned as they are, with a most gracious and easy stateliness. Breadth and dignity were well kept up in the familiar Minuet; there might have been perhaps with advantage a little more lightness in the treatment of the suave Raphaelesque flow of the "Trio." Sustained throughout with admirable spirit and intelligent care in detail the final "Allegro" produced an irresistible effect of gaiety and grace. It would be difficult, on the other hand, to speak with much enthusiasm of the performance of Weber's Invitation to the Waltz, set for orchestra by Berlioz, which brought the concert to an end. We have often heard it given by a far inferior orchestra with more point and daintiness.

REVIEWS.

THERE is no more mysterious and interesting people than the Maoris of New Zealand. Before the European settlement this chivalrous, though cannibal, race was living in the Age of Stone. Yet they had a highly-organized society, and records of extreme antiquity and value. Of these records (purely oral), examples have been published by Sir George Grey, by the Rev. Richard Taylor, and by Bastian. Mr. White has now made a fresh collection of the mythical hymns and histories. The book appeals only to students, but for them it has the deepest interest.

Mr. White has printed the various versions given by various priests of the old faith. It was the duty of those men not only to remember the venerable legends, but to impart them with the utmost exactness to chosen hearers, who, again, handed them down unimpaired to a younger generation. The correctness of the tradition was maintained under superstitious sanctions (even now there are passages which the more or less Christianized doctors will not divulge to Europeans), and also by the supervision of the oldest and most learned of the initiate. The teaching was conducted with every circumstance of solemnity and tabu. Thus the whole process of securing accurate transmission may be compared to the modes by which the Vedas were preserved in the memory of the Brahmanic caste in India. An extreme minuteness of ritual and sacrifice in connexion with these lessons may also remind us of Indian practice. Nor are the traditions of the beginnings of Gods and men and of the world, of the Deluge, of the origin of death, at all inferior to the fables of the Brahmanas on the same topics; while the meditative hymns may be compared for sublimity and purity to that famous poem, Rig Veda, i. 129.

How, or when, or where the Maoris developed their systematic treatment of traditions and myths which they share with the rest of mankind is a matter for conjecture. Hints of an Indian origin have been ventured; but the subject is not discussed by Mr. White in this volume, nor do we propose to add a guess of our own.

It is a peculiarity of the present collection that it is almost silent about Maui, the Maori "culture-hero"; while its Cosmogonic legends resemble the Cronus myth in Hesiod much less closely than do the versions in Grey and Taylor. Examples of this will be given. But first the reader must remember that the Maoris have been, of all known backward races, the most metaphysical. Their grasp of abstract conceptions is astonishing, and it may be said that Heraclitus or Parmenides would have felt at home in the terminology of Maori philosophy. Thus Mr. White gives the word Tua as a term "limitless in meaning—namely, 'Behind that which is most distant,' 'Behind all matter,' and 'Behind every action;' it also means 'the essence of worship.'" Yet while possessed of such notions, the Maoris in their myths represent heaven and earth as beings with personal powers and passions. Their divine genealogies are on a par with those of Hesiod and the Orphic poems; and they have no scruple in recording divine weddings with the lower animals and bestial ancestries of the families of men. These features of their mythology are precisely akin to similar absurdities among Greeks and Bushmen. We may say with the philosophical editor of the Cabinet des Fées in the last century that a similar ignorance everywhere produced similar stories. But whether the metaphysical hymns or the mythical contes are the older, or whether they are of contemporary origin, though springing from different moods and faculties of mind, we cannot decide. But it may be observed that as the foolish and disgusting fables are what we find semper, et ubique, et ab omnibus, while the Eleatic metaphysics are all but peculiar to the Maoris (the Amautas in Peru lived in a higher civilization), it is probable that the myths are the earlier, while the metaphysical hymns are the fruit of later priestly reflection. This is plausible, because we do not (as far as our knowledge goes) find anything parallel to Maori metaphysics among races that do not possess an organized hereditary learned and priestly class. Such a class existed among the Maoris, and the hymns and ἱεροὶ λόγοι were handed on from eldest son to eldest son. Now a society—say that of Australians or Bushmen—which has not developed any special hereditary learned class is undeniably less advanced, less differentiated, nearer the beginning than a society like that of the Maoris. The less differentiated society does possess the wild myths, as the Greeks and Maoris also do, but does not possess the reflective and metaphysical hymns. These belong to Quichuas, Egyptians, Indians, Maoris, peoples which have an organized meditative and sacerdotal hierarchy. Thus it does appear as if the wild tales were the more primitive, while the abstract conceptions are the fruit of special philosophic reflection.

Mr. White's account of the scholastic ritual of instruction and of "The School of Mythology and History," with the sacrifices and ceremonies, should be read by all students of early races (pp. 8–13). There is also an astronomical school, and a school of agriculture, including lessons in applied magic.

As for the Cosmogonic legends, they vary, more or less, in the versions of various tribes. In Darkness, the Divine (Atua) began his chant of creation, singing how Dark begat Light, and thereafter came a long string of mystic genealogies in the Orphic taste. Among the mythical parents is Raki (dry), some of whose children "dragged mankind down to death." This Raki had an intrigue with Papa-tu-a-nuku, who was the wife of Taka (Tanga-roa). Cherchez la femme, says the sage; here she is! This affair of Papa led to trouble, and, in fact, was the Maori Fall. In Raki we may recognize the Rangi of Taylor's version, while Papa-tu-a-nuku is his Papa. They are Heaven and Earth. Originally united, like Ouranos and Gaia, in an embrace which darkened earth and their offspring, they were violently severed (Taylor) or, after Taka had speared Rangi, they were thoughtfully thrust apart, in a kindly spirit, by their children. * The Ancient History of the Maori. By John White. Government Print, Wellington, New Zealand.

to the mutilation of Ouranos by his son Cronos, and his consequent withdrawal into the heights of air. Thus from the priestly metaphysics we suddenly drop into the popular myths. This particular tale is known in the Brahmanas, where Indra takes the part of Tane the Separator. It is very common in the Pacific islands. Tane decorated Raki by sticking the stars all over him, as the Wolf did in a myth of the Navajoes (Schoolcraft, iv. 89). In one tribal version, at least, Raki requested Tane to lift him up (p. 47). In others (Taylor) the Maori Cronos, as in Greece, is reproached for cruelty. The incantation chanted at the divorce is published by Mr. White (p. 50).

Of the Deluge-myth there are variants. Ta-Whaki causes it (p. 55) by stamping on the floor of heaven till it cracked, the result being the same as when the windows of the heavens were opened. Much more elaborate versions are given (p. 172). Men increased and became wicked. Theological teaching by Parawhenua was neglected, and even ridiculed. The teacher made a raft, and uttered incantations to heaven; Rangi or Raki, then, with some birds and some women, got on board the raft, and the Deluge came. All the scoffers were drowned. The Maori Noah, or Manu, landed when the flood subsided, and found not only that the wicked were dead, but that the earth had changed its appearance. Mr. Howorth will be pleased to hear that "Puta caused the commotion which overthrew the earth, so that the animals of this world" (e.g. the Mammoth) "and the birds and the Moa and others of the same kind were destroyed." Thus the Maoris anticipated Mr. Howorth's theory of the Moa. The Ritual practised after the Flood still survives (p. 175). This appears a very strong proof that the legend is pre-Christian, and in essentials at least not derived from the missionaries.

The myth of the making of man out of clay recurs frequently. The making of woman, and how she became the wife of her fashioner, and how, when she knew this, she fled to Death, reminds one of the similar Brahmanic myth of Purusha (Muir, Ancient Sanskrit Texts, i. 25; Satapatha Brahmana, xiv. 4, 2). In Maori this daughter-wife became Hine-nui-te-po, "great daughter of darkness," she who finally swallowed Maui, and caused the origin and universality of death. But the Maori cycle is not given in Mr. White's volume. The fable that an aquatic plant engendered the red clay whence man was made, or grew, reminds one of the Zulu myth that man came out of a bed of reeds. Tane married a tree, and his children were trees. He then made a woman out of mud and sand to be his wife.

Mr. White prints his Maori text in the original, and gives genealogical tables of the gods. His work is the fruit of many years of labour spent in collecting the holy legends from the learned class. Just in time he has come; and we look forward with much pleasure to the later volumes of a work which should be in every library of myth, religion, folklore, and ethnology. He will conclude with a Maori dictionary. Most of his old Maori friends are gone on the dim way to Po—the place of the departed. They were "men of noble and heroic spirit, who, while they acknowledged and dreaded the malignant power of the gods of their fathers, yet dared to disclose some of their sacred lore to one of an alien race."

THERE is, of course, no reason in the nature of things why a devout lover should not be silly. But when Mrs. Lovett Cameron depicts her specimen of the class as dull, commonplace, and prosaic, she makes a very large draft upon the patience and the credulity of her readers. Geoffrey Dane had a strange way of illustrating his devotion, though his methods of displaying love were more like those of ordinary mortals. He was a nice young man and the son of a clergyman; but he would not go to church on Sunday. He smoked a pipe out of doors instead, and while he was smoking it a lady passed him reading a book. Of course she dropped the book, and of course he picked the book up, and their eyes met, and all the rest of it. The lady was married, but her husband had got into trouble, and was conveniently kept out of sight. When Léon Bréfour does emerge from obscurity he exhibits a disagreeable, private-madhouse sort of manner, which proves him to be a better subject for a medical treatise than for a work of fiction. The first time that Geoffrey called upon Mme. Bréfour she gave him a lecture upon the resources of literature, which ended in the following manner:—"Down upon his knees at the side of her chair had sunk Geoffrey Dane, with the white hand that had been reached out to him fast imprisoned in his own. He kissed it, as men have kissed the hands of the kings to whose cause they have devoted themselves. And then, at the touch of his hot young lips upon her hand, all the womanliness and the feminine purity awoke in her." They were an odd pair of qualities, and it is remarkable that their awakening should have been precisely simultaneous. But the slumbers of the latter at any rate, were not disturbed a moment too soon. Mr. Geoffrey Dane's behaviour was rather abrupt, and we have never heard that kings, constitutional or otherwise, were embarrassed by the "hot young lips" of their subjects. We venture to give Mrs. Cameron a piece of advice. She has another of these passionately proper scenes in her book, and both are equally absurd. French novelists are not guilty of these inconsistencies and incongruities. They sin boldly, like Luther, or they let the dangerous subject alone. To write amorous scenes for girls' schools is happily an impossible task, and attempts to perform it are ridiculous. After his rapid descent upon the floor Geoffrey Dane abode within the bounds of moderation, and flirted in a quiet, gentlemanly, rather boring manner. But we must say that the romance of his life is very feeble. While not disclosing the end of it, we may state, without any breach of confidence, that he marries somebody else at the chaste instigation of Mme. Bréfour herself, who is the only person in A Devout Lover possessing the slightest claim to be called devout. We frankly confess that this sort of sloppy philandering, this confusion of morality with external decorum, strikes us as rather nauseous. It is all very well for Mrs. Cameron to enunciate the lofty maxim that "marriage, from whatsoever cause on earth save that of love alone, is an outrage against nature and a sin against God." Example is better than precept, and everybody in A Devout Lover is more or less violating Alfred de Musset's warning by playing with love. When Mr. Geoffrey Dane was married to Miss Angel Halliday, each of them was enamoured of another, and the gentleman who begins his career by courting Miss Halliday's sister ends it by making a declaration to Mr. Geoffrey Dane's wife. These complications of maudlin sentimentality are imperfectly relieved by the melodramatic villany of Geoffrey's wicked uncle, who bullies his lawful wife and quails before his illegitimate son, whose conversation is as tedious as his schemes are preposterous, and who would be hissed off the boards by any theatrical audience that respected itself. Nor is the bad young man, the sneak and coward who plots against the virtuous Geoffrey, a brilliant success in portraiture. Albert Trichet is a mere caricature, and Mrs. Cameron might have invented some more refined form of punishment for his impertinence than the fastening of a bulldog upon his nose. Refinement, indeed, is not Mrs. Cameron's forte, as may be gathered not only from many incidents and remarks in her book, but also from her statement that "Time, the great auctioneer, brought down his hammer with an irrevocable thump." We must now leave A Devout Lover to the tender mercies of the great auctioneer.

Tracked describes, and indeed consists, of the career of a boy who, after suddenly changing from an apparently irredeemable blackguard into an impossibly quixotic hero, perishes tragically at the age of seventeen. Geoffrey is the son of a "gentleman"—the legitimate son, we may add—but is disavowed by his father on absurdly inadequate grounds, and left to shift for himself at a very early age. The moral of Tracked is unexceptionable. Rich men who "marry beneath them" ought neither to quarrel with their wives nor to disown their children. Moreover, since Geoffrey was capriciously deprived of his natural protectors, he ought to have been sent to a Board school at the expense of the ratepayers. But, while the motives of the author are excellent, her method of acting upon them leaves much to be desired. In straining after contrasts she forgets probability, and creates a world of her own which is neither actual nor ideal. Violence is not strength, or, to translate the abstract into the concrete, inferior novelists should beware of imitating Wuthering Heights. When the author of Tracked wishes to be effective, she has recourse to physical brutality, and the wretched little Willy Gibson receives a thrashing, or Geoffrey spoils somebody's features, or somebody else strikes Geoffrey across the face with a whip. These incidents are repulsive, and there is nothing to redeem them in the manner of their narration. Floggings should not be minutely delineated, except when, as in the case of Mr. Squeers, the reader feels that he would like to have been present, and even to have assisted at the performance. The one really good thing in the book is Geoffrey's elopement with the sister of the man he had assaulted, his tardy repentance, and her return home. That is certainly well done, and Farmer Gibson's reception of his daughter has the ring of genuine pathos. The foolish craze for savagery and blood which plays such havoc with modern fiction has spoiled Tracked; for it cannot be denied that the writer has talent to spoil. Her style can be dramatically powerful at times, though she has a most irritating way of employing asterisks when there is nothing which requires suppression, while putting in much description of blows and wounds that might as well, or better, have been suppressed. The following sentence may be set as a prize puzzle to intelligent youth or as a model of the way in which English should not be written:—"Left childless a little before his marriage, he would never have married if he had known of that before." The language of novelists is not, like the language of diplomatists, intended to conceal their thoughts. Mr. Audley, however, to whom these enigmatical words apply, is a wholly unaccountable person, whose conduct always borders on the imbecile, and we can understand that even his creator may have found his character a little obscure. The obviously benevolent intentions with which Tracked was composed make one sorry that it is not better.

Seth's Brother's Wife is a capital story, full of point, vigour, humour, and dash. If the title is too comprehensive, that is a fault on the right side. One need not say that Seth Fairchild does not regard his sister-in-law as his sister, but as rather less than kin and more than kind. Mr. Harold Frederic, however, is not French in his methods or views, and he does not bring the blush to the cheek of innocence. Louisa Fairchild was a mischievous flirt, but she was nothing worse or better. As the lady who became Mrs. Seth judiciously remarked, such women are popular with people who are not married to them, and Louisa is amusing enough to read about. No more purely American book was ever published in this country. But it is not unduly analytical, it does not discuss the superiority or inferiority of Americans to foreigners, and it has a plot. The plot has a weak point, and that is that there was no adequate motive for the murder of Albert Fairchild, for it is impossible to suppose that such a cur as the murderer would have risked his life for the money which the victim had about him. This is really all we can say against Seth's Brother's Wife, and it is not much. The rural life of New York State is depicted with an unflinching fidelity which will not promote emigration. American politics are treated with knowledge, and without the caricature which half spoils as a work of art even such an intensely clever book as Democracy. American journalism, which has hitherto played a less prominent part in fiction, is described in a very graphic and entertaining manner. Seth Fairchild, after a youth spent in working on his father's farm, became, in a somewhat rapid and surprising fashion, editor of the Tecumseh Chronicle. In that capacity he was expected to help his elder brother, who had procured him his place on the staff, to get elected for Congress by corrupt means. Seth resisted the very different temptations offered by his brother and his brother's wife. He was a youth of considerable spirit, neither a muff nor a scoundrel, but at the same time very far from being a prig. A more manly and generally satisfactory hero we have not come across for some time. His cousin Annie, who, in spite of Louisa's charms, may be called the heroine, is a fresh, pleasant, wholesome young woman, the best type of American girl, as unlike Daisy Miller as Seth is remote from the Howells and James young man. There is not an insipid character in the book. All Mr. Frederic's personages stand out distinct and independent, among the very best of them being Mr. Beckman, "the boss of Jay County." Mr. Beckman is a thoroughgoing Caucuser, a machine politician, up to all the tricks of the trade, but personally incorruptible. Whatever we may think of the Caucus, it is well to know that there are such men. Mr. Beckman's comments to Seth on the case of Albert Fairchild, who had sixteen thousand dollars on him when he was murdered, explain his position. "N' d'yer knaow what he was goin' to dew with that money? No, yer daont! He was agoin' to buy me. I wouldn't say this afore outsiders. I dunnao's I'd say it to you ef your paper wa'n't so dum fond o' pitchin' into me fer a boss 'n' a machine man, ez yer call it, 'n' that kine o' thing. Yer brother hed the same ideo o' me that your paper's got. He was wrong. They tell us ther' air some country caounties in th' State where money makes the mare gao. But Jay ain't one of 'em. Yer brother wanted to git into Congress. Ther' was nao chance fer him in New York City. He came up here, 'n' he worked things pooty fine, I'm baoun to say, but he slipped up on me. Bribes may dew in yer big cities, but they won't go down in Jay. I don't b'lieve they's ez much of it down anywhere ez folks think, nuther." There is plenty of good stuff in Seth's Brother's Wife, and it is by no means all of one kind.

His Sisters is one of those books which may be described as "ower bad for blessing, and ower good for banning." Ralph Marston was left in charge of his sisters on the death of his father. He married one of them badly, and the other one well. The bad husband kept two establishments, and assured his wife that he kept only one. The reprehensible stockbroker in question, Albert Mapleton by name, was outwitted by a rather shady sort of solicitor, whose villanies were nevertheless mysterious, shallow, and sometimes wholly unaccountable. James Littiman indulged himself in the luxury of wickedness for no better reason, that we can discover, than to see whether it would agree with him. It did not, but gave him a kind of moral dyspepsia, which must have been almost as uncomfortable as the physical variety. Clara Mapleton, the stockbroker's wife, had a faithful lover, who always turned up when he was wanted, but never transgressed the bounds of decorum. The stockbrokers seem to be taking the place in fiction once tenanted by the baronets; and it would be an agreeable change if the jobbers were given their turn. We have not a word to say in favour of Mr. Mapleton, who should certainly not have broken the Seventh Commandment merely because he was bored at home. Moreover, while we should have regretted the necessity for selection, his wife was a less tedious person than his mistress. But even Mr. Mapleton might have been worse; and as for Mr. Littiman, though he plays the villain with almost abjectly conventional fidelity—smiling sardonically in private, and grinning genially in public—his worst crime was the negative one of not interfering between husband and wife. Eustace Verrall, the virtuous follower of Mrs. Mapleton, ought not to be despised, and his friend Charles Sumner's flirtation with the landlady's daughter is fit to be read in the school-room, or even the nursery. There are people who may find pleasure in the society of His Sisters—"glad souls without reproach or blot, who know what's wrong, and read it not," if we may slightly alter the words of the poet. Mr. Earl's moral tone is unquestionably high, his religious sentiments are unimpeachable, and, compared with most novelists, he may be said to write English. The following passage is a good, by which we mean a very good, specimen of his style. It portrays Mr. Ralph Marston, when circumstances made him reflect that he had not done quite enough to secure the happiness of "his sisters":—

> A wise man comes out of such a period of mental anarchy as a nation emerges from a revolution—with ideas reconstituted on a sounder basis; with beliefs from which what is false has been rejected, while what is true in them has been confirmed; with a juster knowledge of self and of the relations of things; with a fuller confidence in what is good, and a deeper insight into the subtle fashions in which it is wont to be mixed with evil; in a word he comes out humbler, stronger, and more experienced.

If this be Mr. Earl's first story, we recommend him to be a little more lively another time, not to take himself and his art quite so seriously, to remember that novel-readers may be instructed, but must be amused. Meanwhile His Sisters can be confidently recommended to the numerous and unhappy class of persons who "want something to read." It may do them good, and cannot possibly do them harm.

The Plan of Campaign is a story of real power, and makes a great advance upon Disenchantment. Miss Mabel Robinson is an ardent politician, and her politics are not those of the Saturday Review. That, of course, is not a matter for literary criticism, and we must do Miss Robinson the justice of admitting that she has made a conscientious, if not a very successful, effort to represent both sides of the Irish question. But her method of procedure is open to very serious objection from the artistic point of view. When Mr. Disraeli wrote a political novel—a performance in which, at his best, he excelled all mankind—he introduced a number of real personages under fictitious names. But then the real names of leading statesmen disappeared for the most part from view, and events in his stories took the course which they had actually taken, whether in the House of Commons or elsewhere. Mr. Anthony Trollope, whose political stories were comparative failures, brought in the tiresome trick of mixing up fable with fact in such a way as to spoil history without making good fiction. Miss Robinson follows and exaggerates the bad example of Mr. Trollope. Her story is recent enough to satisfy the shortest memory, for it is mostly contemporaneous with the last Session of Parliament. Her account of the manner in which the famous Plan was concocted is extremely bright and clever, though indeed it required no great sagacity to induce men to combine for the reduction of their own rents. But Mr. Titus Orr, the inventor of the plan, who, by the way, was only half a Nationalist; Mr. Richard Talbot, the hero of the book, and apparently the leader of the Nationalist party; and several other gentlemen of the same kidney, are mentioned side by side with Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, and Mr. Davitt. It is not difficult to discover the identity of Lord Roeglass, the absentee landlord who refuses all reductions, evicts his tenants wholesale, and is execrated by all parties alike. But the prototype of Lord Roeglass has happily not been murdered either by an eminent Dublin photographer or anybody else. These confusions are tiresome to the reader, and are also, to speak mildly, not in the best possible taste. Miss Robinson would do well to exercise in future her undoubted talents on themes more properly belonging to the novelist, and to avoid trenching on the province of special correspondents or Society journals. It is impossible to read about Talbot without being reminded of a very notorious personage not altogether fitted to be the hero of a lady's novel, and indeed the whole book is permeated with this disagreeably personal flavour. Apart from this serious drawback it is, as we have said, a clever piece of work. It opens badly, for the reader is only puzzled by Miss Molyneux's big, stupid dinner party, and Mr. Kinsella's invariable habit of "booming" when other people only speak is monotonously tiresome. This is Miss Robinson at her worst; for, whether it be to her credit or not, she cannot give a decently good description of a social entertainment. She may be seen at her best in the character of Lord Dromore, the impoverished, scrupulous, honourable, argumentative landlord, who will defend his own class against all comers, and yet stand up even for the League if he thinks it unfairly attacked. Lord Dromore's tenants offered him fifty per cent., which is two per cent. less than the interest on his mortgage:—

> "Fifty per cent.!" repeated Dromore scornfully. "Fifty per cent., and why? Simply because Ireton's tenants got a reduction of fifty in the Court! My tenants couldn't, they know that as well as I do. I refused them with an easy conscience; but I'll tell you, Titus, I didn't offer ten as clear. The blackguards think I waited in hope they'd come down in their demands; on my soul it was to see whether I couldn't offer 'em twenty. I spent days and days trying to square the circle, for, between ourselves, thirty was about a fair figure. They tried to cheat me out of twenty, I tried to cheat them out of twenty; if I'd offered thirty, they'd have jumped at it, but we should have had nothing but encumbrances to live upon; they won't take ten, and if I grant more I haven't a penny to lose."

Miss Robinson's own plan of campaign, if we may so designate her plot, is not extensive. It all turns on the amatory misfortunes of Mr. Talbot, and the faithlessness of Miss Elinor Featherston, who flirts alternately with him and Lord Roeglass, finally marrying a third party and conducting himself indiscreetly with many others. Miss Featherston is far from being that paragon of propriety which all Irish girls are supposed to be. Miss Robinson describes evictions vividly, but that form of literary business has been slightly overdone. She is a bad hand at a murder, which is perhaps not much against her; and there is no sufficient reason why such a grotesque creature as Considine should be the assassin. Unlike most lady novelists, however, she draws men much better than women, and Lucian Orr, the emphatic, rather gasping, little professor, is a capital sketch. The Plan of Campaign has great merits; but Miss Robinson should avoid slovenliness, and should have some respect for her readers. She describes Lord Roeglass in the same page as living in Norfolk Street and in Park Lane. She makes Talbot get out of a cab into St. Stephen's Hall, which is only approachable on foot. The House of Commons, with whose usages she assumes much familiarity, rises in her pages at seven on Wednesday, instead of six. Her Latin displays itself in the phrase "Nul nisi bonum," her French in "autre temps, autre mœurs," and her English in "the elder ladies who quite honestly he thought extremely nice." No doubt Miss Robinson knows better. But she should be more careful.

SCIENTIFIC TEXT-BOOKS.

THE Microscope, in Theory and Practice (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.) is a translation of part of the well-known German work of Professors Nægeli and Schwendener. From the preface to this English edition we gather that the translators are Mr. Crisp, Secretary of the Royal Microscopical Society, and Mr. Mayall, one of the Editors of the Society's journal. The present result seems decidedly to supply a blank in our microscopical literature, especially in regard to the explanation and technical treatment of the theory of the microscope. None of our English writers, so far as we are aware, deal adequately with the interpretation of microscopical images, or the theory of microscopic observation generally; nor have they systematically discussed the phenomena of diffraction and polarization as related to microscopy, or set forth the optical principles on which the construction of objectives and eyepieces, &c. is properly based. In the present edition of the German Professors' treatise, the "Theory of the Microscope" alone occupies 116 pages of closely reasoned matter, much of it mathematical, and the rest so technical as to be of no interest to general readers, but all evincing a thorough mastery of the scientific principles. The "Theory of Microscopic Observation" again occupies 67 pages, including a detailed account of interference phenomena, and such matters as oblique illumination, differences of level, air-bubbles and oil globules in water, various membranes, and so on. Other points elsewhere discussed are the modes of testing optical power, spherical and chromatic aberration, the measurement and drawing of microscopic objects, the preparation and preservation of specimens. The concluding part is devoted to polarization, and deals scientifically and very fully with its phenomena in so far as they bear practically upon the microscope. The editors have wisely crowned their work with an index.

The Student's Handbook to the Microscope (Roper & Drowley) is another addition to the smaller scientific manuals which now abound. It is designed to assist practical students in their selection and management of an instrument. Conveying much useful information and several welcome hints, the book nevertheless is somewhat suggestive of advertising certain London opticians.

We are glad to see a new edition of Professor Nicholson's Introductory Text-Book of Zoology (Blackwood & Sons). A special point in the author's works is that the Invertebrata are not relatively overlooked by the devotion of too much space to the backboned animals. In this edition certain of the larger groups of animals are arranged according to the most recent views of scientific writers. The book is well equipped with woodcuts, a glossary, and an index, and has the further recommendation of a style freed from technicalities.

In the Elementary Chemistry (Cambridge: University Press), by Messrs. Pattison Muir and Slater, we have the companion-volume to Practical Chemistry, issued by the same press. Probably in no branch of natural science is the practical and experimental part of study so obviously an incessant duty as in chemistry, if real knowledge is the object. This principle our authors seem to have due regard for, so as not only to present certain conclusions derived from and resting upon veritable facts, but also the chemical facts and data from which the science is deduced. The book is not a catalogue or classification of the properties of individual elements and compounds, but rather sketches the methods of chemical science, its general laws, and the detailed study of natural occurrences on which it rests. In arrangement and treatment we detect nothing to blame, but in several parts much to praise—e.g. the discussion of the molecular and atomic theory. Into the speculation of the one universal element our authors do not think fit, so far as we can find, to pry; they deal with science, whose aim, they tell us, is to see things as they are.

The Practical Chemistry (Cambridge: University Press) by Messrs. Pattison Muir and Carnegie is intended to accompany pari passu the Elementary Chemistry. It contains sets of experiments proceeding from the simplest to the most intricate, carefully arranged and described in detail, and such that they can mostly be performed with the apparatus in any ordinary laboratory. There are some useful tables appended, including a neatly arranged set of logarithms and anti-logarithms, and a good index.

Professor Hartley's Course of Quantitative Analysis for Students (Macmillan & Co.) bears marks of experience and skill. We must, however, blame both author and publisher for publishing such a work without, not only an index, but even a table of contents. About twenty pages are devoted to manipulation, forming the best of possible introductions, and about as many more to examples carefully worked out. After a set of "Simple Estimations," also neatly set forth, we have "Volumetric and Technical Analysis," occupying about the middle third of the book; and the remainder seems to be taken up with methods of analysing alloys and complex minerals. There are some useful notes for students interspersed.

Elements of Chemistry, by Ira Remsen (Macmillan & Co.), is another of the well-got-up text-books which we owe to our Transatlantic cousins. The order in which the various subjects treated of are arranged, the division into chapters and subdivision into neat, compact paragraphs, all evince the practised instructor; but one of the author's leading suggestions in the preface as to the construction of apparatus scarcely seems suited to class-teaching. The chapter dealing with the atomic theory and the valence of an element must be pronounced admirable—brief and terse, yet clear and complete. There is a good index subjoined to the book.

Mr. Lilley's Bench Book for Test Tube Work in Chemistry (Hamilton, Adams, & Co.) seems a trustworthy guide in beginning the practical work of analysis. So succinct, however, are the directions and classified results that few of the reactions could be adequately understood unless this handbook be supplemented by vivâ voce instruction to accompany each experiment.

In Experimental Chemistry, Part IV. (Longmans & Co.), Professor Reynolds completes his course of Experimental Chemistry, and introduces the student to the great organic division of the science. Under the former head this volume deals with the study (natural as well as systematic) of carbon compounds. Many chapters are devoted to the discussion of such analytic and synthetic operations as throw light on the nature of organic structures, one good and sufficient reason being that "this kind of inquiry is a source of keen intellectual pleasure to thoughtful students" and of "high educational value" when legitimately pursued. The work concludes with valuable notes on the qualitative and quantitative analysis of organic compounds and the determination of molecular weight. As he has completed his "Course," we ask why Professor Reynolds has not had an index drawn up embracing all the four parts?

Sir William Aitken's On the Animal Alkaloids (Lewis) embodies some leading results of recent investigation into diseases which are due to physiological processes going on during life. One of the recent articles of belief of the advanced medical scientists is "the poisoning or intoxication of the animal economy with its own products." The first point is to confirm the incessant elaboration of alkaloids during the vital processes—a fact accepted by learned specialists in France, Germany, and England. In plain English a man, for example, may become poisoned by the accumulation within his organism of certain chemical compounds, due to incessant elementary disintegration. The author appears to bring under this category all the "constitutional" diseases of which rheumatism and gout are the types.

The Laws and Definitions connected with Chemistry and Heat (Rivingtons), by Mr. Durrant, seems mainly intended to assist those reading for examination purposes. After arranging and summarizing the most useful laws, and explaining the technical terms, the book tabulates in convenient form the chief tests for the usual metals and "acid radicals" which are likely to be of use for the Woolwich or Sandhurst entrance papers. The last chapter consists of a good set of specimens of analyses written fully out.

An Elementary Treatise on Light and Heat (Rolfe Brothers), by Dr. F. W. Aveling, seems to be well adapted for the purpose indicated—namely, passing the London Matriculation and the Oxford and Cambridge Local Examinations. The woodcut diagrams are numerous, and have the excellent quality of being easily reproduced by the student. There are several sets of suitable exercises to be worked by the reader, and the answers are given.

PRINKIPO, SOUTH AUSTRALIA, AND THE WEST INDIES.*

WHEN Mr. Cox was American Minister to Turkey, he made up his mind to spend one summer at Prinkipo, where he could enjoy fresh air, beautiful scenery, and fishing, at the same time that he was within easy reach of his Legation by the steam-launch with which Congress was "good enough" to furnish him. The choice he made for his villeggiatura was a happy one. "My summer there," he writes, "was a revel in the very heart of nature." There was very little "roughing it" to be encountered. His house was pretty and comfortable, and his supply of food good and abundant; milk and butter were brought across the channel from the farms on the slopes of the Asiatic mountains opposite. The caïques which whitened with their sails the lake-like sea brought almost to his door the most tempting fruits. Mr. Cox is a genial sage of the optimist school, and he evidently holds with Thackeray that > true Philosophers, methinks,

> Who love all kinds of natural beauties,
> Should love good victuals and good drinks.

"They are of various kinds, but there is one peerless kind. No fruit has ever been grown upon other parts of the earth equal to the fruit which September welcomes here, chief of which is the grape known as the tchaouch uzum. The tchaouch is of pure gold, and of plum-like size and rotundity. Its very pronunciation makes the mouth moisten. Amber is not more beautiful in colour. It seems bursting with a fruity bloom, and gives such aroma and flavour that the bees follow it into the very penetralia of our salle-à-manger." Lamb, mutton, beef, chickens are all as good as they can be; and there is a bean called bamia, "which is more unctuous and toothsome than the marrowfat pea. What could we wish for beside?" If, in addition to these tender viands and juicy fruits, fish was the luxury desired, there were mullet, turbot, mackerel, and "a dainty, shining, nameless little beauty, quite delicate even without sauce." The people were as good as the provender. In his summer holiday the amiable diplomatist never met from old or young one act or look of discourtesy, and he firmly believes that a bad boy is a being that may be sought for, but that is not to be found, in Greece. "Love begets love," and we suspect that it was our author's own kindness which won for him the good will of all with whom he came in contact. He says that he is not "unobservant of humour." He might add that he has a pleasant vein of humour himself. His chapter on asses is delightfully amusing. Would that we could quote more of his apologia for those meek children of misery! He has studied their habits closely. He has come in frequent contact with them "in and out of Congress." He appreciates and he can interpret their music. He can even diagnose the ear-benumbing tones of the amorous and jocund jackass. "The melody begins with an exaggerated sound of asthma that rasps the soul, then a squeaky sibillation, then a roar as of forty thousand hungry lions of the desert. Then comes a process of suction and emission." We have not space for more. But we assure our readers that we have seldom come across a musical critique more pleasantly and understandingly written. Our author tells a capital story of how a "grizzly" was worsted by one of these ponies of Jerusalem. Before he dismisses the subject of donkeys he has a word to say of the much-maligned mule, who served so gallantly in the Civil War that he took rank in the quartermaster's department, and became a "brevet horse." One of Mr. Cox's sly sarcasms is to speak of Hungary as "an inland country, and therefore, like our own, without a navy." Within our limits we can do little beyond calling attention to the author's interesting remarks on the history, scenery, and antiquities of Prinkipo, Halki, and the other Princes Isles. We can only briefly allude to his clever, elaborate, and, on the whole, just summary of the character of the late Lord Dalling. He greatly admires his diplomatic talent as evinced in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and maintains that "the subtle crystallization which he there produced remains like a wall of adamant across the line of our policy in the Isthmus," and that "our puny statesmen have tilted in vain against this wall with their javelins of straw." Of his diplomatic morality and of his truthfulness he speaks less favourably; and, on the authority of the president of the Armenian college in Constantinople, he tells a story of our former versatile and vivacious Ambassador to Turkey which we cannot bring ourselves to quote and which we would fain disbelieve. The proofs of Mr. Cox's book have been very carelessly revised. We have ὀμραλός for ὀμφαλός, ad unco naso, Maygar for Magyar, rossingnol for rossignol, &c. A propos of nightingales, Mr. Cox gives us a pretty description which we had intended to quote of a bulbul which came into his garden at day-break, and "made love to the roses like a true oriental." Yes, "he made love to a whole garden or harem of roses—the profligate!"

Mrs. Dominic Daly, who bears a name widely known and honoured throughout our Antipodean colonies, has in Digging, Squatting, and Pioneering Life given us a pleasant and cheerful account of her doings and sufferings in the northern territory of South Australia from 1870 to 1886; and her admirable prefatory chapter on the early history of North Australian colonization is so simple and lucid that a reader with only the average ignorance of an Englishman about our colonies will find it easy to understand and to appreciate what follows. It is only occasionally that the author taxes our ears by such phrases as "that genus homo the bogtrotter." She tells her story generally in a plain straightforward style, without any affectations of elegance and without any attempts at smartness. In her travels, and even at some of the stations where she was for some time what may be called settled, Mrs. Daly encountered many hardships, and witnessed, if she did not personally endure, many sorrows and underwent many sad experiences. Yet she is uniformly cheerful, hopeful, resolute, and, if we may say so, not only without dispraise, but with commendation, manly. If on a voyage she can get nothing for breakfast but sherry and cheese, she does not like it, but she is far too wise to grumble. Snakes and alligators disgust her, but they do not appal her. Even cockroaches and white ants would never coax from her a shriek or a scream. Blanket, or iron-clad food—i.e. tinned meat—she does not find toothsome, but she makes it into hashes and curries, and eats it with a thankful heart. But she makes one grievous gastronomical mistake. She cannot bring herself to eat an iguana. Now the flesh of this reptile is very sweet and tender, and is an exquisite luxury to sojourners in a country where there is no decent bread, and where the staff of life is coarse, tough, and fresh-killed beef. The author tells with evident glee how by a "strategic move" Binmook and Tommy were captured and put in irons for a piece of wanton cruelty committed by some other natives, and how they were kept as imprisoned hostages until the real offenders were given up. She has an Englishwoman's sense of fairness and humanity, and she thinks that the aborigines should be treated with judicious kindness, as well as with strict justice. She is afraid, however, that they are "not amenable to civilization, and are barely capable of receiving and retaining the truths of Christianity." "Troubles," she writes in another place, "with the natives, alas! seem to increase, instead of decreasing. The annals of 1886 teem with murders of white men, and attacks by the aborigines, both on land and sea." She is afraid that there is truth in the reports that white men who have been seized by these savages are held in lifelong captivity. Of the virtues and vices of the diggers Mrs. Daly writes in a manner which reminds one of Bret Harte, and she tells a pretty story of these rough fellows begging the loan of her baby to sit on their knees while they were playing at poker. She gives a sad picture, though the artist herself is not moved to sadness, of the isolation of pioneering life at Port Darwin. She had never heard, for instance, of the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War until a budget of newspapers came to tell them that Sedan had been fought and Paris taken. The almost insuperable difficulties which British pluck and enterprise, however, vanquished in the construction of the famous Overland telegraph are looked back upon in a spirit of just exultation. Among the many items of discouragement for the pioneers of this magnificent work was the fear that the natives would cut down the poles in order to steal the wire; "but a wily electrician was beforehand with a plan to prevent this. He gave electric shocks ad libitum all along the line. The sudden application of galvanism to bands of savages may fairly rank as a new sensation, and they, thinking the wire held this strange and mysterious power, wisely let it alone." This work completed, Port Darwin is no longer a terra incognita or a mere geographical expression. With the formation of an Australian Brindisi it will doubtless become the port for landing all the European mails for all the ports of Australia. When we were in the middle of Mrs. Daly's most interesting and instructive work we read Lord Brassey's timely warning of the folly of leaving in its present absolutely defenceless state a port which in time of war would become the base of operations for our cruisers protecting the trade between Queensland, India, China, and all Europe. Let us hope that this warning will not, like so many of our warnings, be acted upon too feebly or too late.

Mrs. Granville Layard's Through the West Indies tells readers of the late Mr. Trollope's book on the same subject very little that they have not already learned. The thinness of her matter is eked out with extracts from H. N. Coleridge's Six Months in the West Indies, which was written more than half a century ago. The only passages we can find to quote are the brilliant and epigrammatic observation of the author's fellow-traveller who, on hearing half way up a hill the low plaintive note of a bird, remarked, "He is praying for rain"; and a sentence in which Mrs. Layard seems to confuse quality with quantity. She was much struck with the "inferior quality of the meat in St. Vincent" because one day a tiny joint, which could not have weighed more than 4½ lbs., was brought to table, and she was gravely assured that it was a leg of mutton. A small leg of mutton, we suppose, may sometimes be as tough or woolly as a large one; but, however things may be in the West Indies, wise folks in this country do not consider that the exiguity of a joint of mutton foretokens "the inferior quality of the meat."

MR. FIDLER'S book gives gratifying evidence of how the old order has changed in the relation of the science to the practice of engineering. Time was when a sharp line separated the theorist from the practical engineer. The practitioner looked askance at theory; it was a curious mathematical exercise that might perhaps interest people who understood it; for his part he made no such pretension. A formula was something of a fetich; he could not trace its origin; he had but a vague notion of its force. It might help or it might hurt him; as often as not he misapplied it, and it accordingly did hurt him, and sent him back with more distaste for theory than ever to the exercise of his practical instinct. It is only fair to add that his instinct was generally sound, or at least safe. He rarely made grand blunders; his bridges, as a rule, stood, and what we have to record against him is not so much a list of killed and wounded as a catalogue of wasted material and uselessly sunk capital. The theorist was himself in great measure to blame. Sometimes he built a theory on false or insufficient experimental foundation. Often in attempting to simplify he ignored conditions that were really essential. Oftener still in aiming at generality he made his work so complex as to repel any one but a mathematical expert. There were a few distinguished exceptions, but, as a rule, the theorist had his head in the clouds, the practical man grubbed along in the valleys, and the two were seldom within speaking distance.

Of late years a marked change for the better has come about, partly through the struggle for existence in an overcrowded profession, partly through the usage which is now common, though still far from universal, of giving the young engineer a college training in the science of his subject before he enters his apprenticeship. As a result, the practice of engineering is becoming scientific and the science practical. The rule-of-thumb engineer is still to be found, even in high places, but he is being fast pushed out by men who have learnt that theory is, after all, only glorified common sense. Mr. Fidler belongs to the new school, and for them he has written a book which, though not quite free from blemishes, is an admirable account of the theory and process of bridge design, at once scientific and thoroughly practical. It is a book such as we have a right to expect from one who is himself a substantial contributor to the theory of the subject as well as a bridge-builder of repute.

The first part treats of the statics of bridges—the bending and shearing stresses to which the loads give rise. Some of the introductory matter might have been omitted with advantage. One does not look for a definition of force or a statement of the parallelogram of forces in a volume which is to discuss the theory of continuous beams any more than one looks for the multiplication table in a treatise on logarithms. If the student who takes up Mr. Fidler's book does not know the elements of statics, he had better put it down until he has mastered them. Had the alphabet of mechanics been ever so well given here, it would have been out of place; but, in fact, it is not well given. Mr. Fidler exemplifies the truth that a writer may be clear and skilful in the application of dynamical principles to actual problems, and yet a poor exponent of the fundamental concepts of dynamics. The chapter on Bending Moments is particularly good, and is illustrated—as, indeed, the whole book is—by a large number of excellent diagrams. The treatment of shearing stresses is perhaps less complete. The shearing force in a beam is well explained, in one of its aspects, as the rate of variation of bending moment per unit of length measured along the span; the other aspect, in which the shearing force is regarded as a vertical force tending to make one part of the beam at any imaginary section slip down past the other part, is comparatively neglected, and no diagrams of shearing forces are given. In speaking of the ultimate strength of bars broken by bending the author refers to the well-known fact that what Rankine has called the modulus of rupture of a material is greater than its strength to resist direct pull and push as a thing which has never been explained. In truth, however, there is no mystery about this; it is intelligible enough when one considers how the distribution of stress over a vertical section becomes modified as the successive layers, beginning with those furthest from the neutral axis, are strained beyond the limit of elasticity.

The second part deals with the comparative anatomy of bridges and their theoretical weight. Here the author is at his best. The points of analogy and contrast between ordinary beams and girders, parabolic girders, arches, cantilevers, suspension bridges, polygonal frames, and composite trusses are indicated with much suggestive comment. It is shown how the conception of a girder as a beam carrying a load in virtue of its resistance to bending and shearing is related to the conception of a truss built up of members which carry the load in virtue of their individual resistance to direct pull or push. "These two aspects represent the ideas which have formed the basis of English and American practice respectively." In England the simple beam became a plate girder, and then diagonal bracing took the place of the web. In America bridges were first built as frames of timber, r of iron and timber in combination. Both lines of evolution have led to the modern frame girder of iron or steel, but the old difference in fundamental ideas may still be traced:—

> In American girders each member is treated as having a separate and simple function to perform; but in England, although the subdivision of function is allowed in theory, yet in practice all the members are rivetted up together so as to make the girder as far as possible a rigid whole, resembling in some degree the solid beam from which it is derived.

This is followed by a valuable discussion of the flexure of beams and the theory of continuous girders, based on a method which the author published some years ago in a paper read before the Institution of Civil Engineers. The process is wholly a geometrical and graphic one, and for that reason will no doubt commend itself especially to engineers whose algebraic education has been neglected. But even the student of Clapeyron, Bressé, and Heppel will find much to admire in the easy simplicity with which the author has treated problems that are usually ranked amongst the most intricate parts of the theory of engineering.

The third part, on the strength of materials, opens with a discussion of the theoretical strength of columns, which forms by far the most complete and satisfactory account of this difficult subject hitherto published in any text-book. Here, again, the author is travelling over ground which he has himself helped to explore. Euler's theory, applicable to perfectly straight and symmetrical struts, compressed by forces which are applied rigorously along the axis, is first stated. It is then shown how the theory requires modification when we deal with practical struts, which are never perfectly symmetrical in their elasticity, nor loaded quite axially. The results of old and new experiments on the ultimate strength of columns are very fully stated and exhibited by diagrams, and are applied to furnish constants appropriate to the modified theory. The formulas of Gordon and others are compared with them; and, finally, tables are given for various shapes of cross-section which will be of much use in facilitating the practical design of compression members in bridges or other structures. The whole of this section is admirable, and it forms a most welcome addition to engineering literature. Tensile strength and the strength of joints is next considered; after which the author attacks the question of what stresses may be safely allowed, and what influence variations of the load produce on the ultimate strength of materials. Engineers have for long been more or less alive to the fact that a varied stress is more destructive than a permanent stress of equal intensity; that metals suffer what is called fatigue under repeated applications or variations of stress. Bend a bar repeatedly backwards and forwards, for instance, so that its fibres are alternately extended and compressed, and it will break after a certain number of bendings, though the strain is less than would have caused rupture if steadily applied. Are we, then, to allow a wider margin of strength—or, as engineers say, a larger factor of safety—when we are dealing, in the design of a bridge, with that part of the load which is alternately applied and removed—the rolling load—than we allow for a load which is always present? At the instance of the German Government the late Professor Wöhler carried out a series of experiments on the destructive effects of variation of stress. The research was conducted with truly German patience; some of the tests lasted for eleven years, and involved the alternation of load and no load, or of tension and compression, thirty, forty, and even a hundred million times. Wöhler's results are authoritative, and they touch engineering practice in a vital point. How they should affect it, and what their physical interpretation is, are questions which have been widely discussed, and on which the last word has by no means been said. Mr. Fidler's treatment of these is the least happy part of his work. He confuses the issue by attempting to explain the destructive results of varied stress, investigated by Wöhler, with the kinetic effect of a suddenly varied load. The kinetic effect of a "live" load is a subject which requires separate consideration, and the author has given a good account of it; but he has unfortunately introduced it in connexion with Wöhler's experiments on fatigue, the conditions of which excluded any substantial action of this kind.

The last section treats of the design of bridges in detail, beginning with ordinary girders of uniform depth, and going on through various forms to the type known as the cantilever, which has of late sprung into favour through its selection for the mammoth bridge which Mr. Baker has designed and Mr. Arrol is building over the Firth of Forth. In a cantilever bridge stiff brackets stretch out from the piers, but not so far as to meet, and the gap between them is filled by a separate girder, which rests on the brackets' ends. The type is ancient; it is found in China and the wilds of North America, but it is novel in modern practice. At the Forth there are two great spans, each 1,700 feet wide. Two brackets, joined back to back, tower above each pier to a height of 343 feet. No staging can be erected between the piers, and the brackets must be built out, step by step, equally on both sides to preserve the balance. Bare figures and description fail to touch the imagination so as to do justice to the extraordinary character and gigantic proportions of this work. One must stand on the central pier at Inchgarvie, and look up among the great steel tubes which rise higher than the dome of St. Paul's, and out along the projecting arms where pigmy-seeming cranes and workmen are slowly adding plate to plate, to appreciate the truth of Mr. Fidler's remark that the Forth Bridge is "unequalled by any other work of human construction, whether as regards the boldness of its design or the magnitude of the natural difficulties that have to be surmounted in its execution." The book closes with a chapter on Wind-pressure, which is in great part a just lament that we have really no accurate knowledge of the force the wind may exert on large surfaces. A small board put up to measure wind-pressure may show a force of fifty pounds' weight on the square foot, or even more; but are such pressures ever felt simultaneously over every part of a large area, such as the side of a long girder? Probably not, as any one will admit who has stood in a cornfield at the edge of a cliff when a gale has been blowing from the sea, and has watched how the stalks are bowed now here and now there, but never all at once for any long distance. It is scarcely creditable to the great engineering Societies that we should be left to guess at the answer to a question so important and so capable of experimental solution. We notice one important omission in Mr. Fidler's comprehensive treatise. He is fond of graphic methods, almost to a fault, yet he makes no mention of the method of reciprocal figures for determining the stresses in bridge frames—a favourite process with all engineers who are familiar with its use. It is not so widely known as it should be, and, for that reason, one regrets all the more its absence from a book which is likely to find, and deserves to find, a place in the library of every student of engineering.

THE IMPERIAL GAZETTEER OF INDIA.*

If the old proverb be true that we can call no man happy till we know the manner of his death, it may be equally true that we can pronounce no series of volumes to be good until we have seen its index. Sir W. Hunter, in his last volume, enables us to pronounce judgment on this important issue. An index with frequent misprints, omissions, or needless repetitions would have been very disappointing. But as far as we can judge from a leisurely survey, the fourteenth volume is an excellent guide to its precursors. It is comparatively easy to arrange in due sequence strings of names and places, whether they represent towns and Sub-divisions or Capitals of historic fame. Even here the labour of collation, of preserving some uniformity of spelling, and of correcting the press, must have been enormous. It is just the kind of work at which the hand is apt to grow careless and the eye dim. Any reader will now have little difficulty in finding all he wants to know about divers celebrities, ancient and modern, from Alexander the Great to Amir Khan the Pindari leader; and he may range over history, from the battlefield where Porus was defeated to the scene of our recent engagements with Dacoits in Burma. Names, it may be said, easily catch the sight. With subjects, customs, products, it is different. But here the plan and outline, as well as the execution, are most commendable. To the historical student, bent on investigating the traditions of Asoka or the policy of Akbar the Great; to the administrator requiring a sketch of land tenures or the first principles of Settlements; to the commercial speculator needing information about coal, iron, and copper; to the engineer, who may reasonably doubt whether the canals made by Ali Mardan Khan surpass or equal the Solani Aqueduct and the gigantic works of the Bari Doab; to the sportsman and naturalist asking about the localities where tigers abound and black buck are as plentiful as rabbits; to the archæologist classifying and distinguishing between no less than ten kinds of architecture; to the missionary, to the merchant, and to the member of Parliament, this Index will be a mine of wealth. The Gazetteer will, of course, not render other Indian works superfluous; and by unskilful hands or perverse intellects it may be splendidly misused. But it marks an era in statistics and presents Blue-Books in a novel and attractive shape. Errors will be detected and some of the facts and figures will soon require revision. We have already noticed the cardinal error by which Indian currency is converted into English coinage. There is an idea in some quarters that, if you only express Oriental terms in Occidental language, lay stress on analogies, get over fundamental distinctions of race and physique, and talk grandly about "nationalities," you may easily turn Hindus and Mohammedans into genuine Anglo-Saxons, and govern India on the purest democratic principles. Sir William Hunter, though he wisely keeps clear of politics, is sometimes disposed to sink India altogether. In the preface to his last volume he very properly notices the valuable aid in the compilation of his Index given by two gentlemen, one a late Fellow of Queen's College, and the other a B.A. of Balliol College, Oxford. Reading this, we might fancy that the Director-General of Statistics not finding any civilians fitted for such a task had had recourse to two Oxford dons. We are not certain whether the Fellow of Queen's is the same person as Mr. H. J. S. Cotton, Secretary to the Board of Revenue in the Lower Provinces. But we should be glad to think that the Index had been prepared or revised by some civilian, covenanted or uncovenanted, conversant with Indian technicalities.

The late Dean Stanley used to delight in a long roll of Biblical names and titles, and would extract meaning from a catalogue passed over by others with contempt. In the Gazetteer we find, as might be expected, a good deal about population and caste. In some cases castes are explained by the use of English equivalents. In others we have nothing but the local names, and no Englishman, however wide his experience or retentive his memory, can be expected to retain but a fraction of these Indian divisions and sub-divisions. Nor did it fall within Sir W. Hunter's province to write about strange tribal customs and peculiarities. Books might be written about the rights, privileges, and exclusiveness of caste; whether certain septs can intermarry, or only drink from the same brass pot and smoke the same hookah; how far Mohammedans in some provinces have adopted Hindu practices; and a hundred other topics. Nothing is more bewildering to a newcomer than this fertile subject of discussion. Caste at one time seems as rigid as steel; at another as elastic as india-rubber. But though this work deals in detail only with the marriage customs of aboriginal tribes, and is limited to the enumeration of numbers in the case of Hindus, there is much that is suggestive in mere numbers. Brahmans in some districts are twenty-five per cent. of the Hindu population. It is an obvious mistake to call them priests. Many of the best secular professions are open to Brahmans. They are good soldiers, judges, accountants, pleaders, ministers of State. Generally speaking, we should say that a large proportion of the Hindus belong to the higher castes of Brahmans, Rajputs, Kayasts, and so forth. But agriculturists, artisans, and mechanics, muster in force. We read of tailors, washermen, gardeners, oilmen, goldsmiths, barbers, carpenters, by thousands in a district. It must not be imagined that in every instance the son of a barber or a gardener follows his father's occupation. He may obtain some employment or salaried situation. As a rule, where land is inherited and sub-divided sons do follow the occupation of their fathers; handle the plough, spread the net, drive the bullock-cart. But there are frequent exceptions, and we should not pledge ourselves to any invariable rules. Ambition, intelligence, and energy often escape from the trammels of caste, as far as the occupation and business of life are concerned. Archdeacon Farrar may be surprised to learn that spirits were manufactured and that vintners and spirit-sellers flourished long before the advent of his wicked countrymen. No Anglo-Indian administrator created the caste of the Shaha or Shuri, or first taught innocent natives to manufacture arrack or toddy from the Mowa and the palm tree, or to make decoctions of hemp. Dram-drinking is proved to have been familiar and attractive in ancient Hindu times. During the Mohammedan rule the facilities for intemperance were far greater than in our own day. And nowhere is there more intoxication than in wild and uncivilized districts, such as Assam, the Central Provinces and others, where the noble savage wields his axe, burns down a whole hill-side in order to raise scanty crops from a few acres, and feasts and drinks heartily after a successful hunting expedition. Similarly a little attention to the statistics of these volumes would have prevented the propagation of some startling errors in a recent controversy as to the spread and character of Mohammedanism. A large proportion of the Mohammedan population is descended from the original invaders. These Mussulmans are known broadly as Pathans, Sheikhs, Mughals, and Saiyuds. But there are many who are the descendants of converts who renounced Hinduism under the pressure of the green flag, the sword, and the Koran. There is really no trustworthy evidence to show that, either by preaching or argument, Mullahs have recently been making proselytes to any alarming extent. Now and then a conversion causes a stir in Hindu circles. And it is quite possible that an increase in the Census returns of 1881, as compared with those of 1871, merely proves that Mohammedans, like Hindus and other tribes, increase and flourish under the peaceful British rule. It is significant, too, that in the Census for the Punjab of the former epoch the Mohammedan population is said to have increased slightly in one division, to be stationary in a second, and to have somewhat diminished in a third. In any case, Sir W. Hunter is no doubt correct at page 51 of his sixth volume, in saying that the population of India, loosely described as one of Hindus and Mohammedans, in reality is composed of "four well-marked elements." There are first the aborigines, Mlechhas as the pure Hindu called them, and their semi-Hinduized descendants. Secondly, we have the pure Aryan race, comprising Brahmans, Kshatriyas or Rajputs, and, we should be inclined to add, a few of the other higher and better castes. Then comes a mixed population known as Hindus, and made up of Aryan and non-Aryan elements. Lastly, of course, we have some fifty millions of Mohammedans, the descendants of those who for a time overthrew effete Hindu monarchies, but whose supremacy was over when we appeared on the scene. Nevertheless, it would not be wise to treat their position, associations, or claims with indifference, and we are glad to think that Mussulmans have now better chances of competing in the field of employment with the astute, pliant, and accommodating Hindu. About the wild aboriginal tribes these volumes tell us much—Kols, Bheels, Gonds, Santals; and it seems clear that, however marked the division between these barbarous people and the civilized Hindus, aboriginal worship and customs have been somewhat modified by the influence of the Shastras.

It must not be imagined that these volumes contain little except piles of statistics neatly arranged and classified, or dissertations, historical and ethnological, based on the returns of district officers and the researches of scholars and Pundits. On the contrary, to any reader skilled in the very useful arts of skipping, dipping, and selecting, any volume out of the thirteen will never fail to supply good material. In one page he will find a brief and graphic account of one of those tremendous operations by which nature vindicates her rights in tropical climates. In another we are reminded of one of those striking episodes in Indian history or the Sepoy Mutiny which never wearies by repetition; the defence of Arrah, the relief of Lucknow, the capture of Delhi. Here, we find a short dissertation on the occupations of the native community, as distinguished from its castes. There, an animated account of a native festival; a lament over the failure of a model agricultural farm; the change which diluvion and erosion have worked in the site of an historical battle-field; the picturesque shrine of a saint; the splendid mausoleum of an Emperor; the correct derivation of such a well-known word as Sindhu or the Indus; the prevalence of human sacrifices in outlying districts; the vow of a Brahman; the devotion of a Raja; the vagaries of a hill torrent; the rise of wages; the startling irregularities of the rain-fall; the revenue of a single populous district, equalling that of many a Crown colony; or the state and means of a petty Raja, who passes rich on some six thousand rupees, or as the Gazetteer will have it, on the magnificent revenue of 600*l.* a year.

The Governor-General who really took up this long-pending question in earnest, and who gave a definite and practical shape to a scheme which from press of work, wars, financial exigencies, and other obstructions, had been unavoidably postponed by his predecessor, was Lord Mayo. No doubt the original idea first started by the Court of Directors was that the Government and its Executive officers should know not only how much land revenue any district was to furnish, but what were the topographical, industrial, climatic, and ethnical characteristics of Divisions and Provinces. Naturally, as the work progressed, the area of inquiry was not diminished, nor was the labour lightened. But with every temptation for the compilers to deviate from arid schedules and dreary columns to green and pleasant pastures, one main object of the Gazetteer has been steadily kept in view. The work is emphatically a survey of statistics and a Gazetteer of Empire. The old sarcasm that the mementoes of British supremacy if it were to end suddenly would be empty beer-bottles, was at no time quite accurate, whether in the mouth of Edmund Burke or of the late Major Evans Bell. This compilation would still have attained to a very respectable size had it had reference only to lines of roads and railways laid out, bridges built, dispensaries opened, and schools maintained under British agency and out of Imperial funds. If the lists of native fairs and places of pilgrimage due to the working of economic causes or religious fervour amongst the native community is long and varied, that of bridges erected by civil and military engineers within the last thirty or forty years occupies four columns of the index. If we hear much of Buddhist temples, Hindu decorative art, Mohammedan marble tombs with exquisite tracery and sentences from the Koran cut in precious stones, we light on hospitals that range from Surat to Dacca, from Peshawar to Bangalore, and on lists of steam-mills and endless normal and village schools. Persons must be impervious to argument and reason who will take up, read, and lay down this compilation without admitting that Sir W. Hunter has produced a great work because he has had to deal with a good cause and a growing Empire.

SPONS' HOUSEHOLD MANUAL.*

PRESUMABLY there never was yet a housekeeper who did not at some time or another start a recipe-book for the delectation of herself and her belongings, mingling in fine confusion "receipts" (sic) for "pickling pork," "the proper way to wash lace curtains or not," a "certain cure for corns or chilblains," with directions for "making raisin wine to taste like champagne," or the right method of cooking an omelet or a fondu. In these MSS., if their owner is of a strictly methodical turn of mind, the unde derivatur of her "magic and spells" is usually carefully and minutely affixed; sometimes, as in the case of a recipe-book we wot of, the very date and occasion when the recipe was acquired being appended to it. But, if not of so particular a spirit, the author contents herself with copying, more or less correctly, the instructions, leaving their origin to be inferred at the good-will of her reader—a practice that has, ere now, led to a sharp passage-at-arms between rival owners of MSS. cookery-books, one of whom discovers some cherished and strictly private recipe of her own composition in No. 2's book, without so much as an initial to show it is not a happy thought of No. 2's, which discovery results usually in a splendid display of the "dulcis Amaryllidis ira," so praised by poets.

Now this method is pardonable in a manuscript book intended for the private perusal of its compiler, or at the furthest, of her nearest and dearest, who, chancing to be overcome by the merits of "that quite too delicious pudding," or politically anxious to stand well with the amateur chef, beg a sight of the precious volume; but how far it is commendable in a printed book, intended for the general public, may be matter for doubt, and possibly for wrath, on the part of the authors copied textually and with little or no acknowledgment. And this is precisely the question that arises with reference to Spons' Household Manual.

But putting this aside, there is another awful horn on which the reader thirsting for information may hang himself. We ask with all due humility, What is likely to be the life of a housekeeper for whose practical education such an appalling list as is here set forth is requisite? Certainly if she mastered the contents of his production, or even knew how to refer to it intelligently, she might bid defiance cheerfully to every trouble—sanitary, culinary, or legal—likely to be set her in her earthly career. But then, again, if (much virtue in that if!) she did contrive adequately to assimilate all this tremendous and somewhat indigestible mass of learning, would not her earthly career come to a premature close? She would be quite too clever and good for this workaday world, and would consequently, according to popular superstition, promptly betake herself to another sphere, where, as far as we know, an intimate acquaintance with drains and culinary matters is not of primary importance. Seriously, this Household Manual is a cento, a thing of shreds and patches, constructed frankly, as the editors admit, with paste-pot and scissors, from excerpts from all sorts of magazines, lectures, and newspapers, their indebtedness to whom the compilers acknowledge both in the preface and at the end of each chapter, though the quotations seem occasionally to have got a good deal mixed in the pasting—an accident that enhances the difficulty of discovering their authors or the degree of reliance to be placed in them.

As is probably unavoidable in a book constructed on such lines as the present one, much very useful matter is to be found; but, as is also probably unavoidable, it is overlaid with so much extraneous, not to say irrelevant, information as to make selection, especially to an inexperienced housewife, a matter of extreme difficulty. In addition to this, the relation between the index and the contents leaves much to be desired. For instance, the chapter on furnishing, judging from index and headings, should be most interesting; unfortunately, an examination of the chapter shows that, beyond a few advertisements of sundry domestic patents, it contains nothing but a series of trite commonplaces, so worn and obvious that it is difficult to conceive any one taking the trouble to transplant them from the pages of their original newspaper.

In a Manual professedly for the use of inexperienced housewives it is curious more mention is not made of the many time- and labour-saving appliances now so common. For instance, a recipe is given for colouring essences, &c., in the chapter on the cellar, but not one word hints at the existence of the many vegetable and perfectly harmless colourings to be obtained for a few pence at every really good grocer's. A propos of this chapter on the cellar, an amusingly unconscious explanation is given of the popularity of ginger-beer, fruit-syrups, and such-like so-called "teetotal" beverages. The recipes for compounding the former liquid and for blackberry and grape syrups are calculated to give a disciple of Sir Wilfrid Lawson pause. In common fairness it must be added that the recipe for "wassail" will be fully as much of a novelty to most admirers of those old-fashioned compounds. The cookery is, as a rule, good, in some cases really excellent, though it might be wished a little more had been done to make plain the fact that clear stock, alias consommé, is not a fearful and expensive compound. Both the recipes for clear stock and clear soup are good; still, the quantity of meat required in both cases is so ample as to afford a good excuse for the superstition referred to above, especially as every experienced housekeeper knows that really thoroughly good clear stock can be produced from bones, either cooked or raw, with no more meat than is required for the clearing of the stock.

PERRAULT'S TALES.*

BY publishing this extremely pretty edition of a very charming book the Clarendon Press has once more given the lie to the rather ignorant and more than rather unjust accusation frequently made against both the University presses, that they produce nothing but bibles and pot-boiling school books. It is more than rather unjust, because it is simply not the truth, though it may be freely admitted that of late years the Clarendon Press itself has not produced so many standard editions of classics, ancient and modern, as it once did. It is rather ignorant, because it shows that those who make it do not in the least understand the relations of the Clarendon and the Pitt Presses to the Universities, of which they are in a fashion workshops. Nothing, it would seem, will ever get out of the minds of the vulgar the notion that the two older Universities as wholes, and every institution connected with them as parts, are overflowing with money which ought to be devoted to worthy objects and is devoted to unworthy ones. The fact, of course, is exactly the other way, and both at Oxford and at Cambridge the University would be very badly off if the daughter institutions, collegiate and other, did not filially make money and contribute it to the support of their impecunious mother. It is perhaps not very probable that much money will be made for University purposes out of this volume, but such as has been spent on it has been most excellently spent. As a book, the volume—a small quarto, bound in half vellum, and with wide margined pages of papier vergé, excellently printed—may challenge comparison with anything that M. Jouaust and M. Quantin have recently brought out in the way of editions of French classics. Mr. Lang has taken much trouble to have the exact text of the very rare first edition of Perrault's masterpiece reproduced, spelling and all—a nicety for which we have no particular care in the case of a book of such late date, but to which we certainly have no objection. He has not given any notes, which, perhaps, is rather a pity, for the vocabulary and style, as well as the matter, would have lent themselves very well thereto, and sometimes almost demand it. But he has given a very long and interesting introduction of nearly a hundred and twenty pages dealing with the author, with the tales as a whole, and with each of them separately, and discussing not merely their literary origins, as far as ascertained, but their general characteristics as literature and as folk-lore. Mr. Lang's interest in anthropological mythology, his learning in it, and the thoroughly sensible view which he takes of its general principles, contrasting as this sense does so remarkably with the one-sided views of the philologists at any price and the nature-mythists at any price, are well known; nor is it necessary to insist on his literary competence. The consequence is that his introduction gives by far the best help to the intelligent study of a work as well fitted for intelligent study as, for mere enjoyment that has yet appeared in any language with which we are acquainted.

M. Léopold Derôme has begun in a French periodical, too late we should suppose for Mr. Lang to have seen his work before despatching this book to press, a series of papers on the vicissitudes of Perrault's memory, and on some little known editions of his works. M. Derôme, as a librarian and general student of books as books, naturally devotes his attention less to the better than to the worse known work of this versatile clerk of Colbert, sighs for a new edition of the Parallèle, and more or less passes over the Contes, not of course as trivial, but as generally known. Mr. Lang's attitude is just the opposite; he is perhaps a little hard on the Parallèle itself when he dismisses it, or at least the famous quarrel of "Ancients and Moderns" to which it led, as merely or mainly futile. He would himself, we should imagine, not deny that the Boileaus and the Daciers who defended Homer were quite as much out of sympathy with the heroic age and with heroic poems as the Perraults and the La Mottes who attacked Homer. We are inclined to think that Homer himself, though he might have been sorry to be attacked by the author of the "Belle au bois dormant," would have been much sorrier at being defended by the author of the Namur ode. "If you think I write like that," we can imagine a subterranean voice coming from Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, and the rest, "for heaven's sake don't take my part"; and, though it is perfectly true that, as judged from most of his work except the Contes, Perrault was quite as much of a perruque as his adversaries, still there is something in the Contes themselves which seems to show that he was actuated by a sound, though mistaken, feeling. He did not understand Homer enough to see what a prince of romantics Homer is; he could understand "Tom Thumb" and "Puss in Boots," which are only another side of Homer. But, heaven help us! we are getting into a parallèle ourselves.

Mr. Lang devotes sufficient, and not more than sufficient, space to a discussion of the odd freak, or else the partly rational fancy, which made Perrault publish the masterpiece of which he thought so little or was so half ashamed in the name of "Perrault d'Armancour," the said Perrault d'Armancour being his own son, a young gentleman of tender years. Mr. Lang thinks that there may have been a certain amount of real authorship on the boy's part; that is to say, that Perrault may have got the child to tell him the stories as he had himself heard them from his nurse, and then woven them into the curiously parti-coloured style—at one time purely popular and naïve and at another obviously literary and sophisticated—in which we now have them. There is nothing at all improbable in this, and, provided it is not carried to the length of asterisking this or that passage as "Unecht" (very likely some hopeful German has done this already), there is nothing objectionable in it. But what is really curious is that a book of such an origin, and coming from so unlikely a person, should give us in some, if not most, cases the earliest known version of stories which are obviously and on the face of them of immemorial antiquity. Mr. Lang's mythological learning is able, of course, to collect a mass of interesting and curious parallels to these tales from all nations, periods, and languages. But we think we are right in saying that, with the exception of Grisélidis, which is quite out of the cadre of its sisters, and of the "Three Wishes," nothing like an earlier form of the tales as they stand is to be found anywhere in literature before the date of Perrault's own book. If we remember rightly, an industrious living rescuer of work in danger of perishing once promised his subscribers a collection of the earliest English nursery tales, and gave it up simply because it was nearly impossible to find out what was the earliest. German tales, as is well known, date, as far as printed collections go, in most cases no further back than Grimm. And so in other cases. And we are further confronted with the very curious problem—Is the superior substance and vitality of these particular stories as Perrault has given them merely due to the exercise by mere chance of artistic and literary power of the right sort at the right time upon them, or had Perrault d'Armancour's unknown source these merits, and had it them in consequence of the similar exercise of power by some unknown poet or prose-maker at an earlier time?

This is the literary problem as opposed to the mythological one, and, as it is incapable of solution, there is not need to waste much time on it, interesting as it undoubtedly is. Mr. Lang has wasted none, but has gone straight to his own mythological stores, and has extracted therefrom a most curious budget of things, new and old, on the subject. The Swahili "Puss in Boots," which appears to be like most of the Swahili tales (and like Aucassin et Nicolette) a cante-fable, where the tale-teller alternately sings and says, is interesting, but mournful. Puss is a gazelle, a dear gazelle, who justifies only too fully the painful assertions of the poet about that animal. It has an ungrateful Marquis of Carabas for a master, it dies of sorrow when it comes to know him well, and they give it a public funeral—a pitch of civilization to which we did not know that Zanzibar had reached.

On "Cinderella," if we mistake not, Mr. Lang has written before now, and indeed there is so much human nature in that charming story, that it is not surprising to find humans inventing it with a healthy disdain of the charge of plagiarism anywhere and everywhere. Nor are the variants of "Bluebeard," though much less close, much less numerous. By the way, Mr. Lang does not tell us, and we have forgotten, who was the first person to hit upon the singularly wiseacreish identification with Gilles de Retz. That identification has always seemed to us a very triumph of the commentatorial folly which must try to identify things unidentifiable, and not worth identifying. For it would be nearly impossible to find two heroes or villains of fact or fiction whose proceedings and motives were less alike than those of Ma Sœur Anne's, as some have held him, rather ill-treated brother-in-law, and the loathsome sorcerer, or, if anybody likes, the maligned patriot, of the Breton marches.

After all, however, the charm of this edition, as of all good editions produced by good scholars and critics, is that it introduces us once more, and in more becoming fashion, to its text. We like Mr. Lang here much, but Mr. Lang would probably be the last to object to our saying that we like Perrault better. A delightful parenthesis (all good writers love parentheses) which occurs in the first dozen lines tells how "on donna pour maraines à la petite princesse [a spelling in itself how charming] toutes les fées qu'on pust trouver dans le pays (il s'on trouva sept)." This is but a fair specimen of the inimitable style of the whole. Lamb would have written an essay on that parenthesis and its demure exactness. The union of Perrault's own bits of esprit, of his little gallantries, his little satires, with this singular simplicity produces no doubt something which does not equally satisfy all tastes. There have been those who thought that the simplicity would be sweeter by itself. We are not of them, nor is Mr. Lang. As he puts it in an excellent passage, "There is for us of this century an additional zest in the fact that the whole artificial and courtly world here pretty exactly described at intervals is as dead, as unreal, as much a matter of myth and story as the world of ogres and fairies itself." But even without this the contrast would have had an unequalled charm.

ENGLISH SEALS.*

ALL students of English mediæval antiquities must often have felt that a separate work on the Seals of England is one of the most urgent of literary desiderata. Apart from their great historical value English seals, both from their richness of design and minute delicacy of workmanship, are quite unrivalled by those of any other country, and certainly deserve, from the purely artistic point of view, more attention than they have hitherto received. It is disappointing to find that this large and handsomely printed volume does so little to supply this need—partly from the too narrow limits of its scheme, and partly from the unsatisfactory way in which Mr. Birch has described the seals in his Catalogue. With a good introductory monograph on the subject of English seals generally, and a carefully prepared index, both of which are here wanting, this Catalogue might, with its succeeding volumes, have formed the long-needed handbook on the subject.

Even as a bare Catalogue the descriptions of details of ornament and dress are far too vague to be of much use to the student. Little real information is given by such a slovenly description of the magnificent representation of Norwich Cathedral on the Chapter seal of 1258 (No. 2093). "It is a Gothic building decorated with carvings in which the Arcade, stringcourse, and pediment are freely introduced." Technical accuracy is equally absent in all the descriptions of the costume worn by the figures of ecclesiastics or monastic saints; thus, for example, St. Augustine on the reverse of the seal of Merton Abbey of 1241 (No. 3637) is said to be "in vestments partly embroidered," a phrase which leaves the student about as wise as he was before. Whereas every one interested in ecclesiastical dress would have got some distinct notion of the saint's costume if he had been told that the Archbishop "wears mass vestments and has a rich apparel on his alb." It is surprising, too, to find Mr. Birch repeating the venerable blunder, invented, we believe, by the Camden Society, nearly half a century ago, that a crozier means a cross—the fact being that the word crozier is connected with the French word crosse, meaning a curved stick, or shepherd's crook, and has nothing to do either with the French croix or the English word cross. Whenever the word crozier occurs in old English, it means the ordinary pastoral staff of a bishop or abbot, and never the cross, which was one of the distinguishing badges of an archbishop.

Mr. Birch's Catalogue begins with the royal seals of England, ranging in unbroken succession from Edward the Confessor downwards, only a few isolated examples of Saxon seals being now known. The design of the Confessor's seal is much the same as that on the obverse of his so-called "sovereign penny." The king is represented seated on a throne, holding the orb and cross-topped sceptre; the legend is a curious example of monkish pedantry in its mixture of Latin and doubtful Greek:—✠ SIGILLVM · EADWARDI · ANGLORVM · BASILEI. This enthroned figure, in one form or another, has been used on the seals of all the sovereigns of England down to the present reign. William the Conqueror's Great Seal begins the perfect series, impressed from two matrices, like a coin, with, on the reverse, a figure of the king in armour on horseback, armed with sword and shield. By degrees greater elaboration of ornament was introduced on to the obverse; in Edward III.'s time niches, with minute statuettes of saints, were added on each side of the enthroned king, the back of the throne was panelled, and a rich canopy of "decorated" style was placed over his head. In the reign of Henry IV. the climax of magnificence was reached, in minute richness of design surpassing the seal of any other European sovereign. The elaborate canopy over this king's head, in his second seal of 1411, contains niches with statuettes of the Virgin and Child between two saints, and at the side, among tabernacle work like some gorgeous reredos, are three rows of statuettes in minute canopied niches, each row being two tiers high. Thus about fifteen almost microscopic figures of saints and angels are introduced among the architectural framing of the king's throne. Soon after that date—the beginning of the fifteenth century—the royal seals became less magnificent, and the accessory statuettes of saints began to be omitted. In Henry VII.'s seal we see, for the first time, the influence of Italian Renaissance modifying the English Gothic of previous reigns, and till the reign of Elizabeth the royal throne is decorated with pilasters and arabesque carving, like the fine walnut choir-stalls and other furniture for which the pupils of Raphael were so justly celebrated throughout Italy and other countries on the Continent. After the sixteenth century the decadence was very rapid, the lowest level of all being perhaps reached by the technically skilful but hopelessly dull and weak design of Queen Victoria's Great Seal. One seal, illustrated at Plate IV., No. 895, as a seal of the Court of Common Pleas under Henry VII., is very misleading to the student of English art; Mr. Birch has omitted to note in his description that the design and workmanship of the obverse is not of Henry VII.'s time, but of the thirteenth century—owing probably to the officers of the Court using an old matrix of Henry III.

One cannot but regret that Mr. Birch does not even give footnotes on any of the interesting points connected with English seals—as, for example, with regard to the use of white or coloured wax; that from about the eleventh to the fifteenth century it was customary to make a distinction between the originals of important State documents and office copies—the former being written on fine vellum, with seals of coloured wax (usually green) attached by cords of many coloured strands of silk and gold thread; while the copies were usually on commoner parchment, and had seals of uncoloured white wax fastened by strips of parchment instead of silk and gold. The substance now called sealing-wax, made of shell-lac and Venice turpentine, is a modern invention. In mediæval times seals were made of nearly pure beeswax, and so many different devices were adopted to preserve the soft wax from injury. One method was to wrap the seal up in leaves of oak, beech, or some other tree; another way was to twist round the margin of the seal a sort of wreath made of rushes or plaited strips of vellum, so that the main surface of the delicate wax relief was preserved from contact with the vellum folds of the document. Specially important seals were still more carefully protected by being encased in little boxes made of painted wood or embossed leather, cuir bouilli, sometimes very richly decorated with delicate surface reliefs. After the seals of State, Mr. Birch adopts a rather unsatisfactory method of classification, arranging the rest of his catalogue in the following categories:—Ecclesiastical, Monastic, Peculiar Jurisdictions, Religious Orders, Guilds, &c., and, lastly, Military Orders. The fault is perhaps more in the absurdity of the titles of these different classes than in the actual arrangement. Nevertheless, it must cause very needless confusion in the mind of any one who consults the Catalogue, to find, for example, such very illogical categories as Ecclesiastical, Monastic, and Religious Orders, though a closer examination will show that by "Monastic" the author means seals of individual abbots or monasteries, while by "Religious Orders" he refers to general seals of a whole province, such as the general chapter seal of the Cistercians in England and Wales. Mr. Birch might easily have avoided such slovenly nomenclature by consulting the admirable system of classification adopted by Dr. Percival in arranging the collection of seals in the possession of the Society of Antiquaries at Burlington House. The British Museum is especially rich in its collection of ecclesiastical seals, using the word in its proper sense, and not as Mr. Birch does. Some of the best seals of bishops and abbots in the thirteenth to the fifteenth century are among the most beautiful works of art that England has ever produced, and are of special interest as being purely the production of a native school of artists, whose work, though minute in scale, is not inferior in beauty to the best productions of Niccola Pisano and his Florentine followers.

The folds of the dress and the whole pose of such a figure as that of the Bishop on the seal of Richard de Bury, Bishop of Durham, 1333-1345, would have been worthy of a Greek gem-engraver in the time of Alexander the Great; and, like the best Greek gems, though so small in actual size, it gives one the effect and possesses the grandeur of style of quite a large statue. Even a century earlier, in 1241, the seal made for Walter de Merton's Abbey near Wimbledon had an enthroned figure of the Virgin and Child which Italy could certainly not have rivalled at that early date. The deeply-cut folds of the Virgin's mantle are as graceful in line and as true in the way each fold is traced to its origin as are the wonderful draperies of the colossal figures of Mausolus and Artemisia from Halicarnassus. In some cases mediæval seals have preserved to us the design of fine or curious specimens of antique gems, owing to the not uncommon custom of kings or prelates using as their private seals some ancient engraved gem, to which, very frequently, a novel and Christian meaning was given by means of the inscription placed round it—the name of some saint—in the metal border of the matrix. A magnificent portrait gem of one of the Seleucid Kings of Syria was used instead of his own portrait by the French King Odo, 888-898, and a good impression of this matrix is attached to one of the documents in the British Museum. So, for example, the monks of Durham used a head of Jupiter Serapis, rechristened in the setting as "Caput S. Oswaldi." A still more curious use of antique gems is to be found in seals of some of the thirteenth century bishops, as, for example, in No. 1205 in Mr. Birch's list—the seal of Boniface of Savoy, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1245, which has the usual standing figure of the Archbishop, and, by way of ornament to the field or ground of the oval, four small Roman gems (not Greek as Mr. Birch states) were inlaid in the silver matrix, producing a very extraordinary and somewhat incongruous effect. The matrices of seals used by bishops and abbots were most commonly of silver, and this intrinsic value is one of the reasons why such seals are now extremely rare. But apart from this, their scarcity is caused by the common custom of the matrix of prelates' seals being solemnly broken in the presence of the Archbishop or of the Monastic Chapter soon after the death of its owner. It appears to have been usual to use the metal of the broken seals and their chains to make some silver statuette or small article of altar plate, such as a chalice or a paten, which was then offered at some altar in the church to which the abbot or bishop had been attached. The accounts of Durham Cathedral and Abbey (Surtees Soc. ii. 13) record for many years (1128-1381) the breaking of the bishops' seals and the various ornaments into which their silver was made, the quantity of which would not be insignificant, considering that every bishop would possess, not only a great seal of dignity, but also a rather smaller one, ad causas, used for licences of various kinds, and a private seal, secretum, for his own personal business; in some cases he had also a separate "counter-seal," used to stamp the back of his great seal. In addition to all these the bishops of Durham possessed a seal of royal size and magnificence in their capacity of Princes of the Palatinate; these are large circular seals with, on the obverse, the bishop enthroned under a canopy, and on the reverse the bishop in complete armour, with sword and shield, fighting on horseback, only marked as an ecclesiastic by the mitre which he wears over his helmet. The motive on both sides of these Palatinate seals is, of course, taken from the royal seals of England, with the enthroned king, and the king in battle on the reverse.

In their ingenious complication and richness of effect one or two seals of monastic corporations surpassed even those of the sovereigns and the archbishops. The fourteenth-century seal of Boxgrove Priory (Sussex), the matrices of which are in the British Museum, is a remarkable example of this. On the obverse is a very beautiful figure of the Virgin enthroned, and on the reverse a minute representation of the West front of the Priory Church, with open tracery, containing a relief of the Annunciation and figures of saints. This side of the seal was produced by two different matrices used on separate plaques of softened wax. One of these formed the background with its statuettes and reliefs; the other was used to stamp out the open tracery of the church, which, when hard, was fitted on to the background reliefs, thus forming, as it were, a miniature model of the building, with its statues and the inner planes of the façade seen through the delicate open tracery, producing an extremely rich effect. Another seal of the same century, that of Southwark Priory, is even more elaborate, as both sides have open tracery applied separately, so that the main matrix consists of four distinct pieces of metal. In the case of these and a good many other seals an inscription was added round the edge of the wax by means of a straight strip of bronze with letters cut on both its sides. First one and then the other side of this strip was pressed against the edge of the wax seal, and thus the complete legend round it was formed. To build up one of these very complicated seals must have been a work requiring much skill and patience. The twelve autotype plates with which Mr. Birch's Catalogue is illustrated are not very satisfactory in execution, and might certainly have been better selected. However limited the number might be, such seals as the second great seal of Henry IV. and that of Richard Bury, Bishop of Durham, should not have been omitted, being, as they are, the very crown and flower of the most beautiful of all the arts of England in the middle ages. On the whole, we cannot but feel that the author has let slip a unique opportunity of producing a valuable and standard work on a very fascinating subject.

SCOTLAND AND SCOTSMEN.*

MR. JOHN RAMSAY, of Ochtertyre, who died in 1814 at the age of seventy-eight, was a country gentleman of some mark as a scholar and an antiquary. During the larger part of his life he devoted his energies mainly to the improvement of his property, an estate of moderate size in the neighbourhood of Stirling, and in his latter years amused himself by filling "ten bulky volumes" with what he remembered about the people he had known, and with remarks on the social changes he had witnessed, and other matters. He seems to have wished that his writings, if published at all—and it is evident from what we have of them that he intended that they should some day be given to the world—should be printed exactly as he left them. Mr. Allardyce, to whom the task of editing the Ochtertyre manuscripts has been entrusted, has, however, considered it advisable to make a compilation from them, for he found that some of them were of no permanent value, that some "overlapped one another," and that there was besides "a certain amount of prolixity and discursiveness in Mr. Ramsay's style." While he has not altered a word that Mr. Ramsay wrote, he has selected from the mass of manuscripts, and arranged in the two somewhat ponderous volumes before us, all that seemed to him likely to interest readers of the present day. In spite of his editorial labours, which certainly cannot have been light, the good old laird still repeats himself, and his discourses are still prolix and desultory. Although we are told that we, to some extent, owe Jonathan Oldbuck to Scott's recollection of Ramsay, these volumes go far to prove that George Constable, Clerk of Eldin, and no doubt others, contributed much more than he did to the making of the Antiquary; for Ramsay evidently had little sense of humour, and, if there was any whimsical impulsiveness in his composition, it is effectually hidden by his verbose and commonplace style of writing. One point of likeness there certainly was between him and Monkbarns, for he never failed to read a portion of his manuscripts to every visitor who could be persuaded to listen to it, and Scott, who visited him in 1793, no doubt remembered his own sufferings when he described how Lord Glenallan was forced to listen to the excursus on the hill-fort of Quickens-bog. A large part of these volumes is occupied by Ramsay's reminiscences of men and women with whom he was more or less acquainted. Several of them, though no doubt persons of some consequence in their time, are, to say the least, not generally remembered now, and their characters and habits are in themselves of no interest to any one. Of course they might have been made interesting, but that would have required the exercise of an art of which Ramsay had no knowledge. Some of his friends, however, were men who are still famous, and we hoped that he would have had much to tell us that was worth knowing about them. But he writes in such a dull and formal manner that it is hard to get either amusement or instruction from his attempts at portraiture. He was deeply impressed with the enormity of the offence Boswell had committed against the "laws of society" in indulging his "preposterous passion for reporting private conversations," and he took care not to sin in the same manner. His descriptions of character may be judicious, they are certainly sententious, and, unfortunately, for the most part utterly lifeless. No personal anecdotes find place in his text, and such as he gives us are put in footnotes. After getting through some pages, more or less according to the measure of patience he possesses, the reader will probably become weary of the "delicacy and candour" with which Mr. Ramsay estimates the characters of a succession of judges, ministers, and private friends, and will confine himself to searching the notes for refreshing morsels. In them, too, along with some really good things, he will find much that is irritating. Here, for example, is a note on Lord Monboddo:—"It was alleged that he paid his addresses to a lady of great fortune and learning. Somebody observed that he was one of the first who thought of turning fortune-hunter when past seventy." Can any anecdote be more utterly fatuous than this? However, Ramsay's reminiscences are not all equally vague and dreary. Lord Kames, whom he knew intimately, was, he tells us, even when past seventy, exceedingly given to philandering, and was "at extraordinary pains to form the taste and improve the knowledge of young ladies distinguished for beauty and talents." There was no love lost between him and Monboddo, and the two philosophers had each "a sovereign contempt for the other's studies and works." Once when they were both in the drawing-room of Gordon Castle, Monboddo sneered at his brother judge's literary powers. This annoyed Kames so seriously that the Duchess, in order to prevent an open quarrel between the two aged authors, "proposed they should dance a reel with her, which restored tranquillity to the company." Ramsay speaks with great veneration of Boswell's father, Lord Auchinleck, though he blames him for neglecting to "improve his colloquial Scots"; for he considered that as his nation took no pains to improve their language in the seventeenth century, the men of his own day had no choice but to adopt that of "their ancient rivals." He laments that Thomson and Mallet did not write in their mother-tongue, and so give a "classical polish" to a "dialect which was then spoken by people of the best fashion by education." He admired the genius of Burns, and took a warm interest in his welfare, wrote him a letter of good advice, from which extracts are given in the introduction to these volumes, had him to stay at Ochtertyre, and as we know from one of his letters to Currie—not printed here—visited him soon afterwards at Ellisland. At the same time poetry that did not follow "classical models" had little charm for him, and he urged Burns "to cultivate the drama on the model of the Gentle Shepherd, and write Scottish eclogues."

One or two of the ministers who were of note about the time of the Rebellion of Forty-five are described with more approach to vivacity than is usual in Ramsay's work. It is not difficult, for instance, to form some idea of Dr. Webster, an eloquent and popular preacher and a zealous ecclesiastical politician, who though over-fond of the bottle and "of the company of men who assuredly were not saints," retained the confidence and esteem of the most serious and strictest people in Edinburgh. He was a seasoned vessel, and though he was said to have drunk as much claret at the expense of the Corporation as would have floated a 74-gun ship, for he was a constant attendant at the business meetings of the town, which were then held at a tavern, he always carried his liquor discreetly. Nor would he even in his most festive moments ever allow any one to say in his presence what he thought it unbecoming for a clergyman to hear without administering a rebuke that was sometimes at least well turned. "Doctor," the then Earl of Dundonald said to him one day, "may I not ride through hell on a windle-straw now that I have put a roof on the Abbey Church [of Paisley], and brought water into the Abbey?" "My Lord," he answered, "you had better take the well with you." Bisset, the senior minister of Aberdeen, was a typical specimen of a section of the Northern clergy who "formed themselves on the model of the Remonstrants of the preceding century." He was blunt and fearless, held aloof from other men, and was much feared, for he had a bitter tongue, and never cared to measure his words. An amusing instance is given of his power of retaliation. When his brother clergy went to congratulate the Duke of Cumberland in 1746 he refused to go with them, and afterwards appeared at the levée by himself. Some mirth was excited by his ungainly figure and awkward carriage, and General Hawley said aloud, "Smoke the parson." Bisset took an ample revenge; for he ended his speech of congratulation to the Duke by referring to "the cowardice and misconduct of the persons to whom the public affairs had been lately committed. 'Had Hawley and Cope done their duty things would not have been in their present state.' 'Smoke the parson now, Hawley,' said some of his brethren."

Ramsay's notices of the changes he witnessed in social life derive their principal interest from being the observations of a contemporary; there is little that is new in them. In what he says on the drinks of the Scottish gentry we note that the "Tappit Hen," the name which Scott gives to the three-quart pot of excellent claret that Luckie Macleary placed before the Baron of Bradwardine and his friends, once had a less honourable signification. Before the increase of the wine duties and the war with France made claret so dear that gentlemen of small means no longer kept it in their houses, and only drank it at taverns, the wine was as poor as it was cheap, and when it turned sour it was customary to mix it with cinnamon and sugar, "which made what was then called a tappit hen." Although little port was drunk in Scotland till far on in the century, it was taken by "gouty people who were forbid claret." The account we have here of the rise of a new system of agriculture after the Forty-five deserves special attention, for Ramsay was a practical agriculturist and an excellent landlord. The Rebellion, which brought much money into Scotland, first for the payment of troops, and afterwards for the purchase of the heritable jurisdictions, is treated as a "capital era" in Scottish husbandry. Land commanded a good price, and English methods of cultivation were introduced into Scotland; for intercourse between the two countries now became frequent. The new military roads did much to improve agriculture; waggons with spoked wheels gradually took the place of sledges and of the rough carts called tumblers, and better horses were bred for farm-work. Some of the more enlightened landlords adopted a proper rotation of crops on their home-farms, and endeavoured to do away as far as possible with the old distinction between outfield and infield, so that "every part of the farm might produce the same crops in course." Improvements in the means of internal communication enabled tenants to lime their land freely, a change that did more than anything else to increase the productiveness of the country. An interesting record is given of the dearth of 1782, which is said to have resembled the "worst years of King William's dearth." It was followed by a period of great prosperity; for after the peace of the next year cattle, horses, and sheep were exported largely and fetched high prices. From this period the tenant-farmers seem to have become more enterprising and industrious, they eagerly adopted the improvements that had been introduced by the landlords, grew "more desirous of having enclosures than their masters were of making them," and no longer considered it unneighbourly to drive off cattle that were trespassing on their winter crops. The wages of farm servants rose very slowly, and though about the middle of the century they "entered into a combination to raise wages," a matter on which we should have liked to have heard more, in 1760, after "several small rises," a ploughman only received 3*l.* sterling, and a woman 20*s.* a year. A chapter on Highland superstitions shows, what, indeed, needed no proof, that Ramsay was a close and intelligent observer of ancient customs; but the subject has been so thoroughly worked since his day that what he says, pleasant as it is to read, has lost its novelty. His account of the Highlands after the suppression of the Rebellion contains some valuable remarks, especially on the effect that the increase in the price of black cattle and the rise in rents that followed it had in destroying the spirit of clanship.

TWO BOOKS ON ART.*

MR. HUMPHREY WARD has conducted to a fairly successful close his sumptuous publication on English art as represented in the public galleries of London. The last three parts are by no means the least interesting of the fifteen in which the work is comprised. In the thirteenth, which deals with Linnell, Müller, and De Wint, the editor has received most competent assistance from Mrs. Sitwell. The weakest of the three biographies contributed by this lady is unquestionably that of the painter first-named. It is evident that Mrs. Sitwell's feeling for Linnell's art is not that of a good and true Linnellite. Such devotees are rarer nowadays than they used to be. Since the year when Linnell shared with Dante Rossetti the honours of a Winter Exhibition at Burlington House, the sect has dwindled alike in numbers and in vocal force; and the fact that such a decline is apparent may be adduced in proof of the curious change in taste which the nation of late has made. Mrs. Sitwell has done her best to speak with due respect of something that was once pre-eminently respected. She has succeeded in a way; but the effect of her endeavour is a trifle vague and indirect. One has to read between the lines to find the secret of her want of faith; and in the process one is led to question the propriety in such a case of cold politeness and formal discrimination. The lady is seen to far greater advantage in her study of De Wint. The end of it, indeed, is so good as to be worth quoting:—

He so contrives the choice and juxtaposition of his tints as never to give the sense of poverty, and to suggest with admirable tact the broad and speaking relations of tone and effect in nature. His use of the pure water-colour wash is quite masterly, luminous to the extreme when he wants lights, and in the darks rich and powerful enough without loss of transparency; he knows well how to suggest the multiplicity of nature without perplexing the eye by detail, and with a few perfectly-chosen and cunningly-laid tints of dark-greenish grey for his foreground trees, of dim purplish red for homesteads and villages, of sober yellow for his harvest-fields, and sober blue (where the blue has not flown, as it has proved somewhat apt to fly) in his skies, can often set before us in perfection the very essence and spirit of the English lowland scenery which he loved.

That seems to us, in the writer's phrase, quite masterly. The aims and achievement of De Wint have never, that we know, been so neatly qualified or so accurately summarized. The estimate is more than the best thing in the three numbers now before us; it is close enough to be as nearly final as an estimate can be. The "Müller" is good, too; but it is a thought too liberal in tone and too generous in effect. Miss F. M. Robinson's "Landseer" is far less felicitous than any of Mrs. Sitwell's three. It is brightly written enough; but there is too much of it (Landseer has a whole part to himself, exactly as though he stood on the same plane with Constable and Turner and Reynolds), and what there is is neither illuminating considered as criticism nor interesting considered as fact. The last part is the work of Mr. Ward himself; it treats of men so various and antagonistic as Chalon and Rossetti; as Walker and Bonington and Clarkson Stanfield; it may be read with interest always, and here and there with profit. Mr. Ward, in his account of Bonington, for whom he entertains a great and laudable admiration, draws largely on the correspondence of Delacroix, to whose analysis of Bonington's genius he refrains, with admirable tact and propriety, from adding any words of his own. His account of the merit of Rossetti's "Ecce ancilla Domini" and Walker's "Vagrants" is, we think, extravagantly eulogistic; but his concluding remarks are extremely sensible, and we are happy to endorse them with emphasis. The national collections will bear, as he remarks, a good many additions ere they can claim to be rightly representative of English art. In none is there a Philip, in none a Mason or a David Cox; we could well "be doing" with the admirable and noble Wilson now on view at the Grosvenor Gallery; our Cotmans are none of the best; we should certainly be all the better for "some Romneys, as beautiful as those we have, but larger and more characteristic of the painter's highest mood." When these gaps are filled—as, it is hoped, they may one day be—we shall feel at liberty, perhaps, to recognize that the English school is not the only one which has distinguished itself in modern years, and so enlarge our sympathies as to take in a specimen or two of the art of Corot and MM. Millet and Diaz.

It remains to add that the illustrations of the last three fasciculi of English Art in the Public Galleries of London are in the main well chosen and well executed. No fault is, of course, to be found with the Landseers, except that they are by this time stalest of the stale. One has seen them scores of times before, and in scores of different processes—the "Old Shepherd's Chief Mourner," the "Sleeping Bloodhound," "Dignity and Impudence," the "Jack in Office," "Suspense"—there is not one but has been trotted out in black and white in every quarter of the civilization where the use of black and white is possible. To say that they look at least as well in photogravure as in any other medium is to say everything. The Rossetti—the "Ecce ancilla Domini" aforesaid—is less familiar and more welcome; it is very neatly and cleverly reproduced. In Messrs. Goupil's transcript from the National Gallery Walker the hardness and spottiness of the original are successfully dissembled; their presentation of Linnell's "Windmill" is more pleasing to consider than the picture; their two De Wints are excellent in their way. A Bonington, "The Column of St. Mark," is dull and heavy; while the Muller, "A River Scene," is far too tame and inexpressive in texture. All the Stanfields are good. A certain smoothness, a want of individuality, a mechanical correctness (as of negatives to[...]hed to death) is a characteristic of the sets, and the impression of it is perhaps the strongest memory we retain of them.

Mr. Walter Armstrong (who knows everything) knows a great deal about Scottish painters; and he has presented his knowledge to the general public in a thin volume adorned with many cuts. His style is crisp, his manner trenchant, his bearing that of one having authority, his indulgence in the matter of jargon by no means immoderate. His work is quite worth reading; for, with much that is merely sound, it contains a great deal that is positively startling. Thus, in Raeburn's pictures he is able to distinguish "a want of depth and roundness in his shadows, and generally . . . . a want of force"; and to add that, "this comes partly, no doubt, from his habit of painting without a rest for his hand." Again, he is prepared to assert of Thomson of Duddingstone (whom, as becomes a sincere admirer of Messrs. M'Whirter and David Murray, he patronizes with conspicuous airiness and freedom) that, "unlike most amateurs, he succeeded best where he tried least"; an observation, if ever there was one, whose bearings, it may be remarked, do unquestionably lie in the application of it. An ingenious comparison between John Philip and Rossetti of the one part, and Burns and Landon of the other, is too long for quotation, or it would show, as scarce anything else, that what Mr. Armstrong knows he knows better than any one besides. These eccentricities apart, the book is capable work, and will be read with interest wherever the Scotch school of painting is popular. In Scotland—which, "for a century past . . . has produced more good artists than any other country of equal size in the world"—it will be studied with peculiar pleasure. For not only does it catalogue a considerable number of Scottish painters; it also goes far to show that "the Art of the North has a sure title to honour," in that all its professors have an eye for colour—that, as Mr. Armstrong puts it, "colour is honoured" by them with a more exclusive devotion than it has found elsewhere since the days of Titian. To those who have wandered (or hurried) through the Scottish exhibitions—to those whose theory of colour is not precisely identical with that of the savage bull—this statement will probably sound a trifle excessive. But that it will seem natural, and even modest, in Edinburgh and Glasgow, is what none who is acquainted with the Scots character will permit himself to doubt. Mr. Armstrong is certain of it; and for the cautious Southron he is therefore scarce so sure a guide as might be wished. Au demeurant le meilleur fils du monde. He has plenty to say, and he is very often right. Of his illustrations (which, like the text, have already appeared in The Portfolio) the best, as it seems to us, are the reproduction of a famous etching by Geddes, and of Raeburn's "Lord Newton," and Mr. Colin Hunter's admirable etching "A Banffshire Harbour." Of such examples of "the art of the North" as Mr. Petrie's "Dost Know this Water-fly?" and Nasmyth's "Cottage," the less said the better.

MEDICAL BOOKS.*

WITHOUT in any way disparaging the intelligence of our readers, we may venture to assume that, in the case of the majority, a knowledge of the Ptomaines and Leucomaines is beyond their philosophy; indeed very many members of the medical profession would be somewhat puzzled by the terms. This is to be regretted, because (according to the gospel of Professor Gautier, and his English champion, Dr. Brown) they, together with some other substances, rather hazily described as extractive matters, are the main cause of human diseases. For the benefit of the uninitiated we may mention that ptomaines is the title given to the alkaloids which are formed during the putrefaction of animal tissues, and leucomaines to those which result from the physiological processes taking place in the tissues of the living animal. In the opinion of the author these animal alkaloids, in conjunction with the "extractive matters," are destined to expel the microbe and bacillus ignominiously from the arena of scientific discussion. Dr. Brown would attribute the occurrence of most morbid states, including typhus, to the accumulation in the system of alkaloids and extractive matters as the result of their excessive formation in some cases, and their defective elimination in others. This explanation is not an improbable one with regard to non-infectious diseases such as rheumatism, gout, ague, possibly cholera, and the numerous poisoned conditions of the system arising from functional or structural derangements of the kidneys or liver; but would not account for those in which a distinct communicable poison is developed as in hydrophobia, syphilis, small-pox, scarlet fever, measles, &c. In these cases no accumulation of physiologically-formed alkaloids or extractive matters would account for the existence of a virulent contagium, the smallest quantity of which will set up a definite and specific disease in the bodies of the healthy. Whether a bacillus or something else be the active agent in these specific poisons is at present undetermined, but the existence of such poisons is beyond dispute. It is improbable that syphilis or small-pox is at the present time ever developed spontaneously in an individual; but of course the materies morbi must have originated at some time, possibly as the result of evolution through generations of people exposed to similar unhealthy surroundings. Though we cannot altogether agree with Dr. Brown in his conclusions, we think his book a very suggestive one and likely to aid in the elucidation of the difficult problems met with in the study of the etiology of disease.

We must all desire a euthanasia as the closing scene of our life's drama, though probably most of us, whatever our age, hope that the date at which we shall "shuffle off this mortal coil" may be more or less distant. It is now pretty generally known that the popular ideas of fifty years ago on the subject of death-bed horrors and agonies were to a great extent popular fallacies, and that dying is not usually a very painful process. A large number of deaths take place during unconsciousness, and in many others, where the intellect remains unclouded until almost the last gasp, the suffering arises from a feeling of intense exhaustion rather than of pain, and certainly cannot be correctly described as agony. There are, however, a few terrible exceptions in cases where local or general convulsions take place without loss of consciousness, as in hydrophobia and tetanus. So much for the physical aspect of dying. On the mental side we should expect that, where consciousness remains, a firm belief in the certainty of a happy future after death would have a calming influence, and such is really the case. On the other hand, however, the stereotyped description of the horrors of the sinner's deathbed so frequently affected by the authors of religious tracts has very little foundation in fact.

Euthanasia; or, Medical Treatment in Aid of an Easy Death. By William Munk, M.D., F.S.A. London: Longmans & Co.

The Year Book of Treatment for 1888. London: Cassell & Co., Lim.

The chapter of Dr. Munk's book on the "General and Medical Treatment of the Dying" is a most carefully written and valuable one, and we should suggest its publication in the form of a pamphlet for distribution among nurses and others who are in attendance upon the moribund. Medical men also may glean useful hints from it for the alleviation of the sufferings of those among their patients whose lives they can no longer hope to preserve.

To the busy practitioner a study of the systematical works on medicine and surgery is well nigh impossible, and even the periodical literature of these subjects is too voluminous to be read during the short and uncertain intervals which are left to him by the exigencies of practice. In addition to this, the medical man who has due regard for his mental and physical health will devote no inconsiderable portion of his limited leisure to non-medical reading and to such outdoor recreation as may be congenial to his tastes. Hence the great value of such a summary of recent improvements in medical and surgical treatment as is presented to us in The Year Book, edited by Mr. Malcolm Morris. In this little book the practitioner will find a means of keeping au courant with the advances in practical medicine and surgery without undergoing the labour entailed by the extensive reading which would be necessary in order to collect the particulars for himself. The volume for 1888 is not a whit behind its four predecessors in the judicious selection of matter and the critical acumen with which it is treated. Indeed, the authors of the various papers appear to have more fully developed the capacity for perceiving what kind of mental nutriment is required by medical men, and have also been successful in rendering it palatable and easy of assimilation. The price of The Year Book of Treatment (five shillings) is strictly moderate—no unimportant matter in these times of pecuniary depression.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

ANY one who can count some thirty years or more of memory of the actual events of history may enjoy a kind of miniature edition of the Ruins of the late M. de Chassebœuf, more commonly known as Volney, by thinking over the word Zouaves. Before the Crimean War they were terrible fellows, but vaguely known. The Crimea made them familiar and rather popular in that Albion which their colonels and their admirers had frequently devoted (after dinner) to the Zouaves' own prowess à la MacTavish. Piedmont and Mexico, as well as their own Algeria, added to their laurels, until their laurels felt the killing frosts of 1870, and, with the rest of the French army, the Zouaves fell more suddenly, but perhaps not more reasonably, than they had risen. Of all their vicissitudes M. Laurencin (1) treats at fair length and by no means in too Chauvinist a spirit, while his book is capitally printed and papered, and quite luxuriously illustrated with careful engravings after Yvon, Detaille, Vernet, the two Bellangés, Protais, and a dozen other artists.

M. Michel Delines has made up an interesting volume (2) partly of personal reminiscences of the great Russian novelist, who, after attracting attention to Russian novels, has been half-forgotten for newer but far lesser names; partly of piecings together of Tourguéneff's—or, as some call him, Turgenjew's—writings. Perhaps the two most interesting things in the book are the long description (a little "romanced" we should think, for some of the details, and especially some of the dialogue, can hardly have been recorded on the spot) of the novelist's eccentric and alarming mother, and some remarks of Turgenjew's own about Mr. Carlyle and Mr. Thackeray, both of whom disturbed him greatly by finding part of his conversation ludicrous when he did not mean it to be so. "A Frenchman or a Russian would not have laughed," said the great Turgenjew, not hurt, but mystified. But then some Frenchmen, and it would seem from this some Russians, have very little sense of humour.

M. Coutance (3) has so frankly assumed the part of the vulgarisateur—a word which appears to carry with it no kind of offensive meaning in France—and treats his subject with so much apparent levity, that some readers may be a little prejudiced against his handsome book. They will, however, make a mistake if they put it down in consequence. The author, who appears to have been connected with the medical department of the French navy, not only has scientific knowledge, but has lived in that tropical world where poisons, vegetable and animal, do most abound, and has profited by his residence. He has made a very readable book of its kind.

Of a somewhat similar kind, though, of course, more miscellaneous, is M. de Parville's well-known Causeries scientifiques (4). At least it ought to be well known, for with this volume, which contains the sifted faits divers of science for 1886, it enters on its second quarter of a century. It is not easy to hit the mean in such an enterprise between a mere mass of anecdotes and a dry technical compte-rendu. Perhaps M. de Parville leans, if anything, rather to the anecdotic side; but then his book is meant to be popular. Pasteurism, fasting-men, electric tramways, ptomaïnes—all the scientific gossip of the day before yesterday is here.

M. James Darmesteter (5), who is well known as an enthusiastic student of English, has translated certain poems of Miss Mary Robinson's into that short paragraphed prose which has become a favourite medium of late with some French translators. The translator's preface finds in his text "a unique and indefinable originality," something than which "Idealist poetry has never either in England or elsewhere produced anything purer, more penetrating, and more profound." Miss Robinson's poetry has, he thinks, "the supreme gift of spontaneity which the age in its decadence has lost." It has "a classic purity of composition," an "absolute independence of imagination," "no Preraphaelite affectation or mannerism," and many other nice things or absences of things. It is not ours in this place to criticize these criticisms. But we wonder whether M. Darmesteter has ever felt a dread which besets some tolerably experienced students of languages not their own—the dread of "seeing into" foreign work which happens to be sympathetic all manner of gifts and graces, invisible to less imaginative but perhaps clearer-sighted natives? Probably not; the French may be born malicious, but they are not born self-distrustful.

M. Marx's book (6) of collected articles on the dogs, the models, the bread, the books, the improprieties, the what-not of Paris, may be all the pleasanter for M. Pailleron's pleasant prefatory word of recommendation, but it stood in no need of that word. It is readable from beginning to end with the most moderate skipping, and it contains the most agreeable translation of colley that we have ever known. Does the reader know the French for that animal? It is not "colis"; it is "chien-loup à poils noirs et soyeux qui est originaire d'Ecosse." A little long, perhaps; but then, you know, anything is better than using a foreign word.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

WITH as many friends as the hare in the fable, the English farmer never lacks advisers ready to point the road to prosperity, regardless of his traditional dislike of new views and innovations. A true friend of the farmer is Mr. Theodore Wood, who has written an excellent manual for his guidance under the title The Farmer's Friends and Foes (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.) With the heartiest desire that this book should be read by every farmer, it is yet unreasonable to expect that it will revolutionize—as well it might—the attitude of the agriculturist towards "every bird that flies and every creeper that crawls." Wholesome counsel is never so unpalatable as when proffered in the season of tribulation, and it is thrice unpalatable when it involves a complete regeneration of a long-suffering class of men. There is no surer way of arousing resentment than to question a man's intelligence, and this is what Mr. Wood's indictment of the majority of farmers amounts to. He charges them with being so ready to find enemies in the world of insects and birds that they not only do not recognize their best and natural friends, but persecute them, to the incalculable injury of their own interests. The farmer, says Mr. Wood, takes upon himself "the functions of a kind of general manager of creation," and disturbs nature's wise balance to his own discomfiture. And the worst of it is that he proves the justice of his indictment by the convincing body of testimony he adduces as entomologist and ornithologist. There are, of course, farmers who possess scientific knowledge and pursue scientific methods of culture, who are trained observers and students of natural history. They will accept the main propositions of Mr. Wood's volume and find nothing new in its teachings or moral. They, however, are a very insignificant minority. The majority follow the ways of their fathers, with their allies the gardeners and gamekeepers, and trap, poison, or shoot their feathered friends in most unhappy ignorance. They see the visible depredations when corn and fruits ripen, and are blind to the immeasurable benefits continually effected at other seasons in secret or less palpable ways. The whole question is discussed by Mr. Wood without sentiment, in language entirely intelligible, and in the most business-like spirit. His book will do immense good if it only set the farmers thinking. The pity of it is that it is unlikely to fall into the hands of some of their worst enemies, the gamekeepers, whose slaughter of mice-eating birds like the owl and the kestrel can best be appreciated after reading Mr. Wood's comparison of the amount of grain eaten by birds and the enormous destruction wrought by mice. This is but one of the many striking object-lessons in the book that illustrate the folly of indiscriminate bird-slaying. Whatever individual exceptions may be taken in Mr. Wood's classification of farmer's friends and foes, which is admittedly rough and ready—and the gardener may justly urge that the sparrow is too leniently treated—the main contention that birds generally should be permitted to take tithes, or "wages," for their beneficent labour appears to be altogether unanswerable.

Ballads of Books, edited by Andrew Lang (Longmans & Co.), is set forth as "a re-cast of a volume of the same name, edited by Mr. Brander Matthews," and published in New York last year. It is prettier in form than its original, and pleasanter to handle. These are the only gains to be noted. The addition of an appendix, containing Crabbe's Library, to a collection of lyrics is scarcely desirable, and, if desirable, might have been largely augmented. It is somewhat curious there should be only three or four poems in the collection that approximate in form to the ballad. Ballades there are, excellent after their kind, and some capital pieces of an epigrammatic cast, but the ballad is hard to find.

The "Russia's Hope" (Chapman & Hall) is a brochure after the type of the Battle of Dorking, with a difference, translated from the Russian by Mr. C. J. Cooke, and prefaced by Mr. Beatty-Kingston. The exploits of the masterful cruiser the Russia's Hope will be found vastly diverting to English readers who may be as indifferent as their forefathers were to the fact—"alas! that it should be so!" says Mr. Beatty-Kingston—that "the very name of England nowadays has a flavour that is offensively unsavoury to the nostrils of Frenchmen and Germans, whilst in Russia it is an object of bitter abhorrence." Of course it is very alarming to know this, but it should not interfere with the enjoyment of a lively and ingenious little book. The Russia's Hope is a steel-armoured cruiser, fitted with two sets of engines, two 8-inch guns, eight 6-inch guns, four Nordenfeldts, with a ram of forged iron. She carried 1,000 tons of coal and could do 8,000 miles at a speed of ten knots. On board there is one Zlobin, who might be the model head of an Intelligence Department, for he was "thoroughly acquainted with the details of every ship in the British navy." The career of this wonderful warship might make M. Jules Verne pale with envy. It must be read and not quoted, save by the serious or apprehensive person. There is a good joke, however, about speed. Some one remarks it is very hard for the engines to go 1,700 miles at full speed. "Probably you would like to go at the rate of five miles, as on the corvette Rapid?" "Yes," retorted the engineer, "but for that we sailed about for four years and brought the engines back to Cronstadt in perfect order." "In perfect order," rejoins the other, "because all those four years it was the corvette that carried the engines, and not the engines the corvette."

Savage Life, by Henry King (Sampson Low & Co.), is a volume of sketches of "riverside character and queer life in London dens," the quality of which hardly responds to the promising title. Most readers, if they know the East-End waterside as Dickens knew it, will think the "queer life" experiences of Mr. King are unaccountably omitted.

Much more sketchy are descriptive papers reprinted from the Manchester City News, and collected in Mr. Walter Tomlinson's Bye-Ways of Manchester Life (Manchester: Butterworth & Nodal). Slight though they are, these notes of the shady aspects of Manchester life are thoroughly readable and void of pretentiousness.

The new and very pretty pocket edition of Poems by Mrs. Browning (Smith, Elder, & Co.) is a reprint of the 1856 edition, with copyright additions and alterations, and an interesting preface by Mr. Browning, in which Mr. J. H. Ingram's recent monumental "memoir" of the poetess is very justly dealt with.

To the expiration of copyrights we owe a cheap reissue of Carlyle's works by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, of which we have Sartor Resartus, Past and Present, On Heroes, and the three volumes of the French Revolution. These are reprints of the familiar two-shilling edition, bound in red cloth, at one shilling the volume. The wise buyer will not lament the extra sixpence when he compares them with Messrs. Routledge's sixpenny edition of the French Revolution, with its crowded pages, paper covers, and very serious omission of the dat headings to the pages, and the invaluable summary and index.

In the second volume of the new Library Edition of Lord Tennyson—Early Poems, II. (Macmillan & Co.)—not a few of the poems are by no means "early," as chronology goes, such as the song-cycle "The Window," and "Lucretius," "Wages," "The Victim," and other contributions to Good Words and Macmillan's Magazine. We miss, by the way, certain verses almost contemporary with these, such as "I stood on a tower in the wet."

It has been questioned whether there is a greater benefactor to persons whose time hangs heavy on their hands than the inventor of Patience, not she who sits on a monument, but she who shuffles the cards. M. F. Guise, in "Arrowsmith's Series," under the title Have Patience, has arranged many varieties (London: Simpkin & Marshall. Bristol: Arrowsmith), and promises to arrange more. Peace—or, rather, Patience—be with him.

Among our new editions are Dr. William Pole's Philosophy of Music (Trübner & Co.); Mr. Snodgrass's Wit, Wisdom, and Pathos of Heinrich Heine (Alexander Gardner); Dr. John Ker's Lectures on the History of Preaching (Hodder & Stoughton); James Fraser, Second Bishop of Manchester, a Memoir, by Thomas Hughes (Macmillan & Co.); Dr. H. Clay Trumbull's Teaching and Teachers (Hodder & Stoughton); and a revised, enlarged second edition of Mr. Alfred Emden's treatise, The Practice and Forms of Winding-up Companies (Clowes & Sons).

MEMOIRS of the PRINCESSE de LIGNE. Edited by LUCIEN PERRY. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with Portrait of the Princess, price 24s.

"These memoirs present to us a series of vivid pictures of a state of society which has happily ceased to exist. We are not aware that in the whole range of French memoirs there is another instance of any narrative from so useful a pen. This precious morsel must be ascribed to the Sarmatian precocity of the authoress. Her talents expanded with a rapidity that defies and baffles scepticism."
Edinburgh Review.

FOURTH EDITION.

WILLIAM POWELL FRITH'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY and REMINISCENCES. Now ready, in 2 vols. demy 8vo. with 2 Portraits, 30s.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION.

A NEW NOVEL.

HIS COUSIN BETTY. By Miss F. M. PEARD, Author of "Near Neighbours" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"The picture of the Amhersts' life in the heart of Devonshire and the frame in which it is placed ...e a like charming. The perception of the beauties of nature and the faculty of showing them such as they exist to others are among the best traits of modern fiction. Miss Peard possesses both in no ordinary degree. 'His Cousin Betty' is in every way a figure suited to this graceful setting. The novel is refreshing from the quiet refinement of its tone, and is by no means devoid of incident."—Morning Post.

YOUNG MISTLEY: a New Novel. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

"The characters are well drawn, and in effective contrast one with the other ....A graceful and pleasing story, with an attractive heroine and a gallant hero."—Athenæum.

"'Young Mistley' is the work of an apparently new author. It is highly promising, the writing being correct, pleasant, and humorous, and the people portrayed with unusual skill."—Saturday Review.

WHITEPATCH: a Romance for Quiet People. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"A delightful story of the good old sort, and yet original and even daring...... the writer has managed to elicit a tale which is interesting, amusing, charming. Some readers may find it thrilling occasionally; but that depends upon temperament and habit of thought. The 'Romance' is just a nice, fresh, surprising story, very readably written."—St. James's Gazette.

"Interesting from the first page to the last........They treat of a society which was faded and dispersed when 'Waverley' was a new book and the 'Edinburgh Review' was scarce out of its childhood........The reader may turn to what chapter he will and wherever he pauses be sure of good entertainment...... It remains to add that his second volume is, if possible, still more entertaining than his first."—Athenæum.

"No more delightful book of personal reminiscences has been sent out than that just edited by Mr. Allardyce from manuscripts prepared by the late John Ramsay of Ochtertyre."
Glasgow Herald.

"These volumes form the most interesting addition that has for some time been made to Scottish social, personal, and anecdotal history."—Scotsman.

This day is published.

COUNTESS IRENE. By the Author of "Lauterdale" and "Caterina." 3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"'Countess Irene' is pleasant reading. Over and above the charm of an uncommon brightness and subtlety of insight, there is a general atmosphere of genial kindliness."
Athenæum.

"The girl who gives the title to the book, and the development of whose character forms the main issue of the plot, is a figure drawn with marked ability—a lovable, good-natured, wilful girl with a proud nature........The interest of the work, however, lies not so much in its incidents, though these are well conceived, as in the character-drawing........all these are drawn on the lines of nature, with truth and with a refined humour........The novel, as a whole, is pleasing in no ordinary degree."—Scotsman.

"The book has a cosmopolitan tone of good society, which is not one of its least attractions. Bright and pleasantly realistic, it is one of the most agreeable novels of the season."
Morning Post.

COMPLETION OF MR. KINGLAKE'S HISTORY.

THE INVASION of the CRIMEA. Its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By A. W. KINGLAKE.

Vol. VII.—FROM THE MORROW OF INKERMAN TO THE FALL OF CANROBERT.

Vol. VIII.—FROM THE OPENING OF PÉLISSIER'S COMMAND TO THE DEATH OF LORD RAGLAN.

Illustrated with numerous Maps, Plans, and Index to the complete Work. Demy 8vo. 28s.

"We have in it a product of a not too common kind, an English classic. Many of its episodes are among the most brilliant compositions of the sort in the whole history of war. The scenes they describe photograph themselves, so to speak, in the reader's mind for ever. ......Some of the most charming portions of these two volumes are the sketches of the war-like youth who have since then won enduring fame."—Daily News.

"The descriptive power of many passages cannot be exceeded........The brightness and finish of the work show the hand of the master. All in all, it is delightful reading, and the gallant deeds of gallant men are recorded in language which will ever enshrine their memories amongst English-speaking people all over the world."—Contemporary Review.

THE MAKERS of VENICE. Doges, Conquerors, Painters, and Men of Letters. By Mrs.

OLIPHANT, Author of "The Makers of Florence" &c. With numerous Illustrations. Medium 8vo. 21s.

Blackwood's Magazine says :—"Mrs. Oliphant's hand has not lost its cunning ... is even more delightful than 'The Makers of Florence.' ... writing is bright and animated, the research thorough, the presentation of Venetian life brilliantly vivid. It is an entirely workmanlike piece of work by an artist who knows how to mix the colours on her palette to the best advantage, and by a story-teller who can translate the lay figures of the past into real men and women........We are grateful to Mrs. Oliphant for this very charming and instructive volume."

The World says : "A book full of information of all kinds and from all sources, with illustrations ... in short with everything handsome about it ... worthy companion to her 'Makers of Florence.'"

It is a valuable, almost necessary supplement to Lord Selborne's previous work. It will be an aid to the ecclesiastical historian ; and, not its least merit, it shows how a scrupulous mind prepares itself for engaging in a momentous controversy."

The St. James's Gazette says :—"Of 'The Second Son' it may be said that it ranks among her best books ; it is inferior to none of them in that illusion of reality which it is her special gift to produce. To read one of her stories of country life is to be living for the time amid the scenes and in the society that she is describing."

The Morning Post says :—"Mrs. Oliphant has never shown herself more completely mistress of her art than in her new novel, 'The Second Son.'........The entire story is clever and powerful."

The Guardian says :—"Above all there is the perfection of artistic sympathy with all things beautiful throughout. No one who reads the first chapter of 'The New Antigone' can doubt that the author has the rare gift of expressing in the most exquisite language the scenes he imagines so vividly........The book is very far removed from the plane of ordinary novels, and, if a first attempt, is very full of promise."

The Times says :—"A daring outline and fine workmanship give this novel a claim to more than ordinary attention........Few more dramatic situations could be conceived, and it is unnecessary to peruse the story further to illustrate the genuine power and originality of the author. We have spoken of fine workmanship ; and 'The New Antigone' is full of evidence that we stand in the presence of a finished author........He has a command of elegant metaphor, a brilliant imagination, and a genius for subjective analysis. But we may say, on the whole, that 'The New Antigone' will succeed, if destined to succeed at all, by the striking manner in which daring heresies are brought upon the stage."

THE ELECTIONS AND THE GOVERNMENT.

THE interest felt or affected by the Separatists in the elections of the past ten days has been closely connected with and has in a manner kept up the interest in the last night's debate on Mr. PARNELL'S amendment to the Address, though that debate is now more than a week old. It is, we know, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S opinion that, if anything could be more pulverizing to Unionism than the elections at Dundee, Southwark, and West Edinburgh, it would be the speech of Mr. GLADSTONE, and that if anything could be more pulverizing than the speech of Mr. GLADSTONE, it would be these three elections. But, since a period itself dating within a few weeks of the speech about Parnellite juice, Sir WILLIAM has announced the pulverization of Unionism about once a month; and the pestle and mortar have to be kept hard at work still. We must, therefore, take some other test than Sir WILLIAM'S opinion. With respect to these three elections, to regard them as "virtually," or "morally," or in any other way victories for Unionism, would be to imitate the absurd tactics of Gladstonians themselves. Of course every Unionist would have been glad to win Southwark and Edinburgh, and though the winning of Dundee was almost an impossibility, would have liked to see a still greater impression made on the Separatist majority than was made, great as that was. The result of the fourth election at Doncaster has been a real Unionist victory in which the enemy has been beaten, and soundly beaten on his own ground. It is thus a very different matter from the other three. The howls of delight in which Gladstonians have indulged over these would certainly seem to indicate that peculiar state of mind which is supposed to cause thankfulness for small mercies. In two constituencies Separatism has held its own—a slight gain in numbers in one case being compensated by a heavy loss in the other. We admit that, as we have shown at length elsewhere, the Southwark election at least is very discreditable to Tory management; but it has lost no seat. As for the third, the peculiar position and conduct of the once Unionist, now Separatist, candidate makes the narrow contest of last Saturday a thing for neither side to boast much of. "They fight, and Unionist wounds Gladstonian; "then in scuffling they change BUCHANANS, and Glad-"stonian wounds Unionist," is hardly too flippant a description of the affair. Mr. BUCHANAN succeeds Mr. BUCHANAN, and Gladstonian experience of the tenacity with which that honourable gentleman clings to his opinions should dictate a pleasing uncertainty as to the next development of them, and he may serve as treacherous instrument to one party as to the other. We repeat that we should have been very glad if the result had been different; especially as Mr. RALEIGH, though we agree with but few of his opinions, is one of the very few young Liberals who appear to have a reasoned and intelligible conception of politics as something else than the drag-hunt after whatever red-herring a popular leader chooses to trail. But if the success of a Gladstonian Radical by less than fifty votes over a non-Gladstonian Radical, and the maintaining of two Gladstonian seats in the one case by an increased and the other by a decreased majority, seem such dear delights to Separatists, it is a friendly as well as a reasonable thing to wish them no other. In that case, the tenure of office by their political opponents is likely, at least, to equal in length the Whig tenure started by WALPOLE or the Tory tenure started by PITT.

Reflection, indeed, must, even if the killing frost of the Doncaster election had not supervened, have already considerably damped the unmannerly joy which would not let Mr. GOSCHEN be heard on yesterday week. Certainly Unionism need not be afraid to let its argumentative chances rest on the comparison of the speech then interrupted and that of the CHIEF SECRETARY with the oration of Mr. GLADSTONE. That oration, too, was greeted with the same noisy joy as the announcement of the Southwark figures; but reflection seemed to come even sooner in this case than in the other. A curious and very noteworthy hesitation seems in the more respectable Gladstonian prints to have checked and chequered admiration of "GLADSTONE'S furthest," as the geographers would say, in the direction of demagogy. Among the many gifts and graces of Mr. ARTHUR BALFOUR the faculty of exasperating Mr. GLADSTONE is not the least; and it is probable that, if the CHIEF SECRETARY had not spoken before and had not rubbed the faces of Mr. GLADSTONE and his followers in the dirt so vigorously, Mr. GLADSTONE'S ratification of his Northampton anarchism and his outpourings of affection towards the representatives of anarchism on the Irish benches might have been less decided. To him and to his followers, as we know, the quotations and the reminders which barbed Mr. BALFOUR'S speech seem supremely irrelevant. The Liberal party, it seems, has adopted a "new policy" since 1885; and though this assertion is hard to reconcile with the reiterated declarations that Mr. GLADSTONE'S present policy is the old, the only, the original policy of Liberalism, it may be freely granted that one more inconsistency matters little. The Gladstonian party is to have, it seems, novæ tabulæ, dating from Mr. GLADSTONE'S own conversion, and though everything before that date may rank for claim against the Tories, Gladstonians recognize no antecedent engagements. It is convenient in the highest degree. And when all arguments from the past are ruled out as musty platitudes, and all arguments from the future are ruled out as fantastic apprehensions, the argumentative chances of Home Rule will, no doubt, be strengthened very considerably. Unfortunately the past cannot be ruled out except by consent, and the consent is not in this case likely to be given. And there must be at least some persons on Mr. GLADSTONE'S side who must have been rendered not a little uncomfortable by his last week's speech. Mr. PUNCH'S "Janus" is not forgotten either by peaceful Londoners, or, as it is obvious from the rant of BURNS and his fellows, by unpeaceful ones. Even the assurance of salvation which enwraps the ransomed soul of Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN would, we should suppose, hardly protect him against a shiver as he thinks of having possibly to meet, as Home Secretary, either a Tory or a Socialist mob on the principles of "Re-"member Mitchelstown!"

There is therefore nothing either in the speeches or in the events of recent days to disturb the Government if only it perseveres in well-doing. The way to perdition is indeed, as always, open and evident. At the first symptom of flinching on the part of Lord SALISBURY and his colleagues, the Separatists may have leave to bray delight as loudly as they please, and then at least there will be no possibility of finding fault with them. If there is one lesson unmistakably taught by the history of the last twenty years—that is to say, the whole history of England under widely extended suffrage—it is that the attempt to tack to catch popular breezes is certain to end in disaster. For the other party, whichever is the other at the time, can always outbid in concession; it cannot outbid in consistency. There is, for instance, since Mr. GLADSTONE'S conversion, after fifty years of Parliamentary and forty of Ministerial life, to the conviction that English Parliaments and English Ministries have been guilty of horrible and unvarying injustice to Ireland, nothing to prevent his personal reconversion to the most ferocious coercion—coercion to which the present régime is mildness, and even his own fiercer coercion of five years ago not great severity. He could do it, and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT could do it, and a few more. But it would not really pay. Ministers need not fear the attempt to outbid them in that direction. On the other hand, they have not the slightest hope of themselves outbidding in the other, even if Mrs. Frank Byrne were offered the place of Mistress of the Robes, and a blank commission to appoint the Chief Secretary were sent to the Clan-na-Gael. It is comparatively seldom that in political life unwavering adherence to a particular policy is dictated, not only by honour, not only by statesmanship, but by the lowest as well as the highest considerations of prudence. That is the happy case of Unionism and the present leaders of Unionism. Consistency will keep them in office, at least till a general election, and in view of the inevitable result of any attempt, no matter what, to establish Home Rule, will bring them back, even if a moment of popular madness should once more place Mr. Gladstone in power.

THE FISHERIES COMMISSION.

Although it is still uncertain whether the differences between Canada and the United States have been settled, a long step has been taken in the direction of an amicable arrangement. The Commissioners have provisionally signed a treaty which, even if it is rejected by the Senate, will greatly facilitate future and final negotiations. The assent of the Canadian Parliament would not, in the absence of special provisos, have been formally necessary as a condition of ratification, because the right of making treaties is vested in the Crown; but the treaty specially provides for the reference of its provisions both to the Canadian Parliament and to the Legislature of Newfoundland. Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues must have authorized Sir Charles Tupper to affix his signature to the treaty; and there is no reason to doubt that the Canadian Ministry will, in case of a contest on the point, be supported by its usual majority. The approval of the Imperial Government is little more than a matter of form. It is only as representing Canada that England has been a party to the dispute. If the English and Canadian Commissioners had been unable to agree, the whole negotiation would probably have been abortive; but Mr. Chamberlain would have no motive for being more exacting than Sir Charles Tupper. There appears to be some doubt as to the course which may be adopted by the American Senate. A majority of two-thirds is required for the ratification of the treaty; and, although public opinion in the United States seems to favour the proposals of the Commissioners, it is difficult to foresee the bearing of party politics on the question. The impending contest between the Democrats and the Republicans for the election of the President is probably regarded by the Senators as more interesting than the conclusion of a troublesome controversy with a foreign Power. If Mr. Cleveland can be plausibly accused of neglecting national interests, his adversaries will not hesitate to denounce an arrangement for which he is primarily responsible. The Senate has lately shown a remarkable indifference to the supposed wishes of England, though it had admitted their justice. A new extradition treaty, which had been all but unanimously approved by the Senate, was opposed by a Mr. Riddleberger, who represented for the occasion the Irish dynamiters. Although his arguments seem to have produced no impression, he contrived by "filibustering," which is the American equivalent of obstruction, to delay and ultimately defeat the Bill. It is possible that similar tactics may be employed in the more important matter of the Canadian Fisheries; but it is probable, if not certain, that the requisite majority will vote for the ratification of the treaty.

It was understood from the first that the duty of the Commissioners was not to ascertain the existing rights of either party, but to discover some compromise which should be practicable and just. A merely legal interpretation of the treaty of 1818 would not have been accepted by the Americans. On the other hand, it was not the interest of Canada to insist on the maintenance of rights which could only be asserted by force. The seizure of American fishing-boats, though it seems to have been in most cases legal, tended to provoke dangerous irritation. It could scarcely be denied that a convention passed seventy years ago must in some of its provisions have become obsolete. The popular estimate, though not the legal validity, of the treaty of 1818 had been impaired by more than one interval of suspension. American fishermen were neither able nor willing to understand how privileges which they had enjoyed for a series of years could be equitably withdrawn. It is true that the price of the temporary license had ceased to be paid; but the class which was interested in excluding Canadian imports was not the same which claimed free access to the fisheries. During the late negotiations it became evident that the renewal of the reciprocity treaty would not be conceded by the United States, and the New England fishermen protested loudly against any instalment of Free-trade in the form of an admission of their Canadian competitors to American markets. On the other hand, the Canadians complained of the American encroachment on their fishing-grounds, and of the claim to procure bait on Canadian shores. Under the provisions of the new treaty, which is now published by order of the Senate, Canadian fish will still be excluded from American consumption by the operation of prohibitive duties. American fishing-boats will be admitted to provide themselves in Canadian ports with wood, water, and provisions, but they will not be allowed to purchase bait. The restrictions will be relaxed hereafter, if the fiscal legislation of the United States becomes more liberal. For the present concessions in favour of trade are watched with vigilant suspicion. The Canadian fishing-grounds appear to be more productive than those of their rivals. The American markets are of course more valuable than those of a smaller and less wealthy community. Both parties naturally wish to retain a monopoly of their respective national advantages. It would seem that the decision of the Commissioners is regarded as satisfactory in New England; but some Canadians are inclined to think that they have the worst of the bargain. The English and Canadian Commissioners probably did their best for their clients, and the stipulation which relates to the purchase of bait will, to a certain extent, discourage American competition.

One disputed point of international law has been for the present purpose authoritatively determined in the treaty. Territorial waters, as is well known, extend three miles seaward from low-water mark; but there has long been a dispute whether the boundary line follows the indentation of the shore or passes directly from headland to headland. The Canadians have always claimed the Bay of Fundy, including a large inland sea, as belonging to the Dominion. The Americans in this region construe the rule in the manner most favourable to themselves. The Commissioners propose to define the limits of national jurisdiction as extending three miles from low-water mark, except where it intersects bays which are not more than ten miles wide at the entrance. In this case the balance of advantage from the compromise seems to be on the side of the Americans, but in another region the principle which is now established will enable English vessels to engage in a lucrative trade. The disputes which have arisen as to the seal-trade in the neighbourhood of Behring's Straits have not been submitted to the Commission; but it will be almost impossible for any American Government to controvert the rule which it has voluntarily applied to the Atlantic coast. The President had already ordered the release of one or more English vessels which had been seized by an American cruiser on the pretext of a trespass on the dominion of the United States. The English traders can scarcely have claimed a right to take the seals, inasmuch as the animals frequent the shores which are undoubtedly a part of American territory. On the other hand, they have a right to traverse the open sea; and their claim will scarcely be again disputed since the extent of territorial waters has, at the instance of the American Government, been strictly defined.

Mr. Chamberlain will have increased his reputation by his conduct of the negotiations. It is rather for his personal advantage than a matter of public interest that he should have secured the goodwill of all the American statesmen with whom he has had to deal. The prophecy that his Unionist opinions would render him unpopular has been wholly falsified. Probably responsible men of business may not have been unwilling to find an opportunity of proving their independence of Irish faction. Mr. Chamberlain has not visited Canada; but he seems to have acted in harmony with his Canadian colleagues, and with the Cabinet from which Sir Charles Tupper received his instructions. Some objection had been reasonably taken to Mr. Chamberlain's habit of giving publicity to his opinions on delicate points; but his indifference to diplomatic reserve may have been less inconvenient at Washington than it might have been at a European Court. His occasional declaration that he was making an arrangement among friends, and not settling a controversy with opponents, had perhaps no practical meaning, except as an expression of courtesy and good will. A representative of England who should not be prepared for subtlety and vigour on the part of American diplomatists would probably regret his own unreasonable credulity. The history of the negotiations is of secondary interest, and it has not yet been fully told. It is not known whether the renewal of the reciprocity treaty was at any time discussed. If the proposal was made, it must have proceeded from the representative of Canada, for the American Commissioner had no instructions on the subject, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN objected to a scheme which would have involved the anomaly of distinctive duties levied on English imports while American produce was freely admitted. If the treaty is ratified by the Senate, to which it has been already communicated by the PRESIDENT, the ease and rapidity with which the business will have been completed contrasts strongly with the long duration of the controversy. The Treaty of 1818, though it superseded previous transactions, only marked one of the stages in the contest. The original Treaty of Independence had scarcely been concluded when the American and Canadian fishermen began to quarrel on the subject of their respective rights or pretensions. The Treaty of Ghent, which put an end to the second American War, left the question open, and American disputants have not always recognized the validity of the Convention of 1818. Within a few months a grave American writer has attempted to reopen all the issues which were decided in 1818. It may be hoped that the new treaty, as it is more favourable to the United States, will, if it is ratified, put an end to disputes, at least during the lifetime of the present generation. It is desirable that the settlement should leave no soreness behind, especially on the part of Canada. The dream of Federation represents a serious and legitimate desire to preserve the good will and confidence of the Colonies.

MR. LABOUCHERE'S AMENDMENT.

MR. LABOUCHERE'S speech on Wednesday has, we own, disappointed us very much; and, as we have always had a serious admiration for Mr. LABOUCHERE, this is no laughing matter. If there is a rising politician on the Gladstonian side (a point on which we give no general opinion), it certainly is Mr. LABOUCHERE. He is not a fool, which distinguishes him from a considerable number of his fellow-members of that party, and he is not an ex-Minister who wants to be a Minister again, which distinguishes him from the rest. But Mr. LABOUCHERE does not seem to have risen to the height of the situation on Wednesday When you put questions to a Minister in order to please the Irish benches one course of conduct only is incumbent on you; but when you make a solemn amendment on the Address, with Mr. GLADSTONE to follow, another course becomes necessary. We fail to perceive, with all our admiration for Mr. LABOUCHERE, sufficient evidence in his speech of the gifts and graces with which we have always credited him. His opinion of the Times and the Times's opinion of him are things not exactly interesting urbi et orbi, and might surely have been dismissed with greater brevity, and without the further appendix of a letter of self-justification to the newspapers. Furthermore, when a serious politician like Mr. LABOUCHERE makes a serious speech on foreign politics, he does not refer in Mr. LABOUCHERE'S terms to the fall of the Bastille. Mr. BURNS and Mr. GRAHAM, no doubt, think that the Bastille was devoted to the excruciation of patriotic heroes like themselves. Mr. LABOUCHERE, who is a well-read man, knows that for many a score years before its destruction it was a Parisian Holloway, devoted chiefly if not wholly to the reception of libellers, coiners, persons convicted of indecent assaults, and so forth. Therefore Mr. LABOUCHERE should not have exulted so much over the destruction of the Bastille. As to the general purport of his speech, it has been civilly asked by supporters of his what harm it did? For our part, we always return civil answers to civil questions. The harm which Mr. LABOUCHERE'S speech did is just this. It did no harm at the moment, for the reason that Ministers, who are not fools, had provided against its doing any. But it is evident, from Sir JAMES FERGUSSON'S reply, from Mr. GLADSTONE'S comment, and from the remarks made on the Continent about the matter, that the possibility of such interpellations as Mr. LABOUCHERE'S hampers British diplomacy in the most fatal manner. We do not say that anything of the kind has happened in the present case. But it is quite possible that a foreign Power might be disposed to take up a line of conduct extremely beneficial to England, if it could depend on a certain pledge of English support. Then, says the English Minister, "We "have the best dispositions towards you, but we cannot "allow you to 'ask' or ourselves to 'give' such a pledge; "for, if we do, there will be questions asked in the House of "Commons, and the thing will be blown upon." And so the Power reflects that it will be much better to make terms with some one else. Mr. LABOUCHERE is tolerably familiar with City matters, and he knows the difference between assets on which you can and assets on which you cannot raise money at a pinch. His object, whether he means it or not, is to put the influence of Great Britain in the latter class. And that is the harm which Mr. LABOUCHERE'S motion and motions like it do.

However, in the blessed arrangements of this world (which was not created by Mr. LABOUCHERE) good generally comes out of evil, and out of Mr. LABOUCHERE'S amendment came Mr. GLADSTONE, clothed faultlessly, and in an uncommonly right mind. The debauch of last Friday night appears, as debauches sometimes do, to have brought on a reaction of quite marvellous sobriety; and we, for our parts, should be very glad to catch the Gladstonian CYNTHIA of the minute as she appeared on Wednesday last, and crystallize her for ever and a day. Of course Mr. GLADSTONE paid compliments to the mover of the amendment. Mr. LABOUCHERE, unless rumour lies, is going to have his choice in the next Gladstonian Government of the Home Secretaryship and of a new portfolio of Public Worship, and it is impossible to be rude to a future colleague and a present wirepuller. But if Mr. LABOUCHERE (we think we have observed already that he is no fool) was pleased at Mr. GLADSTONE'S treatment of his remarks, he must have a much more Christian spirit than even we credit him with and he would hardly have written to the Daily News as he did. Translated out of Parliamentary into ordinary language, Mr. GLADSTONE'S remarks amount to about this:—"I have the "highest opinion of my honourable friend, and of course my "honourable friend cannot have meant anything that he "said. If my honourable friend meant anything that he "said, then my honourable friend would have been an ex"ceedingly mischievous person; but as he clearly did not "mean anything of the kind, why I have the highest opinion "of my honourable friend." And so say all of us; adding, that when Mr. GLADSTONE speaks thus, we have the highest opinion of Mr. GLADSTONE. It is one of the greatest misfortunes we know that Mr. GLADSTONE has condemned himself to complete ignorance of foreign policy. He would have made a really admirable Foreign Secretary, with his gift of language, if only he had ever taken the trouble to know anything about the matter.

We have already declared our intention of vexing Mr. LABOUCHERE'S soul by saying nothing at all about Sir JAMES FERGUSSON'S answers. Every one knows what in certain cases will be the duty of the English Government, agreement or no agreement; and it is quite unnecessary to discuss the terms in which the English Government may have signified its intention to do its duty to the Italian Government or to any other. No similar impediment, however, interferes with speech as to the chance of "the case arising." It seems from various confident assertions that the Russian Government is going to venture on the ignes suppositos under the cineri doloso of Prince BISMARCK'S suggestion, and to make proposals as to Bulgaria. We shall wait before surrendering the time-honoured belief that, if Russia is not exactly a pattern of diplomatic loyalty, she is at any rate a pattern of diplomatic astuteness. Nobody knows better than Prince BISMARCK that there is nothing like his theory of Russian "sway" in Bulgaria to be found within the four corners of the Berlin Treaty, and that, as soon as Russia endeavours to formulate any such claim, she will be met by other Powers with crushing rejoinders. Nobody knows better that if Prince FERDINAND occupies the Bulgarian throne without the formality of a European visa, it is only because Russia declined to give her share of that visa to any one except some cast footman of her own. The very moment, then, that Russia quits her present attitude of simple refusal to do anything, she is "bound in shallows and in miseries" of diplomatic defeat or else must plunge into actual violence. Prince BISMARCK, no doubt, would not be sorry to see either result. But any Russian diplomatist who has not lost his head ought to be very sorry to see the former; and we are not quite sure for all Sir CHARLES DILKE'S lucubrations that any Russian general who has not lost his head ought not to be very sorry to see the latter. No real difference has been made in the situation either by the statements of the Russian Official Messenger or by those of Lord SALISBURY on Thursday, though the latter were reassuring in tone and the former exhibit a certain, at least intended, moderation. With regard to England we can so far sympathize with Mr. GLADSTONE—a rare and curious sensation—as to feel quite sure that, until the quarrel is very clearly defined, it is better for England to engage herself as little as well may be. But the side on which, if not the extent to which, she ought ultimately to engage herself is clear to all those persons who have some acquaintance with the facts of foreign politics. We wish we could think that these persons include any considerable proportion of Mr. GLADSTONE'S own party. For if there is one thing that is clearer than another in the strange welter of modern affairs, it is that all true Englishmen have but one interest in such matters, and that it is the interest of all true Englishmen to put an end to the fatal attempt made by English politicians twelve years ago—for the first time for many years—to climb to personal advantage on the shoulders of national disaster. We gladly recognize both in Mr. GLADSTONE himself and in some of his followers a desire to let these miserable bygones be bygones to some extent, and to accept a sounder view of affairs such as that taken by Lord ROSEBERY in loyal following of Conservative precedent. All "Tory Jingoes," who are worthy the name, will be very happy to make the penance of the penitents as light as possible. For "Tory "Jingoism" simply means knowledge of the facts of historical politics, and knowledge can always afford to pardon ignorance.

CRICKET REFORM.

THE success of our cricketers in Australia would, no doubt, be more gratifying to us if they were more annoying to the Colonists. But our brothers of the antipodes are said to have lost their interest in cricket. Just for a wind-bag of leather they left us, just for a chance of a smashed collar-bone. In fact, football has taken, in their fickle affections, the place of the nobler and more scientific pastime. They should take the advice of JAMES LOVE, comedian, in his Cricket, an Heroick Poem (London, 1770):—

O thou sublime Inspirer of my Song,
What matchless Trophies to thy Worth belong!
Look round the Globe, inclined to Mirth, and see What daring Sport can claim the Prize from Thee.

Mr. LOVE adds an exhortation, in prose, "to leave all "meaner sports, and cultivate cricket only." Now football is a meaner and a muddier sport, though all very well in its way. However, the Australians are too greatly gifted to "sin their mercies," and cricket will regain her eminence in the land of SPOFFORTH and GIFFEN.

Cricket in Australia is perhaps less in need of reform than cricket at home. Throwing is said to be practically unknown there; it has died in the cold shade of public disapproval. Perhaps nothing else can put it down here; for to define a throw will always be, as Mr. KNIGHT knew fifty years ago, practically impossible. But throwing is as easily distinguished from bowling, in fact, Mr. KNIGHT said, "as the trot of a horse is from the walk or gallop" (Sporting Magazine, February 1828). This is not quite true. We have seen a bowler who, when watched from the side, was distinctly and undeniably throwing. But when one went to umpire it was impossible to "no-ball" him, from the bowler's umpire's point of view. There was Mr. EVANS, too—did he throw in the years of his great success? Cambridge men said he did, Oxford men said he did not. The bowler himself—a fact too much neglected—is not conscious of throwing. He never means to throw. His style degenerates into a throw by the attempt to get on more pace or more spin, while his conscience is like a sea at rest. Thus the bowler does not know he throws, and the spectators differ in opinion; so how can we expect an umpire to "no-ball" a brother in the cricketing art? The only remedy lies in the self-denial of captains and committees, who should decline to put on a notoriously doubtful and debatable bowler. This is a little hard on the bowler; but, if he has learned a dubious style, he must just unlearn it, and be very careful with his wrist and elbow. We doubt if a throwing bowler could bowl in a ball from long-leg as swift as he could throw it in; he would probably be conscious of using a different action, not the action he employs in bowling. But he must give way to the general good of the game, and learn a new and unimpeachable delivery.

We have tried not to be hard on the bowler who labours under the imputation of "chucking." For it is certain that modern bowlers are at a great disadvantage, thanks to the nicety of modern grounds. Twenty years ago shooters came once or twice in an over on many grounds, and more wickets were bowled by shooters than by yorkers. This was, we think, an excellent thing. Nothing in cricket was prettier than the lightning-like pace with which a good player came down on a shooter. Nothing was more pleasant to the bowler than to deliver a ball on the leg stump, a good length, and see it dart across to the off stump, without rising an inch, and scatter the bails. The batsman had then to trust far more to his eye than at present, and had, in forward play, to hold his bat so low that a shooter could not glide under it. Now he can play forward far more confidently and even carelessly. The graceful old far-stretching forward play of FULLER PILCH has gone out. A kind of "half cock" suffices now. We cannot, of course, advocate a return to worse rolled and worse mown grounds for the purpose of favouring shooters. Perhaps a return to a lower delivery, like EMMETT'S or Mr. POWYS'S, might result in more shooters. Mr. POWYS, we think, would have sent in those left-hand shooters on almost any ground. But, deprived of his shooter, the poor bowler needs all the help he can get; hence cometh throwing, in the effort to combine pace and work beyond what is permitted. So what can be done for the bowler?

Much can be done by altering the law of leg before wicket. There is nothing about leg before in the rules of 1774. The earliest l.b.w. we know of was in 1795; and soon came Lord FREDERICK BEAUCLERK'S case, May 19, 1797. In 1853 a case came before the law Courts (LANE v. BARNES). At present the law is a mere protection to the batsman, and an injustice to the bowler. The object of the bowler is to give the balls which it will be most difficult for the batsman to keep out of what Mr. BOUNCER called his timber-yard. Now the most difficult balls are the balls which twist. And the law permits the batsman to play these very deliveries with his legs, his back, his shoulders. This is clearly unfair. Probably the rule that the ball shall have been pitched in a straight line from the bowler's to the batsman's wicket, and, in the opinion of the umpire, would have hit it, must be a legacy from days when a voluntary break was thought next to impossible. We know that LUMPY'S off-break back was regarded as a kind of miracle. When it was not permitted to bowl even underhand with the back of the hand upwards, twisting from leg was a pure accident. Legislators would argue that the batsman should not be given out when his body stopped a twist due to mere inequalities of ground. But now the twist is due to the difficult art of the bowler, and the law deprives him of his deserved advantage. By much care and pains he acquires the double break. Then the batsman calmly steps in front of the stumps and does with his legs what his bat was meant to do. You can hardly get a man out l.b.w. except with a yorker or full pitch, non-twisting balls.

To ourselves the remedy seems obvious. Let a man be given out when he saves his wicket with anything but his bat. It is heartbreaking to a bowler, and tedious to spectators, to see a batsman fall over or step in front of his stumps and receive all the twisting deliveries in his pads. The rule should be that a man is out when he stops with his legs or body a ball that, in the umpire's opinion, would have hit the wicket. This leaves a good deal to the umpire; but something must be left to him, and something is left, even under the present rule. The game will be shortened, and made more lively. Instead of placing his body before wicket to a ball outside the leg or off stump, a batsman will be compelled to play at the ball. He may play it, or he may give a catch, or he may be bowled clean—all much better alternatives than the modern coup de botte. Innings will be much shorter and much better worth seeing. The game of the coup de botte is not worth seeing at all. In this direction opinion is tending; and, if all batsmen were bowlers, the rule would have been altered long ago. The umpire, of course (except at country matches), will always give the batsman the benefit of any doubt in his mind. May we suggest that, when he is almost sure, he should enter a verdict of "Not Proven," to be registered by the scorers? Three "Not Provens" would mean one "Out," and a batter of dubious honesty would fall at the third warning. This would be an agreeable novelty, and would make batsmen very careful to use their natural defensive weapon—the bat, not the legs, which were never meant by nature as the cheap defence of wickets.

This is the chief legislative reform that cricket requires. Shorter space for lunch, less gorging at lunch, earlier beginning of matches, rapid sending in of the next man, are rather moral reforms, and they, too, are greatly needed. In country matches, and when a certain great cricketer is given out anywhere, we would gladly introduce the old rule of the Ashdown Coursing Club:—"If any gentleman finds fault with the umpire's decision, he is to be amerced a gallon of wine" or shandygaff.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

THE House of Commons and the Farmers' Alliance were simultaneously engaged on Monday last in the difficult task of discovering remedies for agricultural distress. The Alliance, which had for some time past appeared to be in a moribund condition, for once deviated from its ordinary course of attacking the landlords into a discussion of schemes of co-operation. According to a statistical statement furnished by Mr. JAMES HOWARD, the share of the farmer in the selling price of his produce is less than three-fifths of the whole. The rest is said to be intercepted by corn-dealers and other middlemen, whose participation in the profits of industry is naturally grudged. One of the speakers expressed the opinion that the profits of retail dealing, if it were undertaken by the farmers, would be larger than the present results of agricultural industry. No experiment could be more legitimate than a trial of co-operation, if only it presented a reasonable expectation of success. In many large towns it has long been practised with advantage in the machinery of distribution; but it has almost always failed when it has been applied to production. Frequent appeals to farmers to combine against the butchers have produced little practical result. The tendency of modern trade is rather to increase than to diminish the division of labour. It may be added that manufacturers have greater facilities for common action than a scattered rural population. In contests with middlemen the interests of producers and consumers are for once the same; but the butchers and the speculators in corn are more than a match for the farmers and the general community.

It is not surprising that in despair the tenants should first turn on their landlords, and that they should then demand the only kind of protectionist legislation which seems to be within their reach. The Alliance hopes to obtain through the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill the exclusion of much foreign competition. It has no scruple in preferring a claim to a share in the property which belongs to railway shareholders. The agricultural body as such has not contributed a shilling to an outlay of several hundreds of millions on the construction of railways. Its self-appointed spokesmen openly disregard the Parliamentary title on which large and small capitalists relied when they advanced their money. Some of the claimants perhaps fail to understand that the proposed legislation affects traders and consumers even more largely than railway Companies. Others who are better informed take care to conceal their knowledge. One suggestion which was made at the meeting of the Alliance seems to have fallen flat. A sanguine speaker declared that the rural community would not be satisfied with anything short of absolute control over the local rates. If any advantage results from the Local Government Bill, it will not take the form of increased parsimony. There can be little doubt that the municipal franchise will be extended to all householders, and, indeed, there are strong reasons in favour of such a policy. The Councils which are to levy and expend the rates will therefore represent a constituency which will have an interest rather in promoting than in checking expenditure. Farmers are a thrifty race; but cottagers will have little scruple in taxing their richer neighbours.

The House of Commons was meanwhile debating on a nostrum which is much less likely than co-operative enterprise to restore agricultural prosperity. Lord JOHN MANNERS, who represents the existing Committee of Agriculture, announced the intention of the Government to create a more dignified and more ambitious department, under the same or a similar name. On some future occasion the Minister will probably give some explanation of the reasons for introducing a change in the duties of the new Government office. The Chancellor of the Duchy, through his subordinates, administers the law relating to the diseases of animals, and statistics are collected in a manner which appears to give universal satisfaction. Probably some additional functions will be assigned to the office; and a few agricultural enthusiasts will think that they have obtained a valuable concession. What the department will do must be ascertained by experience. It is easier to define the objects which it will not accomplish. No addition will be made to the price of wheat, nor indeed is it desirable that legislation should tend to produce even a fractional dearth. Anything which the department can effect might probably be as well done by the same persons, under their existing title. It must be confessed that the new arrangement will probably be innocuous, and it may possibly serve to mitigate agricultural clamour. The representatives of rural constituencies were much more deeply interested in a far more questionable measure. Lord JOHN MANNERS explicitly stated on behalf of the Government that it is proposed to abolish preferential rates on railways. The Farmers' Alliance could not be more indifferent than the House of Commons to considerations of justice to the railway Companies, and to the impolicy of arbitrary interference with the course of trade. One of the oddest peculiarities of the agitation is that the prohibition of preferential rates will afford no relief to the imaginary sufferers. The railway Companies will be differently affected, according to their geographical conditions. Some of them will lose a considerable traffic. Lines which have no direct competition with the sea have comparatively little interest in the question. It has never occurred to the farmers or their friends to inquire into the reason of an apparent anomaly. They can hardly believe that railway Companies cultivate a perverse sympathy with foreigners or a spite against their own countrymen. The proposed revision of tariffs involves much more serious consequences than the diversion of a certain amount of traffic from railway trucks to steamships. Freighters will, as at present, decline to tax themselves for the benefit of domestic industry.

The natural guardians of property are unfortunately not always to be trusted with the defence of vested rights in which they have no direct interest. Capitalists and millionaires sometimes encourage interference with the ownership of land; and conversely landowners join the assailants of the large class which has invested money in railways. It must be admitted that in the last Session the House of Lords discussed the Railway and Coast Traffic Bill in a spirit of moderation; but some of its members proposed or supported amendments which would have been equally objectionable in principle and in their immediate operation. The announcement that the forthcoming Bill will be the same with last year's measure, as it passed the House of Lords, is, it may be hoped, literally or approximately true; but the representatives of certain sections of the community already begin to agitate for further innovations, and experience shows that advocates of special interests are better organized than defenders of proprietary right and of the public good. The House of Lords, after full consideration, overruled the plausible arguments which were urged against differential rates in favour of foreign produce; but Lord JERSEY has given notice of his intention to reopen the controversy by an amendment on the second reading of the Bill. The House of Lords, if it can be persuaded to condemn a reasonable and almost necessary practice, will not only deprive the railway Companies of a legitimate source of profit, but will impose a burdensome tax on large bodies of consumers. Farmers who have not studied either political economy or the conduct of railway traffic may be excused for grudging the apparent advantage which is in some cases enjoyed by imported or exported produce. Their instructors ought to understand better the nature and the reasons of the practice which they condemn. In the majority of cases the native producer would derive no possible advantage from the prohibition of a system which is beneficial to all who are concerned in its maintenance. The valuable work on Railway Rates which was published a year ago by Mr. GRIERSON explains and illustrates in full detail the motives and the effects of an apparent preference which is in fact created by natural causes; but the general theory is easily understood by all who have studied the working of railways. The tariff which is called differential is for the most part regulated by the competition of the sea. Mr. GRIERSON mentions, as an instance of differential export rates, the charge on tea despatched from London to Liverpool for exportation to America. If the railway rate were to exceed a certain small amount, the tea would be shipped in London and consigned either to Liverpool or to the ultimate place of destination. The tea-dealer or grocer at an intermediate station—as, for instance, at Birmingham—though he pays a higher mileage rate on his tea, would neither gain nor lose by a change in the through rate between the ports. The larger question of an arbitrary repudiation of the bargain between the Companies and their customers may be separately discussed. The injustice of many popular schemes of readjustment is caricatured in a Bill to be introduced by Sir E. BIRKBECK for the exclusive benefit of the fish trade. The proposer coolly repeals all the Acts under which railways have been constructed, as far as they establish a tariff for the conveyance of fish. A new scale of rates is to be enacted at the instance of the freighters, and of course with as little regard to the interests of the Companies as to their legal rights. The carriage of fish by certain trains is to be made compulsory, and indeed the promoters might almost as plausibly confiscate that part of the railway revenue which is derived from the fish trade. If the Bill is not summarily rejected, every producer and every dealer may, with equal reason, ask Parliament for a proportionate share in the plunder which will have been authorized.

THE LONDON ANARCHISTS.

MONDAY evening's meeting at Allen's Riding School was not exactly the most important thing which has happened in our times, but it was an historic event of a kind. It marked the establishment in London of anarchist meetings on the well-known French model. We have had things of the same sort already; but they were, comparatively speaking, hole-and-corner affairs, quite tame and colourless. This was wholly on the lines of the great original; like an equally noisy, but gayer, assembly, it had "rugissements et bondissements, bacchanale et "saturnale, galop infernal, ronde du sabbat, tout le tremble-"ment." There was a crush and a squeeze; the stewards were hustled out of the way; popular speakers were dragged, breathless and with bursting buttons, through a mob of yelling enthusiasts; half the speeches could not be heard; Mr. STUART, with his lion of AGAMEMNON, was ruthlessly smothered in noise; it is said that a good deal of portable property changed hands on its way to the fence; and, to complete the fidelity of the imitation, there was the correct attempt to storm the platform, with the obligatory accompaniment of kickings out and broken heads. "Tout le trem-"blement" was there; DAVITT and BURNS stood for the practical revolutionist; STUART, M.P., made a good "fruit sec"; not even a professorship and a laboratory replete with every comfort can save him from belonging to the race. Mrs. ANNIE BESANT took the part created by Mlle. LOUISE MICHEL when the piece was first played in Paris, and did it very well. Mr. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM is not so easy to please. If we could believe that when he fell back, weakened by skilly and overcome by emotion, into the arms of his wife and mother (ma mère was to the fore, of course), he was heard to mutter "Est-ce que j'ai bien joué mon rôle?" one would know what to make of him. But Mr. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM probably said nothing so cynical. There is a ring about his rant which inspires some confidence that he believes in it. He is not without an aftershine of the manners of a gentleman in his talk; and, besides, he can be really funny on rare occasions, even when he means to be humorous, and always when he means to be heroic. For this let us thank our stars; for we do not get too much of it in these days. If Mr. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM had to be ticketed, the word "névropathe" would probably best serve the turn. It is modern, it looks learned, and it is rather more polite than the adjective applied in the Tale of a Tub to the persons of more—much more—nerves than brains who are apt to go rabid in times of political excitement. The managers of the show in Allen's Riding School had the good luck to secure in Mr. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM an actor whose temperament exactly suited the part and spared him the trouble of acting.

It is not necessary to examine the stuff of the oratory at the meeting. An anarchist assembly must talk anarchy. As the meeting, too, spent the more part of its time in elbowing, pushing, pocket-picking, and shouting, and as the speakers foamed at things in general, it would be peculiarly superfluous to discuss Mr. M. DAVITT's seven points. The taxing of ground-rents and free education are, though in very different degrees, practical questions. An eight-hours working day; the exemption of all incomes under 150*l.* from all kinds of taxation; and good houses for workers at a fair, not a profit, rent, are of the nature of demands for the moon. Is tobacco to be sold untaxed? are beer and spirits to be supplied free from excise to all who earn less than 150*l.* a-year? A more Christian system of relief than the workhouse, and public relief works in times of distress, are points in the new charter which will doubtless have the approval of Cardinal MANNING. But the resolutions of the meeting are of infinitely less interest than the meeting itself. They are ordinary nonsense; but it is a sign of the progressive conversion of the Gladstonian party to anarchy. When a notorious Socialist agitator, who has hitherto hung on the skirt of rows, and kept a whole skin, came forward at the close of the proceedings in response to a call, and began to scold Messrs. STUART and PICKERSGILL for not joining earlier in the agitation, he did more than provoke an attempt to storm the platform and a free fight, he made a note of the evolution of the Gladstonian Liberal. A little while ago members of Parliament who supply Mr. GLADSTONE with slanders, and Parliamentary nonentities whom Edinburgh prefers to Mr. GOSCHEN, held aloof from the agitation. Now they come on the platform with DAVITT, BURNS, and Mrs. ANNIE BESANT. So far they have advanced; and when in the natural course of things their dissenting church begins to develop fresh dissent, they will go on with the more advanced bodies as soon as they have been again pricked up from behind. This, of course, is the natural fate of STUARTS and WALLACES, and does not signify much; but it does signify somewhat that alliance with BURNS and Company is found consistent with the position of Gladstonian Liberals. To be sure we see no reason to lament the formation of the alliance, having for our own part a shrewd suspicion where it will lead the contracting parties.

HIGHLANDS AND LOWLANDS.

IT is not common, even in these days, to find a debate so neatly divided into sense on one side and nonsense on the other as was the debate on Dr. CAMERON's amendment of last Tuesday night. The Doctor and other speakers on his side—not only the Crofters' members, but Sir G. TREVELYAN and Mr. BRADLAUGH—had the nonsense entirely to themselves. On the polite supposition of Mr. A. J. BALFOUR they must be allowed to have the interest of the Crofters really at heart, and if they had any suggestion to make, it would at least be listened to. But, as the IRISH SECRETARY told them in the course of his very able speech, something besides enthusiasm is expected from Doctors who are to cure the patient. It was, however, all they had to offer. A very considerable part of their harangues was taken up with vehement and frequently contradictory statements on matters of fact which may or may not be of interest, but have really nothing to do with the best way of helping the Crofters in the Lewis. Whether Dr. CAMERON is right in saying that a certain body of raiders eat the deer they kill, or whether Mr. MACDONALD is to be believed when he says that this curious people will rather die than steal, though they are prepared to destroy, is a nice subject of inquiry for the student of the character of the islesmen. As matters of administrative detail, the necessity or the reverse of employing large bodies of soldiers and marines—the judgment, or want of judgment, shown by the Crown lawyers—and the adequacy or excessive severity of sentences passed on rioters, have, no doubt, an interest of their own. But, in whichever way they are settled, they do not in the least affect the main question. If the SECRETARY for SCOTLAND was unduly frightened and the Crown lawyers were all bunglers, the Crofters would be no better able to escape starvation than before. If their spokesmen in Parliament deserve the credit given them by Mr. BALFOUR, they must wish, it would seem, to save their constituents from famine first of all, and chastise administrative bungling when the more pressing work is done. They prefer to begin with the lesser task. A little windy eloquence is mingled in their speeches with a great deal of carping at Ministers and Sheriffs. The mixture ought perhaps to be treated with civility in the House, where it is of more importance to keep up old traditions of courtesy than to give Messrs. CAMERON, SUTHERLAND, and others a sufficient dressing; outside it chiefly inspires a wish to apply certain passages in the Latter-Day Pamphlets addressed to persons who thought themselves "men of "virtue, benevolence, what not," but were not "even men "of sincerity and honest sense." The end of the phrase might be advantageously changed to common honesty.

The speeches of the LORD-ADVOCATE and of Mr. BALFOUR were a striking contrast to the frothy talk from the Opposition benches. Their defence of the Scotch Law Officers, though sufficiently vigorous and convincing, was properly subordinated to the main question. The LORD ADVOCATE was officially bound to devote more attention to the defence of his officers; but both speakers brought reason and knowledge to the debate. Mr. MACDONALD restated the evidence, to show that the population of the island has increased until it can no longer be supported by any industry within its reach, and that this is the main source of the present misery. Mr. BALFOUR dealt most effectually with the sentimental arguments of the Crofters. No answer can be made to his criticism on the claim advanced for the Crofters as clansmen, and therefore part owners of the tribal land. This belief, which, as Mr. M. CAMERON rather weakly puts it, the Crofters hold, "right or wrong," affords no shadow of justification for interference with the land of other clans. There is, indeed, an almost unprecedented amount of foolish loose talk on this subject. Among the Crofters who have lately been getting into trouble is one of the name of KERR. What possible right can a KERR, who must be a Borderer by descent, have as a clansman in the island of Lewis? Neither do the sentimental talkers on the Opposition side explain what is to happen when the clan grows too large for its own land. The MACDONALDS can hardly go over in lymphads to Ulster and butcher another SHANE O'NEIL. Mr. BALFOUR was well justified by the facts in insisting that the deer-forests only cover land which is unremunerative either for sheep-farms or cultivation. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN was talking Radicalism of the usual sentimental kind which is so effective in some quarters now when he asked whether Mr. WINANS'S gillies were a change for the better from the old race of small cattle-farmers. He did not explain how the small cattle-farmers were to make both ends meet with stock at its present price. It is one of the causes of the poverty in Lewis that stock has sunk some sixty per cent. in value of late. Sir GEORGE'S little jeer is characteristic of the whole line of argument adopted by his side, in which gushing twaddle does duty for reasoning. Whether Mr. WINANS'S gillies are superior or inferior in moral character to small stock-farmers, it is none the less the case that barren land will not support a large population, and that, in the absence of industries, the people of the overcrowded Lewis must starve. The remedy is, as every competent and honest observer knows, emigration. The wish of the Crofter members to replant parts of the mainland with families from the isles, who would simply starve, as the old cottiers did, is contemptibly dishonest and immoral. Mr. BALFOUR and his colleague had an overwhelming superiority in argument. They will, of course, not remain content with a debating club success, but will take practical measures. There is one sentence in Dr. CAMERON'S speech with which we may safely agree. It asserts that "It is the province of the responsible Government "to state what steps should be taken in the present state of "things." It is, and if the responsible Government neglects its duty, it will briefly find that it has put a rod in pickle for its own back.

The discussion on Mr. ANDERSON'S amendment of Wednesday afternoon differed from Dr. CAMERON'S very much as the Lowland differs from the Highland agitator. It was more sane-looking and very much duller. With the single exception of Mr. WALLACE, who made a most unmannerly attack on Mr. BALFOUR, the supporters of the motion spoke with at least an attempt to be temperate and reasonable, but essentially they were as revolutionary in their demands as any of the Crofter members. Mr. ANDERSON asked that Parliament should interfere to break, or at least seriously modify, the terms of a large body of contracts. Like other men engaged in agriculture, the Scotch tenants, who hold their farms on nineteen years leases, have suffered from the prolonged depression. This is sufficiently notorious, and it has been known for some time that the tenants have of late been very much dissatisfied with their bargains. As Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL acknowledged, the tenants have hitherto valued these long leases as a protection against their landlord, who was precluded by them from raising the rent in times of prosperity. In these times of depression, however, the long lease works with exactly contrary effect, and the tenant who took his farm at the end of the series of fat years, and at a rent calculated on the profits of prosperous times, finds that in these lean years he has made a burdensome contract. On these grounds Mr. ANDERSON and several other Scotch members call for special legislation on behalf of the tenant, or for the extension of the Crofters Act to all parts of Scotland. In spite of the moderation of tone with which the request was made, it may be pronounced not only unsound in principle, but even a little impudent. The tenants as a body reaped very great profits by help of the long leases during the good times after the Crimean War, and there is something decidedly audacious in a request that when the tide turns they should be exempted from suffering loss through fall of prices. It does, indeed, seem certain that there must be a general readjustment of rents all over Scotland, and it is even probable that considerable changes may be introduced into the relations between tenants and landlords. As the existing leases fall in new ones can be made on other terms, and it may be taken for granted the tenants will no longer offer nor landlords expect to receive the old scale of rent. But the readjustment may be arranged by free dealings between the parties, and ought to be. The present rents were fixed by competition among the tenants themselves. The leases were put up to auction, and the tenants must be supposed to have understood their own interests, and to have calculated that on a general balance of loss and gain they would make their profit in the course of the nineteen years. If the price of agricultural produce had risen, what a clamour would have been raised at the suggestion that the contracts should be revised on behalf of the landlord! It is certainly not in the public interest that the actual leaseholders should be ruined by their bargains, but nobody is more interested in preserving them from this misfortune than the landlord. The owner of an estate who was harsh enough to ruin a tenant by severely exacting his pound of flesh would be very briefly punished by finding himself with a farm on his hands from which he would probably get neither rent nor profit of any kind. In spite of the assertions of the tenant-farmers' friends in Parliament, there is no reason to suppose that Scotch landlords, as a body, have been so blind to their own real interests as to refuse the reasonable abatements of rent made necessary by the heavy and probably permanent fall in prices. The LORD ADVOCATE perhaps gave too favourable a view of the condition of Scotch agriculture when he said that he did not think any farms were lying vacant in the country; but Scotch farmers have suffered less than the English. They have certainly not suffered so severely as to afford any justification for an interference with the sanctity of contract for their benefit.

MR. BLUNT'S ACTION.

A DISAGREEMENT of the jury who tried the action of BLUNT v. BYRNE was always so eminently probable an issue of the case that the plaintiff's sympathizing friends in Ireland had plenty of time to prepare their own explanation of it. The particular fiction upon which they have elected to rely is perhaps about as good as another. Their assertion that the jury were divided in the proportion of eleven to one in favour of a verdict for the plaintiff proves nothing more than that the human personality is indivisible, and that they were, therefore, precluded from describing Mr. BLUNT'S majority as one of eleven and three-quarters against the remaining fraction. It is just as likely—or as unlikely—that the proportion was exactly reversed, and that every juryman but one was disposed to find for Mr. BYRNE; and it is a far more likely theory than either that the division of opinion between them approached much nearer to equality. Even those who hold as confidently as we ourselves do that Mr. BYRNE ought to have got his verdict will probably see more than one reason for feeling no surprise at the actual result. The Gladstonian commentators who have been foolishly exulting in the fact that what they describe as "even a Dublin special "jury" has declined to uphold the action of the Irish Executive, have probably conceived a most exaggerated idea of the average status, whether social or educational, of the kind of tribunal which they thus ignorantly extol. In England, at any rate, the normal difference between at least three-fourths of the men who form the special jury panel and the common juryman is not by any means so vast as these observations appear to assume; and in Ireland, we apprehend, the distinction is likely, if anything, to be still less marked. Such being the case, it would have been strange, indeed, if the Dublin jury-box had failed to contain its proportion of gentlemen who were "agin the Government," and whose natural prejudices—for it is not in the least necessary to impute to them anything worse than perversity—might easily incapacitate them from seeing anything but the plaintiff's side of the question.

The mere failure, however, of the jury to agree in rejecting Mr. BLUNT's claim is a matter of comparatively minor importance. To the public it is much more material to be enabled to say whether, on the evidence as summed up for them by the judge, they ought to have agreed on its rejection. And on this point, fortunately, there is not the smallest room for doubt. There is, indeed, no exhibition of impudence on which the Nationalists have more amply earned the congratulations of their English admirers than they have on the assertion that the principles laid down by Lord Chief Baron PALLES were, on the whole, favourable to the case of Mr. BLUNT. The CHIEF SECRETARY to the Lord Lieutenant did not put the matter a whit too strongly in saying in his reply to Mr. DILLON that "the character of "the evidence given in court, and the tenor of the judge's "charge, must entirely remove any doubt as to the gross "illegality of the meeting which Mr. BLUNT, in spite of the "warnings of the Executive, persisted in attempting to hold." The most cursory glance at the series of questions which the LORD CHIEF BARON put to the jury suffices to dispose of this question. He asked them first—and, of course, merely formally, since the affirmative was virtually admitted on both sides—whether the plaintiff resisted and disturbed the police in dispersing the meeting on October 23; secondly, whether the object of that meeting was to incite the people to agree not to pay their rents, and thereby injure the landlords; thirdly, whether its object was to incite the tenants and others to agree to resist the execution of writs and decrees; and, fourthly, whether it was its object to incite persons to agree to deter tenants by threats and menaces from paying their rents, or by like means to deter all persons except evicted tenants from taking evicted farms, and to coerce them to give up and quit the same. The fifth and seventh questions were whether there was an agreement to incite to refusal of rents or resistance of process, and whether the meeting was held to further that agreement. The sixth question was whether an agreement existed to incite tenants to pay their rents, or portions thereof, to persons other than their landlords, and whether it was in furtherance of that agreement that the meeting was held. In the eighth question the jury were asked whether the plaintiff took part in the said meeting, with all or any of the intents mentioned in the said agreement; and by the ninth and last question they were called upon to determine whether the circumstances in which the meeting was held were reasonably likely to produce danger to the peace and tranquillity of the neighbourhood.

It might fairly be objected that so me of these questions were, on the previous showing of the charge itself, superfluous; but that objection may be readily waived. If the issues submitted to the jury were needlessly multiplied there would still be no reason to regret a course which has exhausted all the questions, relevant or irrelevant, which have been raised in the course of the case. It is quite conceivable that a jury might on the evidence, and without the slightest suspicion of prejudice, have returned an answer adverse to Mr. BLUNT on every one of the questions, from the first to the last. They might, that is to say, have held not only that the object of the Woodford meeting was to incite to the refusal of rent, and to the resistance of legal process, but that there was a well understood if tacit agreement to that effect, to which Mr. BLUNT, on the evidence of his previous dealings with Mr. O'BRIEN and Mr. GILL, must be deemed to have been a party. They might have found that he did take part in the said meeting, not only with some but with all the intents above mentioned, and that he did hold it in circumstances which were reasonably likely to produce danger to the peace and tranquillity of the neighbourhood. A perfectly impartial jury might, we say, have answered all these questions adversely to Mr. BLUNT, while on the other hand no jury with the slightest pretension to such a character could have answered all of them in his favour; and it is to be observed that, leaving the formal first question out of account, an adverse answer to any one of the other eight would of itself have been fatal to the plaintiff's case. Even if they had been answered in his favour from the second to the eighth inclusive—to take the most favourable assumption that the case admits of—a finding against him on the ninth alone would have amounted to a verdict for the defendant. Even if Mr. BLUNT's object had been an innocent one, and he was convinced at the same time that it was safe to hold the meeting, this would have given him no grievance against the Executive, or any cause of action against their officer, unless such conviction accorded with the facts. "The peace and quiet of a neighbourhood cannot "depend," as the LORD CHIEF BARON drily remarked, "upon the belief or want of belief, the knowledge or want "of knowledge of a stranger who only spent three days in "the district." Even on the judge's extremely charitable hypothesis that Mr. BLUNT meant to be as good as his placard, and "preach patience to the people," his summons of the meeting was the special cause of dangerous local excitement, equally indefensible. If "he, who in quest of silence, "'Order!' hoots," and is thereby apt to make "the hubbub "he imputes," deserves little thanks from the well-behaved portion of an audience; and the man who inflames the passion of an excitable people by adjuring them to be calm, is no better friend to the tranquillity of a district than his counterpart is to the decorum of a theatre.

Apart from the particular incident which has given occasion for it, the charge of Lord Chief Baron PALLES should be of some political value merely as a general statement of the law. We have been treated of late by the Gladstonian press to a most imposing display of legal learning on the subject of public meeting. These writers have apparently just discovered, and announce with befitting pride, that the Proclamation of the LORD-LIEUTENANT does not of itself make a meeting illegal, and they seem, with the usual logic of their school, to have proceeded thence to the conclusion that such a proclamation of a meeting in no degree affects the antecedent presumption of its legality. For such persons the LORD CHIEF BARON's charge, with its words of very emphatic warning to those who undertake the responsibility of defying such Executive administration, should be useful and instructive reading. They may learn, too, from these well-weighed judicial deliverances that danger to the peace of a district is not, as they have assumed throughout the controversy, the only ground on which a Government is justified in proclaiming a public meeting. It may surprise some of them to find that incitement to rent-robbery is just as illegal as provocation to disorder; that in particular the illegality of the Plan of Campaign, of which some of them have ventured to approve, and with which many of them have coquetted, has received solemn judicial reaffirmation; and that a learned judge has deemed it necessary to add the reminder that a meeting held to promote spoliatory schemes is an illegal meeting, to take part in which, or to aid or promote it, is an offence for which those committing it may be criminally proceeded against.

TWO DOGS.

WEDNESDAY'S papers contained a couple of instances which show what man has made of dogs. We are not referring to sausages, or any other form of artificial food, in which the presence of their flesh may be suspected of lurking. A live dog is better than a dead lion; much more, then, is it superior in importance to a corpse of its own species. The dogs with whose misfortunes we hope to excite sympathy have indeed escaped from the cruelty or negligence of mankind, and gone to a better world, where it may be piously assumed that they have plenty of hunting, and are never whipped, either "publicly or privately," as Mr. Justice GRANTHAM's pet statute has it. But they both came by violent deaths, and perhaps the consideration of their sufferings may serve to protect survivors against similar calamities. By far the more shocking of the two cases was heard at the Hammersmith Police Court before Mr. FENWICK, and most people will think that the result was quite inadequate, so far as the sentence upon the defendant is concerned. EDWARD GALE, described as a "pensioned police constable," was summoned for maliciously killing a dog, and, being convicted, was fined three pounds, together with two shillings for costs, and half a sovereign as the value of the animal. It will be observed that Mr. GALE, of whom it is satisfactory to think as no longer in the police force, was not prosecuted, as he might surely have been, for cruelty to animals, but for malicious injury to property. According to the evidence adduced by the complainant, which Mr. FENWICK appears to have believed, Mr. GALE was seen "pushing a rake into a box "containing the dog," and "the dog was crying." It was afterwards found dead. We can conceive no reason, unless it be a purely technical one, which might have been avoided by framing the summons in a different way, why a man who behaves in this way should not be sent to gaol. It seems that Mr. Gale had some grievance against this poor brute, for he was heard to say, "I have been looking for you all "night." But if human beings wreak their vengeance in this savage fashion, which, besides its wanton barbarity, is a scandal and annoyance to the neighbourhood, they should be made to feel some small part of the torture which they deliberately inflict. Possibly the bereaved owner of Mr. Gale's victim may have been more desirous of obtaining pecuniary compensation for his loss than of punishing the canicide. The man who can put a price upon his dog will be thought by many people to be unworthy of its affection. But, however this may be, the law which is supposed to protect animals ought to be more stringently enforced.

The fate of Rock, which was investigated on the same day by Mr. Justice Manisty and a common jury, is less tragical than that of the poor creature prodded with a rake in the dark. Rock, a retriever, perished in a manner which the jury found to be accidental, and therefore, although he may be lamented, he cannot be avenged. It is difficult for the least susceptible not to drop a tear on the remains of Rock, at once so clever and so guileless a beast. The only consolation which can with decency be even suggested to his sorrowing acquaintances is that his life was very happy, and that he had no premonition of his melancholy end. Rock was attached to a hotel, as any dog with a good appetite and a love of variety would like to be. Yet was Rock no irregular roysterer, no professional enemy of the police, no disturber of the repose of Southend. If he did not always come home to tea, he always went out to dinner. He dined early, and his hostess, who deserves a place of honourable record in his obituary notice, was Mrs. Brunt, of Lorne House, Marine Parade. Mrs. Brunt gave him mutton and beef, the beef roasted plain, the mutton roasted with trimmings. It is not easy to write calmly of what occurred on the 22nd of April, 1887. Mrs. Brunt shall tell the sad story in her own pathetically simple words. "The dog," she says, "was upon the footpath wagging "his tail and anticipating the morsel I was preparing for "him. . . . I went to the table to cut the meat, and then "I heard a fearful crash, and a thud and a terrible groan, "and I said, 'Poor Rock, he is run over!' When I went "out the dog was gone, but there was the mark of the "wheel upon the kerb." The driver of the cart which caused this terrible catastrophe declared that his horse ran away with him, that he was doing his best to pull it up for his own sake, and that he never saw the dog at all. It was further alleged to be Rock's habit to lie upon the road, whether from careless confidence in mankind at large, or from a particular belief in the Jehus of Southend, which has not been justified by events. Some persons in court, with a painful inability to distinguish between the ridiculous and the sublime, had the bad taste to laugh when Mrs. Brunt described her departed friend as "more intelligent than many men." The compliment is not extravagant, though doubtless the homage was sincere. The verdict which the jury found for the defendant was, in the circumstances, inevitable, and Mrs. Brunt may have been mistaken in supposing that Rock was not, on the 22nd of April, lying where she had seen so many men lie. Dogs should be discouraged by those who have their best interests at heart from lying in the road until the human race has learned to drive.

MILITARY STORES.

The First Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretary of State for War are both to be called upon to justify the whole system of administration of their departments when the House goes into the Committee of Supply. Lord Charles Beresford is to try the effect of his Saxon in Parliament after using it to comparatively little purpose in the Admiralty, and Mr. Hanbury is going to ask the War Office why it does not intend to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Stores. The second, at least, of these demands for explanation ought to lead to an interesting and, if properly conducted, important debate. The question which Mr. Hanbury put to Mr. Stanhope on Tuesday evening shows what object he wishes to obtain. He called upon Mr. Stanhope to say whether the Government had adopted, or was about to adopt, these three recommendations of Sir James Stephen's Commission:—"namely, the appointment of a Commission to lay down a "standard as to the amount of stores which should be kept "in hand for the public service; the publication of annual "tables showing how the existing stores stood in relation to "that standard; and the publication by the chief of the "Ordnance Department of an annual statement showing "what stores he considered necessary for the public service "during the current year." Mr. Stanhope's answer was equally explicit as to the intentions of the Government. It does not intend to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and apparently for two reasons. The first is, that no such public statements have ever been made in this country or any other country; and the second is, that the War Office does not intend to carry out recommendations of the Commission. This last does not look much like what is commonly called a reason, except when preceded by the possessive case of the substantive "lady"; but Mr. Stanhope seems to have seriously quoted the decision of his department as if it was its own justification.

When the matter comes to be argued out, some better argument may be produced, and it certainly ought to be asked for. The recommendations of the Royal Commission were, no doubt, not above criticism. The publicity which it wished to see practised in the Supply Service of the army would be certainly a novelty in this country and every other. But a thing is not wrong because it is new; and without being the best, may be better than what already exists. No great ingenuity would be required to make out a case for publicity. Our neighbours are generally approximately aware of the extent of our power to defend ourselves or attack them. They will probably in any case prepare to attack us with a force calculated on the supposition that we are in a reasonably sufficient state of defence. Our danger is not that an enemy will be encouraged to fall upon us by learning that we are short of stores, but that we ourselves may go on in a state of blind confidence that we are properly supplied when, as a matter of fact, we are fatally deficient in many necessaries. But, if the War Office considers publicity as too dangerous or too irregular, that part of the Royal Commission's recommendations need not be pressed. The first quoted by Mr. Hanbury is by far the most important of the three. Whether the War Office publishes a yearly return on the state of the stores matters much less than whether it knows what quantity of stores, armament, and men it ought to have. Now what Lord Wolseley told the Royal Commission was that the War Office had no idea on this subject. It was, he said in substance, absolutely disqualified from maintaining an efficient army by its entire ignorance of what an efficient army is. This was what Lord Wolseley meant when he said that the British army had no standard to work up to, and the members of the Royal Commission were so convinced of the truth of his opinion that they recommended the adoption of measures which would supply Her Majesty's Secretary of State for War with a model. Mr. Stanhope avoided saying whether this useful measure of quantity and quality is to be supplied; but his silence was abundantly instructive. No Commission will be appointed to set up a standard for the British army. When Mr. Hanbury's motion is made in Committee of Supply, we hope that it will receive sufficient support to compel the War Office to listen to the late Royal Commission. Until the standard spoken of by Lord Wolseley is supplied—until, that is, we know what kind and amount of army we ought to have—it is next to impossible to arrive at any certainty as to the value of what we have actually got. There has been enough chopping and changing, enough vague experiment, enough jumping in the dark. We have spent needless millions and wasted untold quantities of material through want of a definite policy. The publicity which Mr. Stanhope shrinks from would really only be dangerous if the army is to be kept in a bad state; but we presume that is not the deliberate policy even of the Minister who cut down the Royal Horse Artillery. For the rest, it was only suggested as a guarantee for the fidelity of the War Office to the standard of efficiency when it had been supplied. We are prepared to trust the department so far as to dispense with yearly reports if once a limit is known to be fixed below which the stores must not be allowed to fall. Up to the present there has been no such limit, and it is notorious that just before the Russian war scare the storehouses were shamefully empty. The desire of the Royal Commission was that the nation should never be subjected to such a risk again, and we believe that that is the determination of the nation itself. If we can be protected without giving up the old practice of secresy, well and good; but if publicity is needed to protect us against the politician, then we must have publicity.

THE LAST OF THE ADDRESS.

It will probably be considered—so rapid, as a rule, are the processes of demoralization—that the House of Commons has got through the proceedings on the Address with a despatch worthy of its ancient character as a business-like assembly. Yet it seems only a few years since people were holding up their hands in indignant amazement at the prolongation of these proceedings for eleven days—their exact duration in the present instance. Everybody then went about asking his neighbour what the House of Commons was coming to. Subsequent events have supplied that question with a sufficiently informing answer. The House of Commons was coming, and within a year or two came, to a state of things in which an eleven days' debate on the Address has come to appear quite a moderate—almost an ascetic—allowance of aimless and unpractical talk. It was coming, in fact, to a habit of debating the Address for at least three weeks, and only consenting at last to discontinue it after the application of the most powerful pressure on the part of the Government. All improvement, however, is of course relative, and we have no wish to grudge the public its self-congratulations on the fact that a purely ceremonial proceeding which began on the 9th of February was brought triumphantly to a close on the 23rd. It is true that, if we were to scrutinize too closely the exact application of these eleven working days, we should probably come to the conclusion that their number might, without giving the slightest ground of just complaint to any one, have been reduced by a full half; that Mr. PARNELL's amendment might perfectly well have been moved on the second night of the debate; and that, while two nights would have amply served for its due discussion, two more might well have sufficed to dispose of the other more or less inconsiderable proposals brought forward subsequently and on the report stage, which, under the new rule, it is to be hoped, will be abolished altogether. The first purpose, indeed, to which this stage of the debate was turned came very near to being something worse than idle. It was only saved from being mischievous by Mr. GLADSTONE's eminently wise determination to improve the opportunity for showing that it is still possible for him, when it suits him, to debate grave questions of foreign policy from quite another standpoint than that of an old Parliamentary hand.

Of the debate of Thursday night we need say no more than that it was an abuse of the functions of Parliament—according at least to any theory of them which has ever been put forward by constitutional writers of authority. Unless among the objects for which the House of Commons exists is to be included that of enabling an ambitious ex-Minister who is conscious of having fallen a little behind in the running to explain how he would like to give a fillip to his notoriety by getting himself imprisoned, but had thought that, on the whole, he might manage to advertise himself sufficiently without undergoing so grave a discomfort—unless, we say, the House of Commons exists in part for such purpose as this, the debate which Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE insisted upon raising upon Thursday night was simply a flagrant abuse of an already much-abused institution For the object to which we have referred was as palpably before Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE's eyes throughout the whole of his hour and a quarter speech as the pretended object set forth in his amendment was not. The speech was, to use Mr. BALFOUR's accurate description of it, "autobiographical" from beginning to end; and the CHIEF SECRETARY would have been perfectly justified in treating it exclusively from that point of view in his reply. Nothing happier than Mr. BALFOUR's actual dealing with it from this point of view has been witnessed in Parliament for a long time. The half-dozen sentences devoted to the discussion of the precautions taken against arrest by the agitator who reproached the Government with leaving him at large hit the exact tone which was most appropriate to the occasion. The moral of the whole incident is, as Mr. BALFOUR said, that, if right honourable demagogues will take so much trouble to proclaim their loyal and peaceable intentions, they "must "not be disappointed if Ministers take them at their word." It only remains to add that that part of Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE's speech which did in some measure bear upon the ostensible object of his amendment was even more conclusively disposed of by Mr. BALFOUR than its autobiographical portion.

POISON AND CRIME.

The humdrum life of commonplace respectability which most of us lead is happily sometimes lighted from above. But it is also occasionally pierced from below, and a court of assize in a large town is not unfrequently the place from or through which this chastening power appears. Mr. Justice GRANTHAM has been dealing at Liverpool with some very bad cases indeed. He has made an innovation in punishment, and revived flogging just when it seems not to be required. But the subject on which we desire to dwell is the influence of drink as exemplified by JOHN GORDON, "found guilty of attempting to murder his wife, "MARY GORDON, under circumstances of great brutality." The story is a very shocking one, a very disgusting one, and one from which most people would instinctively turn away. But it is necessary to face these things, and it was never more imperatively necessary than at the present time. There are many excellent people who say that all crime proceeds from drink, and that all drink is bad. The second of these two propositions is absurd on the face of it; and anybody, as the homœopathic doctor said in a recent controversy, can try the experiment upon himself. The first part of the double assertion is not true either, but unfortunately familiar occurrences give it far too plausible an air of truth. A judge of Assize, on returning from Circuit, is only too apt to say that all men are liars, and that all criminals are drunkards. There are two obvious explanations for the latter article of faith. In the first place, we may assume that alcohol is a diabolical agency; in the second place, we may prefer the hypothesis that a great deal of alcohol becomes through adulteration very bad. Against the former supposition we have to set the undoubted truth that many people drink a reasonable quantity of intoxicating liquor and seem neither physically nor morally the worse for it. In favour of the latter we may urge that brutalities are committed after boozing in certain public-houses, brutalities to which unaided human nature does not aspire, and is not equal. Parliament is well described as the great inquest of the nation. But Parliament resolutely shuts its eyes to the fact that beverages are concocted within these realms which are abominable in themselves, deleterious in their consequences, and essentially subversive of social order. GIBBON said that the example of the Crusaders was no less fatal to military discipline than repugnant to evangelical purity. Bad spirits are almost as productive of crime as they are provocative of thirst.

The trial on which Mr. Justice GRANTHAM delivered his soul revealed no very novel or striking features. But it is one of those cases which ought to attract the attention of Parliament, and which might even suggest to the fanatics of so-called temperance that they have got upon the wrong tack. People cannot be prevented from getting moderately drunk, except, perhaps, by religion and philosophy. They ought to be precluded, so far as is possible, from getting mad drunk, if only because their condition is then dangerous to their wives, families, and neighbours. The wretched GORDON, who has been sent into penal servitude for fifteen years, was plentifully supplied with drink beforehand at several public-houses. The state of facts was such that the Judge let himself go, and expatiated with the utmost freedom upon the manner in which the prisoner had been served. He spoke of the "unholy profits" made out of that "horrid traffic," and it is impossible to say that he was wrong. There is a class of pot-house and of gin-palace, about which respectable people know little, but which supplies the dock, the asylum, and the gaol with many of their inmates. "People like Mr. McCANDLISH," said the Judge, "were content to live out of their ill-gotten gains "by engaging managers, whom they put in to do their "dirty work, and make money out of these unhappy people, "forgetting or blinding their eyes to the fact that, while they "were themselves living on the fat of the land, poor wretched "women were left starving, and children were left almost "dying of starvation, because fathers were induced to spend "money on drink in the way in which this man did who had "been at home a fortnight, and drinking all the time, and "was fooling away his money, while Mr. McCANDLISH and "others were fattening on it." Excited by this beastly tippling, JOHN GORDON more than half murdered his wife and is now in penal servitude. We may say that it serves him right, and so no doubt it does. But the moral we wish to enforce is that Parliament ought to deal at once, and to deal strongly, with a gross abuse of the traffic in liquor. The Local Government Bill may be a good thing, and licensing reform may be a good thing. What we most emphatically demand is some efficient check upon the sale of drugs which, whether they be called beer, wine, or spirits, are in fact poison.

LORD SALISBURY AND MR. BRADLAUGH.

WE wonder how much of the persistent misrepresentation of the letter recently addressed by Lord SALISBURY'S solicitor to Mr. BRADLAUGH is deliberately malicious and how much is mere honest confusion? Judging by what we know of the Gladstonian tactics, we should have been disposed to say that it was all of the former character; but there is substantive evidence that some of it is of the latter description. Even the Times, discussing Sir R. NICHOLSON'S letter with an obvious desire to criticize it fairly, has shown an equal incapacity with its Radical contemporaries to distinguish between the responsibility for writing a letter and the responsibility for publishing it; or, at any rate, has displayed an equal proneness to the conclusion that a perfectly legitimate and reasonable disclaimer of the latter responsibility amounts to, or at least suggests, a disingenuous repudiation of the former. It is, therefore, necessary to remind both the candid and the uncandid critics of Sir R. NICHOLSON'S communication to Mr. BRADLAUGH with reference to the letter signed "R. T. GUNTON" that it is characteristic of letters to be sent by their writers to the person to whom they are addressed; that those persons, having then the physical control over them, may abuse that control by publishing them without the authority of their writers; and that in that case their writers are obviously free from all responsibility whatever, either legal or moral, for the consequences which may result from such unauthorized publication.

It is strange that considerations so plain as these, and considerations so clearly, if only impliedly, indicated in Sir RICHARD NICHOLSON'S letter to Mr. BRADLAUGH, should have to be thus elaborately insisted upon; but it seems to be necessary. The facts of the case are as simple as can be. Mr. BRADLAUGH makes, in the course of certain legal proceedings held in November last, a statement on oath to the effect that he had seen a cheque, signed by Lord SALISBURY, which had been sent to certain persons to assist them in getting up a meeting in Trafalgar Square. This Lord SALISBURY immediately and publicly denies. Next day he receives a letter from the persons who were said to have received the cheque, indignantly denying the story on their own part, and suggesting that Mr. BRADLAUGH should be prosecuted for perjury. To this Lord SALISBURY very naturally replies, through his private secretary, that, though the statement amounted to wilful perjury, it would not be punishable as such, not being relevant to the issue under trial in the legal proceedings in question. This letter its recipients, without the authority of the writer, and therefore with gross impropriety, sent to the public press. As addressed to themselves, it was in all probability privileged; as given by them gratuitously to the world, its legal character, of course, might be very different. Under these circumstances it is monstrous to contend that the writer of the letter incurs any moral obligation whatever to assume a legal responsibility which he never had the slightest intention of assuming, and which would have been simply forced upon him by the wholly unauthorized act of other people. Nor does the repudiation of such responsibility convey—as the Times appeared so strangely to imagine—any suggestion of an attempt to evade the responsibility for the writing of the letter. If we consider it as a written document, the signature "R. T. GUNTON" undoubtedly is equivalent to the signature of Lord SALISBURY; but if we regard it as a communication inserted in the newspapers, Mr. GUNTON'S name undoubtedly ceases to represent Lord SALISBURY'S, and stands, if it stands for anything, for that of the man who sent his letter to the newspaper offices. Lord SALISBURY has gone to the furthest point to which he can in reason be required to go in calling Mr. BRADLAUGH'S attention, through his solicitor, to the denial which he did publicly oppose to Mr. BRADLAUGH'S statement. If that denial amounts to libel in imputing a false statement to Mr. BRADLAUGH in a matter which must be within his personal knowledge, he has his remedy. He complains, as appears from his last letter, that it is "not actionable." If so, it can only be because he has suffered no legal wrong at Lord SALISBURY'S hands. No doubt the letter published without authority was actionable; but Mr. BRADLAUGH can hardly expect Lord SALISBURY to adopt the actionable conduct of other people, merely for the sake of indulging Mr. BRADLAUGH with the luxury of an action.

OSTRICH-FARMING IN SOUTH AFRICA.

OSTRICH farmers in South Africa are at present suffering as much from bad times as our agriculturists at home. Feathers that were formerly worth twenty-five pounds now only bring thirty shillings, and a pair of birds that could not be bought some years ago under several hundred pounds would not at present fetch more than twelve. Some time ago a gentleman "prospecting" was looking over a fence into a camp when an ostrich spied a diamond in his pin, and in an instant picked at and swallowed it. A sort of court-martial was held, the relative values of the bird and the diamond being accurately calculated. The ostrich was worth 100*l.* and the pin 90*l.*, so the ostrich was spared. The verdict would now be most decidedly the other way. The only redeeming feature in ostrich-farming nowadays is the amusement to be got out of studying the ways of these weird birds, which look as if only by some mistake they had survived the deluge, and that they would be more in their right place embedded in the fossiliferous strata of the earth than racing about on its surface. Ugly, awkward, and brainless as are these birds when full-grown, there are few young animals prettier than an ostrich chick during the first few weeks of its life. It has a sweet, innocent, baby face, large eyes, and a plump round body. All its movements are comical, and there is an air of conceit and independence about the tiny creature while still scarcely able to stand that is most amusing. Instead of feathers, the chick has a rough coat of as many shades of brown and grey as a tailor's pattern-book. This is striped with shreds of black, the neck being covered with what resembles the softest silk plush. One would like these delightful little creatures to remain always babies, for with their growth they lose their round prettiness, their bodies become angular and ill-proportioned, and a crop of coarse, wiry feathers replaces the particoloured stripes which form their baby clothes.

The chicken feathers are first plucked at nine months old and look only fit to be made into dusting brushes. In the second year they are a little like the ostrich feathers of commerce, but stiff and narrow, and it is not till the third year that they have attained their full width and softness. During the first two years the male and female birds are alike; but at each moulting the male becomes darker, until the plumage is all black, except the wings and tails, which are white. In each wing there are twenty-four long feathers. During the breeding season the bill of the male bird, the large scales on the fore part of the leg, and sometimes the skin of the head and neck assume a deep rose colour. After a good rain ostriches begin to make nests. At this time the males become savage and their "booming" is heard in all directions. The bird inflates its neck like a cobra and gives three deep roars, the two first short and "staccato," the third prolonged. When the birds are savage it is impossible to walk about the camp unless armed with a "tackey," the name given to a long, stout, thorny branch of mimosa. Fortunately only one bird will attack at a time, and only on the territory which by some tribal arrangement is considered his exclusive property. Thus, during a morning's walk through the camp the owner will be attacked by several vicious birds in succession, all determined to have his life if possible, yet all held completely in check by a vigorous use of the "tackey." When an ostrich challenges he sits down and, flapping each wing alternately, inflates his neck, throws his head back, rolling it from side to side, and with each roll striking the back of his head against his bony body with so sharp and resounding a blow that a severe headache seems likely to be the result. It often happens that in self-defence these vicious males (generally the finest birds) have to be killed.

The hen ostrich lays on alternate days, and if every second egg is taken away she will produce from twenty to thirty, sometimes as many as sixty, eggs. Twenty is the largest number the birds can satisfactorily cover. Each morning and evening the nest is deserted for a quarter of an hour to allow the eggs to cool, which was probably the cause of the old belief that they were left by the parents to be hatched by the sun. As a general rule, the two birds sit alternately, the cock at night, because his superior strength and courage makes him a better defender against midnight marauders. At the end of the six weeks of sitting both birds are in a miserably enfeebled condition. It has been found curious to watch one undutiful hen who absolutely refused to take her share of work, so the poor husband, determining not to be disappointed of his progeny, did all the sitting himself, bravely and patiently, day and night. He nearly died of exhaustion. The next time this pair had a nest, the cock made up his mind to stand no such nonsense. He gave the hen such a severe thrashing, that one would have thought she had not a whole bone left. However, this Petruchio-like treatment had the desired effect, for the wife never again rebelled, but sat patiently and persistently. Very different from this couple were the Darby and Joan of the camp. One morning the hen, frightened by a Kaffir's dog, ran into the wire fence, and was so terribly injured that she had to be killed. For two years poor Darby was a disconsolate widower, and all attempts to find him a satisfactory second wife were unavailing. Several hens which in succession were placed in his camp were only rescued at the "tackey's" point from being kicked to death. It was truly pitiable to watch the poor bird wandering up and down day after day on the hard track worn by his restless feet. At last he consented to choose a successor to his beloved Joan; but apparently the choice was not a fortunate one. The new wife—a magnificent hen above the average size—tyrannized over him unmercifully. Darby's spirit seemed quite broken by his long fretting, and he made no attempt to hold his own, but was for the rest of his days the most henpecked, or rather hen-kicked, of husbands. It was difficult to manage so that he had enough to eat; for whenever he came near the food the greedy hen would drive him away, standing on tiptoe and hissing viciously, and it was only by waiting until she was out of the way that it was possible to give him a feed. As a father Darby was no less devoted than he had formerly been as a husband, and to please him the chicks, instead of being taken away, as is usual when they are a few days old, were allowed to remain with the parents. The poor little birds, however, fell victims to their father's over-anxious disposition. Apparently never satisfied that the "veldt" was good enough, he kept them continually on the move, going such long distances that he literally walked them as well as himself to death. Not many days after the last chick's decease Darby's own poor body, worn to a skeleton by these restless wanderings after the six weeks of anxiety during incubation, was found on the veldt.

The surplus eggs more than the ostriches can cover are hatched in an incubator—a machine calculated to destroy for the time being the most heavenly temper. Some imp of mischief seems to be perpetually at work, causing the thermometer to indulge in the wildest vagaries. The proper temperature is 103°. Perhaps one degree more heat would be wanting, so the lamps would be slightly raised, producing for some time not the slightest effect on the temperature, which would then unexpectedly go up at a bound, and all the drawers have to be opened and jugs of cold water dashed wildly at the top of the incubator. As soon as the chicks are hatched they seem to begin to die off; and there is never the least hope of saving a sick ostrich, whatever its age. They are naturally long-lived; indeed, it is almost impossible to state the limit of their lives, as they do not in a state of nature show any signs of decrepitude, nor do their feathers deteriorate. Accident or stupidity alone seems to put an end to their career. Utterly incapable of taking care of himself, an ostrich resents being looked after by his human friends; and when, in spite of all their precautions for his safety, he succeeds in coming to grief, he sullenly opposes every attempt to cure his injuries, and at once makes up his mind to die. If his hurt is not sufficiently severe to kill him, he will attain his object by moping and refusing to eat; anyhow, he dies, often apparently for no other reason than because his master, against whom he always has a grudge, wishes him to live. He seems to die out of spite, just as a Hindoo servant will starve himself and waste rapidly away, and then come and expire at the feet of the employer with whom he is offended. There was a certain old Dutchman who, by simply bringing one leaf of the prickly pear from Cape Town to Graaff Reinet, caused the whole region to be overgrown with it. The ostriches, with that equal disregard for their own health and the pockets of their owners for which they are famous, acquire a morbid taste for this prickly food, and go on indulging in it until their heads and necks look like pincushions, and the almost invisible fruit-thorns line the interior of their throats, besides so injuring their eyes that they become perfectly blind. Often was an unhappy bird brought in a helpless, half-dead state, to be nursed; but no amount of care and attention was ever rewarded by the recovery of the patient. There it would squat for a few days, the picture of misery, its ugly neck lying along the ground in a limp, despondent manner, like a sea-sick goose on the first day of a voyage. Many times a day would food be forced down its letter-box of a throat; but all to no purpose. It had made up its mind to die, as every ostrich does immediately illness or accident befalls it, and most resolutely would it carry out its intention. The injury from which ostriches most frequently die is the fracture of a leg, and this accident often is owing to the dervish-like habits they have of waltzing when in particularly good spirits. They go sailing along in the bright sunshine, their beautiful wings spread giving them the appearance of white balloons, but they have an unfortunate tendency to become giddy and tumble down. Some birds can "reverse" as cleverly as a practised human dancer, but the accomplishment is rare. Sometimes they fight savagely, and in an instant one of the belligerents is down with his leg snapped across and all but knocked off by a frightful blow, and then his owner can only have the melancholy consolation of making him into soup.

When, as sometimes happens, a solitary chick is reared at the farmhouse, it becomes absurdly and often inconveniently tame. One called Jackie was the terror of all the little niggers about the place; for, as they sat on the ground with plates of rice and pumpkin in their laps, Jackie would bear down upon them, requisitioning from one plate after another. Occasionally he acted in such a menacing manner that the youngsters dropped their plates and ran away crying. Jackie would then squat on his heels amongst the débris and regale his enormous appetite at leisure. But one day retribution came. Having spotted the pot in the kitchen out of which the pumpkin and rice always came, he thought he would attack the fountain-head, so plumping his head into the pot, he greedily scooped up, and, with the lightning-like rapidity of ostriches, tossed down his throat a large mouthful of boiling rice. Poor fellow! the next moment he was dancing round the kitchen, writhing in agony, shaking his head nearly off, and twisting his neck as if bent on tying it into a knot. Finally he dashed wildly from the house, and the last that was seen of him was a little cloud of white dust vanishing on the horizon. On a large farm when the time for plucking arrives it is no easy matter to collect the birds. Men have to be sent out in all directions to drive the ostriches in from the distant spots to which they have wandered. Little troops are gradually brought together, and collected, first in a large enclosure, then in the plucking kraal, and finally in the plucking-box—a most useful invention. In it there is just room for an ostrich to stand; he cannot possibly turn round, nor even kick. Two operators, one at each side, with a few rapid snips of the shears soon denude him of his long white plumes. The stumps are left in for three months, when the Kaffirs generally pull them out with their teeth. After the plucking comes the sorting into "prime whites," "blacks," "tails," &c. For some days feathers pervade everything. In fact, the house becomes almost uninhabitable. If an ostrich feather is held upright it is at once seen to be perfectly even and equal on both sides, the stem dividing it exactly in the centre; whereas the stems of other feathers are all more or less on one side. Perhaps this is the reason why the ancient Egyptians chose the ostrich feather as the sacred emblem of truth and justice, setting it upon the head of Ma, goddess of Truth.

DIABOLUS OBFUSCATIO MEA.

It was the use and wont of the old-fashioned Radical, whom fond memory loves to think of as a more amusing, if not less benighted, person than his modern equivalent, to describe the two Universities as "sleepy." That reproach, if he had been alive, the good man could hardly bestow on at least one of them during the present week. Oxford has been very wide awake indeed. She has knocked on the head one of the very neatest little academic jobs which jobbery ever tried:—the creation of a new little patent place in which a distinguished Professor, who has been relieved of the work of his own professorship, was to do the work of the paid representative of another Professor who has been (still "with a pinsion") relieved of his work. That chapter of the Book of Job is closed for the present, at any rate. Also it has heard from Lord Randolph Churchill a singularly vigorous Union speech, tearing the flimsy substance of Home Rule well to tatters. The third event of the week, though connected with this last, is of the other complexion, yet not without colour of comfort for Unionists. With immense efforts, and many months after their distinguished friends, the Oxford Liberal Unionists, have shown that nearly the whole brains of the Liberal party in the University are on that side, a formal address in favour of Home Rule has been got up by resident graduates and sent to Mr. Gladstone. This is to be followed up, it seems, by a dinner (not, thank Heaven, a conversazione; Oxford Gladstonianism is not Irish enough for that yet), and they say that five hundred undergraduates are going to eat that dinner. Let us hope that no one of the more finical admirers of agrarian murder will have on that occasion to imitate the Sybaritic practices of Mr. Arthur Pendennis at "the other shop." When they charged Pen with taking perfumed baths, it will be remembered, he defended himself by saying that it was "after meeting a very low set of men in hall." Alas! at no time has either seat of learning been free from low sets of men. However, the undergraduate personnel of the Oxford Home Rule League—the motto of which exists ready made, as quoted at the top of this article, and is a most appropriate substitute for the effete old original—is not now the present subject of inquiry. It is necessary to the undergraduate mind to belong to some society, especially to some society that dines, and we need not fear that the young persons who join the Home Rule League will take to Quirking or Fitzmauricing like their friends the Parnellites, any more than we need fear that fraternization with the Society of Ancient Buffaloes will lead them to bellow.

But the Home Rule Resident Graduate Address is much more interesting. Here we have, in Mr. Gladstone's opinion, "so much of the University of the future," which would seem to be a rather unkind reflection on the University of the present as represented in the list. Here we have on the same infallible authority "so many names distinguished for the cultivation of history—a field which, I venture to say, we have made and are making almost entirely our own." There must have been some very tricksy fiend at Mr. Gladstone's elbow that day. For what Unionist students of history say is exactly this, that their Separatist friends are making a history of their own—a history strictly new and original. Nor had the fiend done with Mr. Gladstone even then; for the right honourable gentleman went on to describe the list as an "unexpectedly large minority," the names of which he wishes to "be given to the world." It is always a particular pleasure to us to comply with Mr. Gladstone's wishes, and the world shall have the names, or at least some of them, with a few remarks of a general character on the others. There is perhaps only one name here which can excite, if not surprise, at any rate regret. It is that of the Provost of Queen's, whose friends (we do not know that he has any enemies) would certainly like to see it elsewhere. But Dr. Magrath has never that we know of devoted any special attention to politics, or shown any special ability in them, and the most able men of business, with the most agreeable personal qualities, may be led astray by nationality and other things in politics as in any other field.

However, turn we to the task of surveying this unexpectedly large minority, representative of the University of the future as Albert Smith's picture was of Strasburg Cathedral in the dark. There is no doubt that considerable pains must have been used in constructing and sweeping the net, the meshes of which appear to have been small enough to prevent the escape of a gentleman, to whom we refer in all politeness, but who is unable to put his qualifications as a resident graduate higher than "B.A.: non-Collegiate." Far be it from us to deny the residence or the graduation of a B.A. non-Collegiate, but it will be admitted that we have here what is rarely to be found in any art or science, an example of the nearest possible approach to a negative which is yet positive. There are, indeed, certain Honorary M.A.s who cannot put even "non-Collegiate" after their respectable names, but the Herodotean formula is nowhere better worth remembering than in the case of Honorary M.A.s. Let us not therefore reason of Honoraries, lest their noble wrath be excited; though, as a matter of fact, they have at Oxford less right to call themselves members of the University than at Cambridge. The next thing, then, that strikes the observer of this unexpectedly large minority of future University men is that there is scarcely a single name in it, except Mr. Freeman's, that can be said to have any general fame outside the University, while it is scarcely necessary to say what Mr. Freeman's political weight is outside the University as well as in it. Many interesting representatives of many interesting classes, indeed, meet the eye. There is the Master of University, who seems to have been led to Home Rule by the composition of a meritorious School History of England, just as his ally the Dean of Winchester, who would have been so proud to figure among resident graduates once, found salvation through the composition of a similar, but not quite so meritorious, School History of France. Of such is the kingdom of the Home Rule Heaven of History. There is, it is unnecessary to say, Professor Thorold Rogers; when was Professor Thorold Rogers absent when an opportunity offered itself of showing how manners makyth man and how ingenuous arts perform their equally well-known office at Oxford? There are divers stranger creatures, or, in the more picturesque words of the Laureate, professors of Chinese and of Celtic, Jur. Docs. of Munich, Counsels at some period or other to the Speaker, and Principals of Nonconformist Halls. There is also the Librarian of the Bodleian. In this enumeration we really think we have dealt most generously by the dignitaries. And then there is the numerus. Representative—very representative this. There are the ex-public school ushers who have quarrelled with their head-masters and retired upon the University in more or less disorder. There are the old dons who have taken twenty years not to do some piece of scholarly or scientific work which adorns their names in the Clarendon Press lists, but who don't seem to have taken much more than twenty months to eat all the previous doctrines of the Liberal party. There are the young dons who, finding even the selection of subjects for a paulo post futurum immortality of authorship too exhausting, pant after the easier fame of Mr. Channing and Mr. Conybeare and Mr. Buchanan. There are the estimable parish clergymen whose political ability has been proved in sacred places. There are the miscellaneous persons who, having formerly taken a degree and finding Oxford a pleasant and convenient place to live in, are undoubtedly resident graduates, but who have as much to do with the business and the studies of the University as if they lived at Bath or at the other Jericho. And so through the great unknown of the University of the future (we are really much obliged to Mr. Gladstone for that word), we pass to that non-Collegiate B.A. who is nearly the naked idea, the form unendued with matter, of resident graduateness.

> Knights of utmost [East] and West,

Now we think, though we may be prejudiced, that Oxford men have a right to exult over their usual rivals in this matter. There is no "and other University men" here, no base allusion to vast numbers of persons not present, but sympathizing, none of your old dodges of marching army after army round and round at the back of the stage with a fresh drum and colours each time. It is all fair and aboveboard, from the tall cliff of Professor Freeman to the low but pleasant plain of the non-Collegiate B.A. This unexpectedly large minority is not ashamed of itself, and goes right through Coventry. It is really—we are not joking—representative in its way, though the representatives represent nothing but themselves, and Mr. Cornish, of Lincoln, who arrived too late, crying "Me also," in the columns of the Daily News. But will anybody who looks at the list say that it is representative of the brains of the University? We admit Mr. Freeman's brains, of course; we do not say that even Mr. Thorold Rogers is brainless; there are half a dozen others who, as specialists, or general scholars, are very respectable men in their way. But of the kind of brains which a University ought to produce, and which fortunately our two English Universities always have produced—the combination of practical with literary ability, and of both with political knowledge—will any one say that this is a representative list? As for numbers, it does not come out much better. It has two Heads of Houses out of twenty-one; it has, at a very liberal estimate, nine or ten University professors, readers, lecturers, and teachers out of some seventy. What the proportion of resident Fellows or of resident graduates generally is it would be impossible to say offhand, the total numbers of these being not so readily calculable; but it is certainly not greater in the first case, and we should think, even with the help of honorary masters and non-collegiate bachelors, not much greater in the last. And this is the result of a vigorous whip, with more than two years to do the whipping in. Verily we need not go out to see the nakedness of this land; for the nakedness of the land has come out to show itself.

LONDON BIRDS—THE WOOD-PIGEON.

PROBABLY the last bird that a countryman would expect to find in London would be the ringdove, or, as it is more commonly called, the wood-pigeon; yet this bird, though not by any means common, is generally to be seen in the Parks, and can certainly claim to be included in any list of London birds, as it is found so near the centre, if not of London proper, at least of the cab radius as St. James's Park, and may occasionally be seen under the shadow of the Clock Tower at Westminster, in the trees near the Sessions House, and is not unknown in Whitehall.

It is certainly curious that a bird naturally so wild and wary as the wood-pigeon should so alter its habit as to live the year through in Parks even as large as those of the West End, surrounded as they are by miles of streets and buildings. Those birds, however, that have chosen London as their dwelling-place, while in no way comparable in tameness to the dovecote pigeons which congregate in such large numbers about many of our public buildings, are, no doubt from long immunity from disturbance, so free from fear of man that they may occasionally be seen quietly feeding on the grass plots in St. James's Park, surrounded as they always are by crowds of pedestrians. Kensington Gardens are always frequented by a few of these birds, and they breed there from year to year. It is surprising that these birds are not better known to the average Londoner than they appear to be. Their size—they are the largest of our wild pigeons—their peculiar flight, and their distinctive markings—the most noticeable of these being the white feathers on each side of the neck, from which they derive the name of "Ringdove," and by which alone they may be at once distinguished from any dovecote pigeon—should, one would suppose, attract the attention of the least observant. Their note, again—coo, coo-coo, roo, roo, the last two syllables long drawn out—once heard, can never be mistaken, being entirely different from that of any other pigeon. There are many word versions of this note; but none better perhaps than the old "Take two cows, Taffy."

The wood-pigeon is not only the largest but in our opinion the handsomest, of our wild pigeons. The London bird, however, from his habit of, after the manner of his kind, perching in and roosting on trees, is always soot-begrimed and dirty, but notwithstanding is still a handsome and noticeable bird. Wood-pigeons begin to breed early in the spring, and have, as a rule, two, if not three, broods in the year. During the breeding season the cock-bird, possessed doubtless with a desire to show himself off to his mate, constantly takes short flights, in which he rises and falls alternately, occasionally clapping his wings over his back. This flight is so peculiar that it alone should, one would suppose, attract the attention of the least observant. The nest is but a poor structure, being, indeed, nothing more than a meagre platform of sticks, placed one over the other, on which the two white eggs are laid. Such a miserable structure, indeed, is it that few interested in birds who have lived where wood-pigeons breed in large numbers can have failed to notice nests through which the eggs could be seen from below. This nest has evidently been a source of wonder for generations, and many are the legends told to account for it. All, so far as we are aware, are based on the same idea—namely, that the pigeon, unable to build a nest itself, and considering the magpie's a beautiful specimen of bird architecture, an opinion which few will dispute, asked it for lessons in nest-building. The best of these legends, perhaps, is that given by Montagu as current in his time in Suffolk, and this is specially interesting as it contains another word version of the wood-pigeon's note, it is as follows:—"Instead of being a docile pupil, the pigeon kept on her old cry of 'Take two, Maggie! take two.' The magpie insisted that this was a very unworkmanlike manner of proceeding, one stick at a time being as much as could be managed to advantage, but the pigeon reiterated her 'two, take two' till Mag, in a violent passion, gave up the task, exclaiming, 'I say one at a time is enough, and if you think otherwise, you may set about the work yourself, for I will have no more to do with it.'" The unfortunate pigeon was thus left in the lurch when nothing more than the bare foundation had been laid; and, being, as we have said, no architect, has not to this day been able to improve on the miserable structure.

The young of these birds when first hatched are blind, and, like puppies, remain so for the first nine days of their existence. At this time they are covered with yellow down, and certainly have no pretensions to beauty, being, in fact, as ugly as when full grown they are handsome. At this time they are far from pleasant in their ways, having a disagreeable habit of puffing and snorting when approached, a habit which, according to Bewick, resulted in the death of a pair hatched under a dovecote-pigeon, the foster-mother being so alarmed at her supposed offspring that she deserted them. In common with all other pigeons, the wood-pigeon feeds its young on half-digested food from its crop. The process is curious and amusing. The young bird, instead of opening its mouth to receive the expected meal, forces its bill between its parent's mandibles and sucks out the milky mass, thus proving, as has been aptly observed, that "pigeon's milk" is not the "absolute and unfounded fable it was once supposed to be." In about three weeks' time they are fully fledged, and are then of much the same colour as their parents, except that the metallic colouring and the white ring on the neck are wanting (these appear after the first moult), and a considerable amount of yellow down is still attached to the tips of the feathers. In the autumn wood-pigeons congregate in large flocks, which remain together until the ensuing breeding season, roosting at night in woods and fir plantations, their numbers, in the Eastern counties at least, being increased by immigrants from the Continent. At this time they are most wary and difficult of approach, and from their voracity are dreadful enemies to the farmer. This bird is, indeed, possessed of so insatiable an appetite that we have often wondered how it contrives to live, and apparently thrive, as it does in London, where one would suppose it impossible for it ever to obtain anything approaching to what it would consider a "square meal." Its food consists of any grain that may be available, though, like all pigeons, it doubtless gives the preference to peas or beans, together with beechmast, acorns, and, so far as the farmer is concerned the only point in its favour, the seeds of many noxious weeds. It also feeds largely on green food, doing great damage in clover and turnip fields, especially the latter, where it not only eats the leaves, thus seriously interfering with the growth of the plant, but also in winter destroys the roots, hollowing them out so that little is left but the shell. No better examples of the voracity of this species can be given than those supplied in the last edition of Yarrell's "British Birds," from which the three following are extracted. The crop of one bird examined contained 1,020 grains of corn; that of another, 144 peas and 7 large beans; and the last, but certainly not the least, 231 beech-nuts.

Wood-pigeons, in common with all their congeners, are very fond of water. They are essentially thirsty; drinking, be it observed, not like most other birds, sip by sip, but as a horse drinks, at one long draught. Water is also necessary to them for bathing purposes. Their fondness for water leads the London birds to places where they may easily be observed. For example, it is not uncommon to see wood-pigeons on the island in St. James's Park, this being a favourite drinking and bathing-place for the birds resorting to that neighbourhood. They may also be seen from time to time, especially by those acquainted with their habits, drinking and bathing in the Serpentine. Wood-pigeons, though among the wariest and wildest of birds in the autumn and winter, in the breeding season so change their habits as not infrequently to be found nesting in gardens, and at this time they seem to lose much of their natural fear of man. When taken from the nest or reared under dovecote pigeons the young become tame, though they are at best but bad pets, their innate wildness inducing them, however well they may have been treated, and however happy they may appear in confinement, to escape at the first opportunity, and retire to their natural haunts in the woods. They are, in fact, incapable of domestication, only one case, so far as we are aware, being on record of a wood-pigeon remaining, when given its liberty, and mating with a dovecote pigeon, and in this case, though three nests were made and eggs laid in each of them, only one young bird was reared. There is no doubt that these birds are largely on the increase in this country, and that they are also extending their range, a fact, from the farmer's point of view, much to be deplored. Many reasons have been given for this increase, such, for example, as the greater cultivation of turnips and other green crops, the larger number of plantations. As an inhabitant of London this bird is absolutely harmless, and we hope it may be long before it becomes necessary for Londoners to journey into the country to make the acquaintance of the wood-pigeon.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

WHEN at Toole's Theatre the programme announces that there "will be played, for the first time, the Comedietta by Mr. Justin H. McCarthy, entitled A Red Rag," it is surely suggested that Mr. Justin H. McCarthy has written a comedietta—that is to say, has invented a plot, created characters, and supplied dialogue. Probably Mr. McCarthy was surprised last Monday morning to find the critics so well informed. That the play was conveyed from a French story was generally stated, and in some cases M. Ohnet was mentioned as the author. The critics were quite right. A Red Rag is closely copied from a story by M. Ohnet called "Le Malheur de Tante Ursule," which is issued, together with another story, called "Le Chant du Cygne," in a volume published last year under the title of Noir et Rose. M. Ohnet's story is prettily told, but it does not bear transference to the stage, at least by the heavy hands that have now been laid upon it. We feel that Ursule's deeply-rooted antipathy to the army is a little unreasonable. "Jamais un homme qui appartient à l'armée n'entrera dans ma maison! J'en sortirais plutôt moi-même!" she cries when her niece Aline admits her affection for the young captain of artillery. Mr. McCarthy's Miss Ursula says to her niece Alice, "Never shall any one belonging to the army enter my house"; and where there is no greater divergence than this between the original and English version the compiler of the latter might really almost admit that he has made a translation. The fact remains that, whereas M. Ohnet's Ursule appears only unreasonable, Mr. McCarthy's Miss Ursula appears ridiculous. The aunt mourns a lover who went to fight in the Crimea, and who, as she supposes, was killed there; and this is why she will not consent to the betrothal of her niece to a soldier—the long years have brought so much sorrow that she fears lest the girl she loves should also suffer. If other women thought as she does, the army would be doomed to celibacy; but the absurdity does not strike the reader of Noir et Rose as it strikes the spectator of A Red Rag, because M. Ohnet's Ursule has an air of reality that is lacking in the caricature at Toole's Theatre. The ends of the two pieces have also a vast difference, closely as Mr. McCarthy has striven to translate his original. Ursule's faithless lover returns, after thirty years' absence, married to a Russian, and growing rich by the sale of a fraudulent champagne concocted out of a Crimean wine. A deeply-rooted affection for him has been a part of Ursule's life; he has gone his way, and so totally forgotten her that he has not taken the trouble to let her know that he lived. Thereupon she experiences a violent revulsion of feeling. Of course it is illogical. Having found her soldier so cruelly faithless, she has fresh cause to dread and distrust soldiers; but, on the contrary, she straightway alters her mind, and welcomes Aline's lover, though she has said she would rather follow the girl to her grave than do anything to further such a union. But there is, in M. Ohnet's story, something strikingly dramatic and natural about Ursule's sudden change of sentiment. We understand her. She is eager to forget the past, to abandon her old ideas, to adopt new ones; her life has been passed under a mistake, and, casting it aside, she views the world in a fresh light. Mr. McCarthy's Miss Ursula is a vulgar, commonplace woman, who, after expressing herself in the strongest possible terms, simply alters her mind for no better reaso than that for which she made it up. Every one who has read the book and seen the play must feel how completely M. Ohnet's meaning, as expressed in the few words which pass between Ursule and the Capitaine Roger, is lost in the conventional little interview between Miss Ursula and the young officer. The representation at Toole's has little merit.

The scene disclosed when the curtain draws up on Miss Jarramie's Genie at the Savoy Theatre is of the most tawdry description. A more vulgarly coloured "interior" has not lately been placed upon the stage of a London theatre; but it is suitable enough for the piece. Mr. Frank Desprez has devised a modern parody of the legend of Aladdin. A lady—Miss Jarramie—receives a lamp as a present, rubs it, and the Genie appears. The Genie is made to do service as a cook, a butler, and a Parliamentary agent; and in the first character he imitates the John Wellington Wells of Mr. Grossmith. Miss Jarramie's Genie is altogether a feeble piece of work, and it is not improved by the introduction of political allusions. Mr. Desprez's detestation of what he calls "paper-Unionists" seems to be so strong that he cannot refrain from giving evidence of it in his farce; and this is a mistake, because people have quite as much politics as they care about out of doors. If Mr. D'Oyly Carte intends to utilize the stage of his theatre for the propagation of Gladstone-Parnellite doctrine he would do well to announce the fact. Admirers of the creed would know where to find gratification, and others who go to the theatre to be entertained and to escape from the worries and dissensions of everyday life would know what theatre to avoid. Mrs. Jarramie's Genie seems to have been produced to afford members of the chorus an opportunity of showing what they can do. Messrs. Alfred and François Cellier have put together some music, and this is sung fairly well; but there is a sad lack of refinement in the speech and bearing of the characters. The whole thing is suggestive of amateur theatricals, and does no credit to the Savoy, where, indeed, visitors who appreciate the extreme neatness and admirable finish of Mr. Gilbert's work will be very much surprised to find so inferior a production.

THE FINANCES OF INDIA.

THE interruption of a debate, which it is on every account desirable to bring to an early close, by dissertations as mischievous and misleading as that in which Mr. S. Smith, last Monday night, embodied the results of his winter's tour in India, need not be regretted if the answer elicited from the Secretary of State serve to clear up the uncertainty of the public mind as to the present position of the Indian finances, and to provide an authoritative justification of the measures recently adopted by the Government of India to meet the grave emergency with which it is confronted. Of Mr. S. Smith and his proposals it is unnecessary to speak. The emotional treatment of Indian topics is, happily, discountenanced by rational politicians of every school. When a gentleman begins his criticism of the financial measures of the Indian Government by "protesting against the monstrous and cruel tax in the name of humanity and Christianity," every one knows how much knowledge and good sense are to be expected in the rest of the speech. We are prepared for proposals for protective duties, for surrender of the opium monopoly, for representative institutions, for the curtailment of European salaries, for the free admission of natives to every post of authority, and—sovereign remedy for a ruined empire's maladies—the appointment of a Royal Commission. All these are familiar topics, and Sir John Gorst naturally did not think it necessary to reply upon any points but those specifically raised in the amendment. No one, of course, seriously believes that protective duties are among the available remedies of India's financial distress. If such a belief still lingers in any mind but Mr. Smith's and his native informant's, the history of Indian trade for recent years is sufficient justification for refusing to recur to a state of things which was recognized at the time as simply intolerable. Whatever her other troubles may be, India has enjoyed, and is enjoying, an altogether exceptional commercial prosperity; she is developing her trade at a rate which no other country can approach. While, as comparing the figures of 1884 with those of 1873, the trade of England, export and import, has slightly receded, that of Italy increased by 3·14 per cent., that of Germany and France by about 7½ per cent., and that of America by 21¼ per cent., the increase in India stands at 57½ per cent. Is this a state of things with which any sane person would be prepared to interfere, when interference means necessarily curtailment? The concession of representative institutions, further than in the very restricted forms in which they at present exist, is demanded by no class in India, except the busybodies who furnish the entourage of tourists of the calibre of Mr. Smith. Its effect would be to bring to the front and place in positions of responsibility the very persons whose wishes and tastes are already urged so vehemently as to divert attention from the interests of the great mass of their countrymen. As to a Royal Commission, it is enough to say that the Government has now before it the Reports of two Commissions of the highest standing. One, the Finance Commission, a year ago, traversed the entire country, submitted every branch of the administration to the most rigid scrutiny, and laid before the Government various schemes of retrenchment, which certainly did not err on the side of indulgence. These are now under discussion. The other, the Civil Service Commission, has just submitted the results of the most prolonged and searching investigation ever conducted in India as to the aspirations of the native community and the best way of meeting them. In both of these bodies influential native gentlemen were included, native opinion of every shade was anxiously solicited and freely given. Till the Government and the Council of India have had an opportunity of considering these important documents, any further inquiry would be, to say the least of it, premature.

To come to the only serious part of the discussion, the statement of the Secretary of State fully bore out the view which we recently expressed, of the grave difficulties by which the Indian Treasury is now beset. It is but cold consolation to be told that, but for certain exceptional causes of expenditure, the position of the Indian Exchequer would be one of comfortable superabundance. The last thirteen years have, Sir John Gorst pointed out, resulted in a net deficit of 8¾ millions; but then the Government has been called to meet many exceptional calls on its purse. It has spent 15½ millions on campaigns, 8½ millions in feeding famine-stricken populations; it has devoted 8 millions more to "famine insurance" by paying off debt or constructing railways and canals; it has, besides, in the course of thirteen years, devoted 6½ millions of revenue to railway construction, 1½ million to strengthening its military frontier and protecting its ports, another million to the immediate arrangements involved in the conversion of a 4 per cent. loan to one at 3½ per cent., by which the annual revenues will be relieved hereafter to the extent of a quarter of a million. These items come to more than 42 millions, and, if to this be added 23½ millions for the loss occasioned by the fall in exchange since the rates of thirteen years ago, we have a surplus of 65 millions in which to merge the deficit of 8¾.

Unfortunately expenditure is none the less real for being termed "extraordinary," and the position of the Government none the less serious because the causes of an excessive outlay have been beyond human prevision or control. It is somewhat bootless to reflect that, if the Indian Government had had no little wars, no famines, and had been content to leave railway construction alone, it might have shown a surplus of 55 millions. Equally creditable to the authorities concerned, and equally devoid of any but an apologetic value, is the circumstance pointed out by the Finance Minister, Mr. Westland, that of the 13¾ millions by which the annual expenditure of the Government of India increased in the decade 1875–1884, two millions only represent voluntary increase of expenditure, the other 11¾ millions being accounted for by the increase of railways and other profitable investments, or by the increased cost of the home payments owing to the fall of exchange. This additional outlay of two millions, Mr. Westland explains, could have been avoided only by the absolute repudiation of the duties of a civilized Government in the way of internal development and external defence. These facts, no doubt, indicate that the finances of India have been in able and conscientious hands, but they do nothing to mitigate the effect of the adverse influences which, ever since 1884, have been dragging the Indian Government in the direction of insolvency. Mr. Westland draws a graphic picture of these, summarizing them in the result that the Government had, at the commencement of 1887, to prepare for 4¾ millions expenditure in excess of that of 1884, the items being—

Increased army charges	980,000
Frontier roads	200,000
Upper Burmah (net)	1,780,000
Additional loss by exchange	1,790,000

This sum they proposed to raise by an Income-tax, bringing 900,000*l.*; other improvements of revenue, 960,000*l.*; by appropriating the Famine Insurance Fund, 1½ million; by abandoning the construction of railways from revenue, 260,000*l.*; by retrenching the provincial governments by half a million, and absorbing the prescribed balance of half a million which has been, for several years past, the rule of the Government to show on its balance-sheet.

A bare equilibrium was thus established, but matters were not yet at the worst. Exchange fell below the estimated ratio 17·5 pence to 16·9 pence for the rupee, and so produced an additional loss of 750,000*l.* The railways, whose prosperity turns largely on the accidents of European and American harvests, fell short of their estimated earnings by 400,000*l.* The price of opium, owing to the more effectual prevention of smuggling under the Chefoo Convention, fell, and a loss of 300,000*l.* is expected under this head. The Government, accordingly, found itself worse off by nearly 1½ million than it believed itself to be at the beginning of the year. Additional taxation could not, it was clear, be any longer escaped. The impropriety of finding relief by throwing the burden on posterity, by means of a loan, was heightened by the circumstance that, as matters stood, an expenditure of a million on military railways had been already placed to the loan account, and that a further sum of 750,000*l.*, incurred in special defence operations, has, by permission of the Secretary of State, been transferred from the revenue account to that of capital. Future generations will, accordingly, pay their full share for the blessings of a protected frontier and a sufficient military defence. Taxation being recognized as inevitable, the Government naturally looked to the only source from which, while avoiding the evil of increased direct taxation, they could hope for material relief. The Salt-tax was enormously reduced in 1882. The author of that reduction expressly justified it on the ground that reduction did not mean abandonment, and that, in the event of financial pressure, the tax could, without difficulty or hardship, be enhanced. The rate of increase in consumption since the reduction of the tax (2·7 per cent. per annum, as against 2·2 per cent. per annum previous to that measure), though, on the whole, satisfactory, has not been such as to indicate a very close connexion between the rate of the tax and the amount consumed. No one will be worse off than he was in 1882; the inhabitants of Bengal will continue to be a great deal better off. It may be hoped that the effects of the change will be inappreciable to the general consumer. This is the more probable from the fact that salt is not, as a general rule, sold in India; a handful is given by the corn-merchant to each purchaser at the grain-shop—thrown in, so to speak, as part of the bargain. It is hardly likely that his generosity to his customers will be affected by an infinitesimal addition to the cost of his gift. At any rate, the Government is but strictly following the course indicated by Lord Ripon and his Finance Minister when, in a moment of grave emergency, they recall for a time a portion of the gift to the taxpayer which experience has now shown to have been made with disastrous indifference to probable contingencies. The Government of India would be facing its difficulties with a lighter heart if it had in its coffers the proceeds of the three millions of taxation which the authors of the "Prosperity Budget" of 1882 thought it expedient, on the eve, as it has proved, of a great financial crisis, to remit.

"AND GALLIO CARED FOR NONE OF THESE THINGS."

THE Southwark election is over, and the Unionist candidate is defeated. Immediately arises the cry, and we fear with too much truth in it, that the Conservatives did not work with sufficient energy, and that their organization was bad. It seems almost an hopeless task to convince the leaders of the Conservatives that the organization of their party in very many constituencies is deplorably deficient. We often wonder what deadly sin the Conservatives can have committed, that they should be visited with so dread a punishment as their own apathy and carelessness. We should have thought they would by this time have begun to realize that under the present extended franchise the chances of success in an election—especially a bye one—rest almost entirely on the comparative efficiency of the various political organizations existing in the electoral district where the contest takes place. This is owing in a great measure to the political ignorance of a very large number of the voters, the natural result of which is that they vote for that party which displays the greatest energy. Even if the rank and file do not grasp this fact, surely the leaders and chief organizers of the party should do so; but, unfortunately, they seem to have occupied themselves like those prophets of old, who said "Peace"; and "there was no peace."

The responsibility for this unsatisfactory state of affairs must rest almost entirely with the central organizing authority, for on them devolves the duty of seeing that the subordinate organizations are in a fit condition to do their work properly. By this we do not mean that there should be constant interference on the part of the central authority, but that with tact it might keep itself informed how matters are going in each constituency, and might, when necessary, help with its advice the local associations. At present each of the latter appears to go its own way without help and without advice, and until an election comes, nobody has the means of knowing whether its organization be or be not efficient. This neglect seems to run through all ranks of the party, and even to attack bodies which have been created for the purpose of improving party organization. To see that this is so we have only to look at the Conference which was held at Oxford, where abstract questions of policy occupied the larger portion of the attention of those present; whereas the Conference was called together in order that the delegates of the various Conservative organizations throughout the country might have an opportunity of comparing notes and learning from one another how they could improve the efficiency of the bodies which they represented.

This is not the first time that we have called attention to the very great danger which the Conservative party is incurring by neglecting so simple a precaution as being always prepared for an election. When a general election does come the party wakes into life and attempts to do in a very short time what should have been done long before, and what indeed requires years to bring to perfection—namely, to create a sound organization in each constituency. At such a time the central authority is consulted by everybody at the same time, and it is naturally impossible for that authority to attend to the needs of each constituency in a satisfactory manner. But if there were steady work going on whilst there was no immediate probability of an election this pressure of work would be greatly reduced. We make full allowance for the fact that the various local associations are very jealous of being dictated to and like to manage their own affairs in their own way; but this feeling on their part is, to a considerable extent, due to a want of confidence in the central authority, and would be in a great measure removed if this authority showed more interest in and were in closer communication with them. There is one method by which this evil could be remedied, and that is to have a certain number of men attached to the central offices who could visit the local associations and constituencies and report on their condition, and could also give them, when in difficulties, good advice without in any way interfering with their freedom of action. Although the responsibility for the mismanagement of the party's organization rests chiefly on the central authority, yet local associations and the Conservative rank and file are by no manner of means free from blame. The members of these associations seem to consider that when there is no immediate chance of an election it is a good time to quarrel among themselves, and for each to seek for a more prominent position than his neighbour, thereby creating feelings of jealousy that do very serious harm when an election comes, in that the various members distrust one another. The evil of this is aggravated by the fact that those Conservatives who are not struggling for pre-eminence hold altogether aloof from political work, and in consequence there is no check on those who are scheming for their own aggrandizement. Perhaps we are rather hard on these latter, considering that an uneasy suspicion haunts us that some Conservative members of Parliament even are not quite immaculate in this respect, and that at times self-interest outweighs patriotism.

We do not like to think that Conservatives care so little for their principles as to wilfully give themselves up to political apathy; but we do think that they are not fully aware of the importance of continuous exertion, and, this being so, the sooner the leading men of the party call attention to this matter the better will .. be for Conservatism. The worst feature in the case is that, if any not very distinguished member ventures to hint at the possibility of Conservative organization being benefited by reform, he is sure to be accused of exposing the weakness of his party to its enemies and of acting as he does with the intention of injuring it; or, if not accused of this, he is told that he is most injudicious, and had better hold his tongue. It seems hardly credible that reasonable men can delude themselves into believing that the shortcomings of any political party in its organization are not better known to its enemies than to its friends, especially in these days, when there is no privacy from the newspaper correspondent.

If this condition of affairs continues, Conservatives will have to borrow, and act up to the favourite proverb of the Radicals, "Reform must come from below." If the leaders of the party—by leaders we do not only mean those who are severally known as the leader of the House of Commons and of the Lords, but the influential politicians both in and out of Parliament—will not or do not trouble themselves to see that the party organization is put on a proper footing, the duty of so doing will devolve on those who do understand the importance of the question. In order to set matters right, it will be necessary for all earnest Conservatives to bring such pressure to bear on their leaders as will compel the latter to take heed, and no longer to occupy the proverbially easy and neglectful position of Gallio.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT AND THE EIGHTY CLUB.

THE Eighty Club entertained Sir William Harcourt at dinner on Tuesday; and Sir William Harcourt did his best to entertain the Eighty Club after dinner. The name of this society is becoming a misnomer. An honest gentleman of our acquaintance, who had heard the word pronounced, but had never seen it spelt, believed that the Club was called the Atè, from the daughter of strife and the promptress of mischief. But the brutal candour and wit of the Hell-Fire days does not mark our time; and the young gentlemen of the two Universities, who formed a large proportion of the original members of the society that met on Tuesday in Willis's Rooms, are very soberly literal and prosaic. The name by which the Club is still known is, however, now an anachronism. The Club came into existence in 1880, and was christened in honour of the general election of that year, and of the majority which then restored Mr. Gladstone to power. It now represents the defeat of 1886, and its own apostacy and that of its leader from Liberal principles. It ought to be called the Eighty-six Club. Even this name, if it were adopted, would scarcely be permanent; and at the next general election it would, if it continued in existence, have to designate itself as the Ninety-two or the Ninety-three Club—a title of appropriately revolutionary significance, which would enable it to combine with its own purposes the commemoration of the centenary of the September massacres, or of the institution of the Committee of Public Safety in France. The Gladstonian party is moving in this direction, though we have no fear of their reaching the goal. The principles which they advocate or apologize for in Ireland would carry them this length; but happily fidelity to principle is not their leading characteristic. They are, moreover, most of them Englishmen, and respectable Englishmen, misled by a temporary hallucination; and habit and character will be a sufficient check on the fanatic logic of their newly-embraced ideas. The present state of feeling among large numbers of our countrymen recalls the epidemic manias of the middle ages, when one man conspicuously going mad was sufficient to send large masses of those who saw him mad too. We have our political convulsionnaires and dancing maniacs, whose restoration to a sound mind is not to be despaired of.

Sir William Harcourt was in some respects well entitled to the position which he occupied on Tuesday. In Lucian's Assembly of the Gods the first place was assigned to the Colossus of Rhodes, because of his bulk and of his brass, and of the blustering effrontery with which he asserted these claims to precedence. Metaphorically, Sir William Harcourt is a Colossus, by no means insensible to his intellectual stature and to the moral weight of metal which he carries. Mr. Gladstone has lately said that the natural leadership in English politics belongs to the representatives of our great aristocratic families. Sir William Harcourt, though, like Mæcenas, only of equestrian rank, yet boasts that he is sprung from royal ancestry. His lineage is that of English kings and French dukes. The verses in which a contemporary poet celebrated the nomination of the Lord Keeper Harcourt to be Lord Chancellor of Great Britain apply to his not less illustrious descendant, and the poetry is worthy of both:—

> The enraptured Muse to a glad nation sings,
> First the great race from which our Harcourt springs;
> Noble his blood, and ancient his descent,
> Ere since to Norman yoke Britannia bent.

In the vicissitudes of great families Plantagenets have been discovered keeping turnpikes, taking tolls, making bricks, digging graves, and killing sheep. These are respectable pursuits, on which Sir William Harcourt in his present line of business has no right to look down. If he were to do so, Hamlet's retort upon Polonius who resented the imputation of being a fishmonger would not be altogether inappropriate. If we have any complaint to make of Sir William Harcourt on this head, it is not that he occasionally and ostentatiously remembers his noble and royal origin, but that he too frequently forgets it. At the Eighty Club dinner on Tuesday he seemed scarcely to keep sufficiently in mind that he was there as an honoured guest, representing a great leader of what assumes to be a great party. His language and demeanour were rather that of the parasite of the classic banquet, paying for his entertainment by coarse jests and fulsome flattery.

Sir William Harcourt has one joke, which was a very good one to begin with, but which becomes a little stale on repetition. It is that he is the exemplar of fixed principle and of personal consistency. "I obey," he said, "the same chief, I wear the same uniform, and I fight under the same colours as those under which I was first enlisted." Perhaps so; but the chief has deserted to the enemy, carrying with him the colours and the uniform which, having once been the symbols of loyalty, are now, as worn by him and his followers, the badges of treason. Sir William Harcourt's fidelity is a fidelity to treachery, and his loyalty a loyalty to intrigue. Mr. Parnell is the chief whom he now practically serves, and it is his uniform which he should wear, and his colours under which he should fight. Sir William is a little sensitive as to his former passages of arms with the allies with whom he now serves, and we really respect his uneasiness. If it be true, as Sir Robert Walpole did not say, that every man has his price, it is perhaps as true that every man has his point of conscience; and it is satisfactory to us to find that Sir William Harcourt is no exception to this rule. But Sir William Harcourt will not find that he can get over this matter so easily with other people as he can get over it with himself. There are some retractations which are baser than the original offence, some repentances viler than the crime, some apologies which sink the man who makes them lower than the affront. If the statements which Sir William Harcourt made a few years ago about Mr. Parnell and his associates were not true, they were cowardly slanders. If the measures taken against them under Mr. Gladstone's second Administration—measures for which Sir William Harcourt, as Home Secretary, was in a special degree responsible—were not necessary, they were acts of most cruel tyranny. If Sir William Harcourt was mistaken then, what ground is there for believing that he is not mistaken now? His confession of former wrong-doing and wrong-speaking is conclusive against his present title to be heard. In the Parliament of 1880-1885 Sir William Harcourt was a Minister of the Crown, whose words and conduct we must assume to have been based upon a full knowledge of the character of the men whom he sent to prison, and on whom he heaped injuries, and of the political exigencies of the time. He is now one of the leaders of a faction bent on returning to power by the aid of the party which he then insulted and coerced; and the language of measureless contumely is exchanged for the language of gross flattery. Common sense will judge without appeal which of the two Sir William Harcourts is to be believed.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

THE people who decided to neglect the Crystal Palace last Saturday missed an interesting and well-arranged concert. Fortunately the players seemed little depressed by a rather scanty audience, while a few empty benches undeniably improve the quality of the sound in this as in many other music-rooms. The programme contained plenty of contrast; standard and time-honoured works of art, Weber's overture to Der Freischütz and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, rubbed shoulders with a modern French "Suite de Ballet" by Léo Delibes, and two new vocal works of some scope by Messrs. C. T. Speer and Hamish MacCunn, young composers of our own schools.

The overture went off most successfully. We have seldom realized more vividly all the picturesqueness of Weber's romantic introduction to Der Freischütz. The weird opening, suggestive of woodland mystery and legendary hunting in enchanted forests, can be very easily spoilt by any want of delicacy in the general interpretation, any coarse quality in the tone, especially of the wind. This part of the overture, however, was exceptionally beautiful on Saturday, and it would be difficult to surpass the soft, mellow quality of the horns, sounding aërially and as if far away. The more agitated themes received appropriate expression, and the rapid, rushing passages went with wonderful steadiness as well as energy. The performance excelled chiefly in the breadth with which all minor shades were subdued, so that the mind passed readily from one main point to another. An equally broad interpretation of Schubert's work was given, and one which reminded us of the magically enthusiastic playing of Mr. Manns's orchestra at the Schubert concert last November. The tragic dignity and the mysteriou. and, so to speak, underground effects of the Unfinished Symphony were emphasized with zeal and taste by all the performers. The steadiness and ensemble of the strings, the delicacy of tone of the wind, and the perfect agreement of feeling on all points of phrasing and nuance produced a result remarkable for clearness and poignancy of expression.

A pleasant singer and maker of tunes (such a one as Kelly, whom Mozart counselled not to embarrass himself with learning) is a natural growth but lightly esteemed by musicians in our day, and yet it is a better thing than the mechanical product of indiscriminate education. Mr. C. P. Steer, author of The Day Dream, composed to words from Tennyson's account of the Sleeping Beauty, has encumbered himself with a good deal of education, and has thereby got a gold medal at Bath for his Cantata—perhaps all the attention it deserves. His figure-spinning and his studied instrumentation appear out of proportion to the matter of his music. Too much worry and fuss about a few commonplace ideas produce an interweaving of figures which reminds one of some conventional elaboration of ornament in mechanically rounded curves. Now and then, for learning's sake and because one must not be too simple in this age, we come upon a funny misplaced effort at profundity or significance. Hence lugubrious use of brass, aimless disturbance of key, uncalled for instrumental wails and crashes, and unmelodious noises of various kinds interspersed in a desert of commonplace tunes—which, by the way, do not always fit either the accent of the words or the general sense of the lines. It would be difficult to guess any valid reason for the hubbub which bursts out over the line "How dark these hidden eyes must be," when the Princess is about to be kissed in her sleep. The awaking of the King is quite pointless, and the tremendous burst of something like fury with which the final love scene finishes seems decidedly unmotived. No excuse can be found on the score of performance. All did their best, and the soloists, Miss Thudicum and Mr. Harper Kearton, played their parts with care and finish. We do not say that Mr. Speer's medal is not deserved, that he has not learnt what can be taught of his profession, that his Cantata is not for a student a successful enough compilation of the materials of music; but we altogether deny that he has set Tennyson's words dramatically or picturesquely, poetically or rhetorically, romantically or classically, or in any way open to a musician. He is happily, however, very young, and he may find some other corner for himself in music than the Cantata. Perhaps the truth is that we encourage music in too wholesale a fashion nowadays; hence the production of a work, and there are many like it, which is without musical inspiration, and is yet of technical importance. Still one does not like to think that another Schubert might have no better luck than the first. So, after hearing such a performance of Schubert as they give at the Crystal Palace, one feels ready to encourage all the dullest efforts of the original by rule, the free upon principle, school; lest, in a crowd of gesticulating blunderers, we might be entertaining an angel unawares. Mr. Hamish MacCunn, the young composer of the other new choral work played on Saturday, is not entirely unknown to the frequenters of these concerts, his overture, "The Land of the Mountain and the Flood," having been received this year as a work of unusual promise, both by musicians and the public. He is brimful of ideas, far from commonplace. His melody is spirited, expressive, and naturally inspired. He seems, in fact, to create musical ideas, instead of merely patching together figures and modulations; while his faults are such as can be laid to the enthusiasm of youth. The somewhat coarse and too uniformly loud singing of the choir tended perhaps to increase the effect of a certain want of reticence in the work. Lord Ullin's Daughter is a setting of the well-known ballad for chorus and orchestra in a form by no means that of the ordinary cantata. The music runs on continuously, without solo parts or set numbers, somewhat in the manner of Mr. Stanford's Revenge. Mr. MacCunn's orchestration is vividly descriptive. His storm is wildly picturesque; the change of mood in Lord Ullin is finely expressed; and the lament at the end excellently imagined, and as far removed as can be from the coarse hammer-and-tongs of a vulgar finish. The concert closed with the bright and coloured instrumentation of Léo Delibes's Suite de Ballet, Sylvia, of which the scherzo, entitled "Pizzicati," is the most graceful and piquant number.

THE CONVERSION OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

THE belief in the City grows stronger every day that the Government has not only made up its mind to convert the National Debt, but that Mr. Goschen has arranged his plans, and that negotiations have already been set on foot to carry them out. It is a bold undertaking in the present state of the Continent. Of course if it succeeds it will raise all the higher the prestige of the Minister who has achieved it in circumstances so unfavourable, and, what is much more important, it will make a most powerful impression abroad. But, on the other hand, if it fails, the failure will be disastrous. It will seriously damage the reputation of the Minister who undertook so important a measure at a time when the event proved it to be impossible, and abroad it will lower the credit of the country. Twice within a few years attempts will have been made to reduce the interest on the Debt, and to no avail. It is most important, therefore, that everything possible should be done to ensure the success of the conversion. And the first condition is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should obtain the cordial support of the banks. As a matter of course, no fundholder will be willing to take a lower rate of interest for his money if he has the choice. Under far more favourable conditions Mr. Childers tried to induce the fundholders voluntarily to accept conversion, and he failed utterly. Now, there is not a hope that people will agree to surrender any portion of their interest if they have an option. The Chancellor of the Exchequer must, therefore, be able to say to the fundholders that, if they do not accept his scheme, he is prepared to pay them off at par, due notice, of course, being given. But to be able to pay them off at par means that he should have already obtained a promise from the bankers that they will place at his disposal funds sufficient to pay off the recalcitrant fundholders. This, in other words, means that the Chancellor of the Exchequer must be prepared to give a consideration to bankers for the support he needs from them. Bankers are doubtless as patriotic as other people, but they are men of business also, and if asked to support the State in a great financial operation they must receive a consideration for the money employed by them. It will not be enough, however, to secure the support of the bankers; it will be necessary also to secure the support of the brokers if the measure is to be carried through smoothly. An ordinary fundholder when called upon to convert will, in the first place, consult his broker, and the broker will not be very ready to give his services to the Government gratis, for in fact that is what the brokers would do if they advised their clients to accept voluntarily a lower rate of interest. This will appear to some of our readers perhaps a sordid way of looking at this matter; but business is business, and if a great financial operation is to be carried through, it must be undertaken in a practical, businesslike spirit. The question is whether Mr. Goschen can secure the support of bankers and brokers generally without an Act of Parliament. The City impression seems to be that he can do so, and that in fact he has decided not to apply to Parliament. There are obvious reasons for an unwillingness on his part to bring the matter before Parliament. A Bill would bring on long discussions, and during those discussions the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be compelled to disclose so much of his plans that he would be in a much worse position in negotiating with the bankers subsequently than he is now. More important still is the consideration that the discussion would involve time. Probably, if Parliament has to legislate, conversion cannot be undertaken until the late summer, or possibly the autumn, and before the autumn much may occur to jeopardize complete and decisive success. It is almost necessary, therefore, that the measure should be undertaken at once, and, if it is undertaken at once, a new Act of Parliament must be dispensed with.

In negotiating with the bankers one of the points which will have to be settled is whether the conversion is to be piecemeal or complete. There are many plausible arguments for converting only a portion of the Debt, in the first place; but the City is decidedly against piecemeal conversion. Consols are the ideal investment stock, and they are so not only because the credit of the British Government stands so high, but because also they amount to so enormously large a stock. Although they are held to a very considerable extent by people who do not sell, still there is a large proportion of them, in Stock Exchange phraseology, "floating in the market"; in other words, there is always a considerable amount of Consols ready to be sold. The consequence is that an investor can buy for ready money, and take delivery almost immediately if he desires to do so, and, conversely, a holder of Consols can sell them as readily. Moreover, a person wishing to deal can tell within a few shillings how much he will have to pay or have to receive, as the case may be. The market is so large and transactions are so easily executed that quotations are very close. The result is, as we have said, that Consols have become an ideal investment stock. Now bankers, brokers, and capitalists generally desire that the new stock shall be at least as large as Consols, and they wish much that it shall be even larger. If it is a small stock, it will not be readily and easily dealt in, and therefore it will never be a favourite form of investment. Any reader who will take the trouble to look at a Stock Exchange list will see that some stocks are quoted very widely, as the phrase goes. He will see, for instance, one stock quoted perhaps 100 to 105, and another 108 to 115. These quotations mean that there are very few dealings in the stocks, and that consequently it is impossible to fix a price very closely without negotiation. The actual price in the first instance may be near 100 or near 105, or anywhere intermediate, and consequently the buyer or the seller, when giving an order to his broker, does not know in the one case what he will have to give, and in the second what he will have to receive. Nor has he any means of checking the correctness of his broker's report. Even if he looks afterwards at the entries of business done, he will not be able satisfactorily to check it, for a keen broker will make a better bargain for his principal than an easy-going one. Of course the wide fluctuations we have just instanced are rare, and occur only in stocks of very small amount; but even comparatively narrow quotations are objected to by investors, and still more by people who have often to deal in them. Therefore, the first desire of the City is that the new stock shall include practically the whole of the National Debt. The demand of the City may, of course, be refused; and Mr. Goschen may be able to induce the bankers to agree to a piecemeal conversion. But if he does he will have to pay in some form or other for their concession. Paradoxical as it at first sounds, though reasonable as it is with the explanation we have given, a conversion of the whole Debt is much easier than a conversion of part of it. In the one case the City would be cordially with the Chancellor of the Exchequer; in the other case it would give only a grudging support, and in many quarters there might be active opposition.

One other point that ought to be very seriously and fully considered is the amount of reduction in the rate of interest. When last writing on this subject we showed that the real rate at which the British Government can borrow at present is about 2¾ per cent., in other words, that is about the yield of money invested in the British Funds. It seems at first sight, therefore, most reasonable to propose an exchange at par of Consols and New and Reduced Threes into a new stock bearing 2¾ per cent. interest, of course giving a guarantee that the new Stock will itself not be converted for a specified number of years. There would be the great advantage in this that it would not increase the capital of the Debt. But here, again, the opinion of the City is decidedly adverse. The City desires that the conversion when once made shall be final. People argue that if at the present time, when a great European war seems impending, and when the fear of conversion has checked the rise in Consols, the real yield on an investment in the Funds is about 2¾ per cent., by-and-bye when Europe is more peaceful, and when the scarcity of new securities pushes up the price of the Funds, the credit of the British Government will further improve, and that it will be able to borrow at 2½ per cent. Therefore, when the specified number of years comes to an end, there will be fresh schemes started for a conversion of the Two and Three-quarters per Cents, and thus the matter will not be set at rest. Fundholders, in other words, will live with the fear of a fresh conversion constantly before their minds. In addition to this, it is clearly to the interest of the Fundholders that they should receive a premium on conversion, just as it is to the interest of the State that no premium should be given. For example, if a holder of Consols was offered an equivalent amount of Two and a Half per Cents, with a premium of, let us say, 5 per cent. to compensate him for the reduction of interest, he would have an increase in his principal sum, and he would also have a hope that the price of the new stock would rise, and, therefore, that the value of the total investment would increase. The conclusion is that a 2½ per cent. stock is much more popular with capitalists and investors generally than a 2¾ per cent. stock, whereas a 2¾ per cent. stock is more favourable to the State. Under these circumstances a compromise seems not difficult. If, for example, it were proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give a new stock which for a specified number of years should bear 2¾ per cent. interest, and at the end of that period the interest should be reduced to 2½ per cent., an arrangement would probably be arrived at. Although the conversion would be carried out by two steps, yet it would be settled and adopted all at once. And, furthermore, the State would gain, insomuch as it would not increase the capital of the Debt, or would increase it but to a very small degree. On the other hand, the fundholder would receive a higher rate of interest for a specified number of years; and, finally, on its being cut down to 2½ per cent., would have the consolation that no more conversions would be adopted. The compromise seems fair to all parties, and, therefore, reasonable; and, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer can obtain for it the support of the banks, there will be no serious difficulty in carrying it out, the fundholders generally, knowing that if they refused they would be paid off, would come to terms. The majority of them have to hold Consols, and, therefore, would not incur being paid off at par; while the few that would refuse the arrangement could easily be dealt with. The sole difficulty is in bringing about an arrangement with the bankers. In itself it will not be difficult if the hope of peace remains, and if, besides, the time within which the conversion arrangement is completed is not too long; but it will undoubtedly be a serious matter for bankers to take upon themselves large financial liabilities if those liabilities are to continue for a long time.

JAPANESE WOODCUTS.

JAPANESE art is not all, perhaps, that its fanatics would have us believe. It is quaint, it is pretty, it is amusing; and it is all these three to an extreme. But there are higher qualities than quaintness and prettiness; while to be amusing has been denied to some of the greatest masters that have ever lived; and the danger is that, now that we are coming to know something about this agreeable subject, we may take it too seriously, and make more of it than it is worth or will bear. It is the century of fads, or the peril would scarce exist. But that it does exist the fact that a day or two hence we shall be made free of no less than three exhibitions of Japanese art—that we shall have leave to wander between Mr. Colvin's new gallery at the British Museum, and Mr. Anderson's chromo-xylographs at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, and the entertaining and improving collection of objects exhibited in the Fine Art Society's rooms—is enough to show.

The origin, the Great First Cause, of this amiable form of dissipation is unquestionably Mr. Anderson. In his admirable treatise of The Pictorial Arts of Japan, and his still more admirable Catalogue of the Chinese and Japanese paintings and drawings in the British Museum, he was able, as we took occasion to show, and as we have the greatest pleasure in repeating, to place the subject on a scientific basis, and found a serious school of "Japanology." More than one had preceded him in the attempt, as more than one will succeed him in achievement; but he alone had studied the thing sur place, and to him alone is referable the amount of accurate and useful knowledge that we actually possess. Until he came we were content to grope from theory to theory, to be innocent of data, and to trust to human ingenuity alike for premisses and for conclusions. Thanks to him, indeed, we possess, together with the finest collection of Chinese and Japanese paintings that has been got together in Europe, the two best books on the subject which have as yet been written. His latest work, the gathering of books and colour-prints which he has made for exhibition at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, is not a national possession—is, indeed, but a private and temporary business, done for love of the art, and doomed from its inception to be dispersed and forgotten as soon as ever it has been seen. It is, however, as complete in conception and in execution as thorough as its predecessors. Like them, too, it is a revelation after its kind. To master it is to master the question. The six or seven hundred examples contained in it range from the thirteenth century and the magnum opus of the Abbot Nichiren to the present day and the birds of Bairei and the comic fantasies of Kiōsai, and present as full and practical a panorama of the history of the art as is just now possible.

There can be no doubt that Japanese wood-engraving and block-printing were borrowed, like Japanese painting, from the Chinese. Mr. Anderson thinks that both arts were introduced as early as the middle of the eighth century, but dismisses as obvious frauds the blocks which are still preserved, as relics of the infancy of the art, in some Japanese temples. During this first period, which extends from the ninth century to the beginning of the seventeenth, the function of the wood-cutter was purely religious. He was commonly a monk, and in the service of his community he executed blocks, of which impressions were sold to the faithful. Two examples of such work are included in the present collection. One, the achievement of the Abbot Nichiren aforesaid, is a representation of the god Indra; it is an early impression from a block that is still preserved at one of the temples near Tokyo; it is of considerable size, and of commanding clumsiness in execution. Not till we have seen it are we in a position to feel the full force of Mr. Anderson's remark that "we must regard the first historical period . . . chiefly as one of archæological interest." The other specimen—two large woodcuts of Devâ Kings, signed Riōkin, and dated 1325—is an immense advance on this "Indra" of Abbot Nichiren. The style is purely calligraphic, the imagination displayed is altogether conventional; but the thing is evidently the work of a man who, in his way, was both a draughtsman and a woodcutter, and who had besides a certain sense of decoration. These three broadsheets (Nos. 1, 2, 3 in the Catalogue) are on the wall; the example next in date, a copy of the Isé Monogatari, the oldest illustrated book in Japanese literature, is contained in Case A. It was printed—perhaps in Kioto—as early as 1608; it consists, says Mr. Anderson, "merely of a brief account of the amours, travels, and adventures of an unknown hero, designated as 'a certain man,'" who is supposed to be identical with a distinguished poet, but "who may be only the impersonal 'Somebody'" invented of late by Mr. Andrew Lang; it is characterized "by the introduction of frequent stanzas of an amatory type," which appears to point to a certain kinship with Aucassin et Nicolette, and "by the sub-division of the work into diminutive chapters, each of which begins with the expression "Once upon a time"; and it is illustrated with a series of woodcuts, of designs in the manner of the Tosa school, which to our mind are in no sense an advance upon the art of Riōkin. In the next example, the Hōgen Monogatari (1626), a romance in three volumes, the cuts have been rudely coloured by hand, like those in an old English chapbook. It, too, is contained in Case A, where are some half a dozen specimens more—some of the work of the Moronobus—of illustrated books published between 1649 and 1700 (Nos. 253-260), about which time the artist Idzumiya Gonshirō is believed to have started chromo-xylography, and in which year, accordingly, we return to the wall. The earliest known piece of colour-printing is, according to one expert, a portrait of the actor Ichikawa Danjiuro—"the histrionic ancestor of the present leader of the Tokyo stage" —which was published in 1695. This opinion Mr. Anderson refrains from endorsing; but remarks of the work in question that "it appears at any rate to have been among the earliest of the 'single sheet' pictures known as Yédo-Yé." He notes, too, that the date assigned to it is "considerably posterior to that of the chiaroscuro engravings of Ugo da Carpi and Lucas Cranach," to say nothing of the colour prints of Peter Schoeffer, and he goes on to date the beginnings of artistic chromo-xylography, "as demonstrated from existing specimens," from the last year of the eighteenth century aforesaid, when "single-sheet" pictures began to be printed from three blocks—"in black, pale green or blue, and pale pink"—from the designs of Kiyonobu—the immortal founder of the Theatrical School, the fons et origo of those innumerable portraits of actors and scenes of theatres which constitute a whole division of the popular art of Japan—his pupil Kiyomasu, and the excellent Okumura Masonobu. Examples of both the masters last named occur at the very outset of the exhibition (Nos. 4 and 5 in the Catalogue), the former contributing a ferocious portrait of the pirate Kokusenya and the latter a picture of a girl with a battledore. Both are good enough specimens of popular art, and both are dated "Kioto, about 1700"; but both are hand-coloured, so that the representation of chromo-xylography only begins with the sixth number. This, a "Scene of Theatre," in three colours ("Kioto, about 1700"), is the work of the aboriginal Kiyonobu—that Kiyonobu to whom our own illustrious Skelt, and all the great inventors of penny plain and twopence coloured, are as moonlight unto sunlight, or as Mr. O'Brien in Parliament is to Mr. O'Brien in United Ireland. It is a pleasant work, and it is the only thing of the kind by which the eminent old master is represented. He appears again in the collection, it is true (Case B, No. 532), as the artist of a novelette contributed by Mr. Ernest Satow; but one would have liked, had it been possible, to have seen a few more of his broadsheets, a larger selection of his theatrical portraits. It is evident, however, that such specimens of chromo-xylography as may with any confidence be dated "Kioto, about 1700," are rarissimes; for this one example of Torii Kiyonobu (who bequeathed his example to innumerable pupils, and his first name to not a few), and a group of female portraits, signed Masonobu, are all that even Mr. Anderson has to show.

It was some twenty years ere a fourth block was added to the three of Kiyonobu and his followers. The author of this innovation was one Nishimura Shigénaga (of whom Mr. Anderson presents at least two specimens); and from him the art, as arts will, went on, and prospered. It was a popular business, first and last. Its subjects were the actors, the wrestlers, the courtesans known and admired of the mob; it was excessively cheap, for the designers (unlike the common, or garden, Academician) produced for so little that Hokusai himself, working in later years, and when the Popular School had become a recognized expression of Japanese art, is suspected to have never earned much more than a dollar a day, while the engravers made still less; and so it had the eye of everybody with a fraction of a farthing to spend; it dealt with plays and scandals and amusement pure and simple, for it touched, in the work of Hanabusa Itchō and Miyagawa Chōshun, on humour and humorous invention—on the caricature of private conduct and (to some extent and in a certain measure) of public morality. It was, in brief, a gutter art—the stock-in-trade of the Catnaches and the Fortys of Yeddo and Tokyo, the staff of life of the "flying-stationers" and "patter coves" of a race that took its satire, its entertainment, its scandal, its heroics not in ballads and "last dying speeches and confessions," but plastically, by means of pictures; and, though the cultured classes, the "Æsthetics," the aristocratic and literary public, of the period looked down upon it, it flourished and grew until now, years after the event, it has come to be better regarded than the classic and respectable art which was its superior. The example of Kionobu and "the mighty Moronobu" bore the finest fruit that can be imagined. The number of blocks increased to five, and six, and seven; and the art was exampled in the work of such men as whole generations of Toriis, Hishigawas, Katsugawas, Utagawas, and all the rest of them, until it attained, for the third or fourth time, a sort of culmination in the work of Hokusai. At this master it will be convenient to bring our survey to an end. For us the hero of Mr. Anderson's first wall is the bold, the ingenious, the accomplished and original Utagawa Toyokuni (1769-1825). This distinguished and individual artist is better represented, perhaps, in the present collection than anybody but Hokusai. In his hands Japanese chromo-xylography attains what is to us its nearest approach to perfection. He could be on occasion the richest and the most personal of colourists, and he could be on occasion the most delicate and refined. He excelled in all the branches of his art; and, as we think, he is the true hero of Mr. Anderson's exhibition.

Hokusai is, all the same, superbly represented. He does not shine on the walls—that is to say, he does not excel as an artist in chromo-xylography. But he shows to immense advantage in the cases, where he appears as the artist of (among other things) an impression of the Mangwā, that is so clear, so delicate, so exquisite in a word, as to fairly make one's mouth water. The artistic, the sensual, interest of the exhibition appears to us (it is proper to add) to be exhausted with the left wall, which contains the work of the Old Masters of Japanese gutter-art. At the end of the room is Hokusai, and on the right are the artists of the present century—the landscapist Hiroshigé, the theatrical artist Gototai Kunisada, the Kuniyoshis, the Keisais, the Yoshikunis and Shigéharus and Ashiyukis, and others. But (apart from the cases) the left wall is the exhibition. Its decorative quality (to say no more) is singularly fine. As compared with its opposite, it is as advance to retreat, as the achievement of a culmination to a consummation of decay.

THE NATIONAL TRAINING SCHOOL FOR COOKERY.

THE important meeting held through the kindness of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts in Stratton Street on Wednesday afternoon last, and presided over by the Duke of Beaufort, has served the purpose of once more attracting attention to that most useful institution—the National Training School for Cookery. For some years it has modestly progressed under the energetic auspices of Mrs. Clarke, the Lady Superintendent, in a temporary iron structure, situated in an out-of-the-way corner between the India Museum and what might be described as the ruins of the Indian and Colonial Exhibition. There can be no doubt that its sphere of usefulness would have been greatly increased had the School been erected in a more prominent position, but it has nevertheless survived not a few misfortunes, and is at last, we are glad to hear, on a fair way towards prosperity. It has now been decided that the School shall be incorporated as a Company under the Joint Stock Acts, and transferred to a commodious building in the Buckingham Palace Road, to be built, after the designs of Mr. Purdon Clarke, on land which the Duke of Westminster has granted at a peppercorn rent. Sir Philip Cunliffe-Owen, at a preliminary meeting on Tuesday, in the course of an interesting speech, recalled some remarks made to him by the late M. Gambetta, who, as many will remember, came to England some years ago, and studied with a good deal of attention certain of our social problems, with a view possibly of comparing them with several of burning interest in his own country. He thought, he said, that our poor would be much better off if their womankind knew more about the rudiments of cookery. He was, like many other foreigners, surprised at the waste which goes on with us and at our general ignorance of the many succulent and wholesome dishes which can be made out of material which, unfortunately, and doubtless through prejudice and ignorance, our poor despise. The National School for Cookery is intended not only to teach cooking to young women who wish to enter service as competent "culinary artists," but also to women of every class who desire, in order to become better housewives, to know something of how to prepare food for family use. French and German women are, as a rule, acknowledged to be better housewives than English. They take a greater interest in domestic concerns. They waste nothing, and yet as a people they live better than we do, and, spending less, are able to put by their hard-earned savings with greater facility and less hard self-sacrifice. On the other hand, it seems to us that their domestic education is purely traditional and handed down from mother to daughter, and not taught in schools at all; for we do not know of the existence of any School of Cookery in Paris or elsewhere in France which corresponds to the one now flourishing in London. It is hoped, however, that the remarkable work which has been effected in five short years by the South Kensington School, once it is transferred to its new quarters, will extend its sphere of usefulness. It will then be placed in a thickly-populated neighbourhood, and it is proposed that a restaurant shall be opened in connexion with the school, which will not only increase the funds, but also help to dispose of the food cooked on the premises by the pupils.

It is, moreover, even suggested that branch schools and restaurants shall eventually be established in the poorer neighbourhoods of Central and East London, which will supply cheap and wholesome meals, such as were to be obtained at the South Kensington Exhibitions, and also include classes where working-women in their spare hours can receive instruction in a branch of education which Lord Granville on Wednesday declared to be one of the most important, "not only for the gratification, but for the health of mankind." That the spreading of the operations of Schools of Cookery will effect a great and beneficial change in the habits of Englishwomen is not to be doubted, and we may here recall the fact that the Scotch, a proverbially unimpressionable people, owe to the influence exerted by Mary Stuart and the French Court, during her few years of popularity, the introduction of their now indispensable and most wholesome broths and soups, a kind of food English working people are now beginning to appreciate. We can therefore, when we consider this curious historical fact, hope that the influence of the School of Cookery, when it becomes more general, will change the backward and inartistic manner in which the great bulk of the English women prepare their food. The Baroness Burdett-Coutts, in a few clever and kindly words at the close of the meeting, remarked "that hitherto man was looked upon merely as an eating animal," but she "hoped that the School of Cookery would lead to his becoming also a cooking animal," and she considered the mission of his conversion to this higher state to be one of the main objects of Mrs. Clarke's perseverance and courage as Lady Superintendent. For our part we think that, if Mrs. Clarke will extend her operations to increasing the number of good cooks—a sadly small one at present—she will deserve a lasting monument to her fame. The future of the National Training School of Cookery will be watched with interest, not wholly unmixed with a certain selfish feeling, as Sir Philip Owen very justly remarked, for few are the men who love not a well-cooked dinner. Many a home would certainly be the happier in every class of the community if its mistress had included among her accomplishments a thorough knowledge of the art of cooking.

WITH A DIFFERENCE.

Sir William Harcourt at the Eighty Club.]

"I WEAR the self-same uniform,"
Said he, amid applausive thunder,
From all, save one, who through the storm
Sat mute, a type of speechless wonder.

Entranced he let the cheering pass,
He added nothing to the babel,
He clinked no fork against his glass,
He rapped no fruit-knife on the table.

Intently as the "masher" plies
O'er all the stage his double-barrel,
That Eightyer mute had fixed his eyes
Upon his honoured guest's apparel.

"He says it, and it must be true,
No falsehoods here are ever uttered,
And if that uniform were new
He would not say 'twas old," he muttered.

"And I, no doubt, am wrong, because,
Besides the tricks my memory plays me,
My eyesight isn't what it was,
And now and then, I own, betrays me.

"And yet—and yet—I look again,
And my conviction is not shaken;
No! I was right. In vain, in vain
I try to think myself mistaken.

"I was not wrong. No! I'll be shot
If I—that is, I don't mind swearing
That H-rc-rt's uniform is not
The one I used to see him wearing."

The feast was o'er; the puzzled guest
Had sought his couch and tried to slumber;
But vainly strives that brain to rest
That unsolved mysteries encumber.

Could he have been deceived that night?
Could memory have devised such treason?
Must he lament his failing sight?
Nay, must he tremble for his reason?

Or, worst of all, where all was bad,
And scarce with sanity consistent,
Must he conclude that H-rc-t had Told—well—affirmed the non-existent?

What he! the flower of knighthood—he,
The mirror and the mould of honour
For all that noble companie,
From stern P-rn-ll to bowld O'C-nn-r?

Gladstonian chivalry's fine fleur,
Whom for a Bayard his great heart meant,
Hero reproachless and sans peur
(Since he has left the Home Department),

He, whom the Club its standard made
Of moral and of mental stature?
"No! that indeed," the Eightyer said,
"Would shake my faith in human nature."

Yet still the dark suspicion lurked,
And with the growing dawn grew stronger;
Upon the Eightyer's mind it worked,
Till he could bear his doubts no longer.

He sprang from bed at half-past eight,
Huddled in haste his morning suit on;
Hailed a fleet hansom at his gate,
And hurried to the street of Bruton.

"Admit me to Sir William's room!
I bring him news of gravest presage;
Express from Derby I have come,
Charged with a most important message."

A footman waved him up the stair;
He followed where that menial beckoned (Which footman 'twas he's not aware,
But rather thinks it was the Second *).

He bounded to the upper floor,
Into the bedroom he was rushing,
When lo! a youth appeared, who bore
The statesman's coat downstairs for brushing.

The very coat! "Good heavens!" he cried;
Then, as amazement put to rout words,
He seized it, scanned its outer side,
And swiftly turned it inside outwards.

"Of course! It is the simplest case,
One glance suffices to declare it,
There!" (pointing to its outward face)
"'Twas that side out he used to wear it.

"I see! He spoke the truth last night
In what he said while we were dining;
'Twas the 'same uniform' all right,
Only I didn't know the lining."

REMINISCENCES OF WILLIAM ROGERS.†

IT is well that the Rector of Bishopsgate has allowed his Reminiscences to be given to the world, and the only matter of regret is that there are not more of them. It would be difficult to name any volume of the same moderate size which contains so much that is instructive, useful, and amusing, and which combines in so easy a manner the serious with the less important parts of what has been a very remarkable life. For the well-known incumbent of St. Botolph's is a man of no ordinary character, and his singular personality has left its impression strongly marked upon his public career of good and devoted work. Possessing a thoroughly genial temperament, free from all thought of self, and with a touch of that humour the want of which has been so great a deficiency in the mental constitution of so many eminent men, he has, single handed, and in the outset against strong opposition, taken a leading part in achieving an enormous improvement in the condition of the poor in London, and in the general advancement of the education of the middle and lower classes. It would not do to have everybody exactly like him, but there is ample room for many more like him if fortunately they were forthcoming, and the solid and steady ranks of those who are always standing on the old ways, and who view every proposal of change with dislike and suspicion, are never likely to be altogether found wanting, nor are they without their share of some use also in this world.

With a previous good middle-class pedigree, William Rogers was the son of a well-known and respected London police magistrate. He went to Eton in due time in the latter days of Keate, about whom and other masters there are some good stories, and he maintained a general good character and took a foremost place in the boats. A piece of unguarded exuberance of manner during the examination for a scholarship at Baliol almost had the effect of excluding the candidate from the college altogether; but, after some interest had been made and an ample apology had been tendered, the offence was condoned, and residence at Oxford was commenced. The love of boating which began at Eton was continued at Baliol, and Mr. Rogers took an active part in founding the Oxford University Boat Club, and in 1840 represented it in arranging the contest with Cambridge in that year. He pulled in the race over the old course from Westminster to Putney, and records with pride that forty years afterwards he presided at the annual dinner of the two University crews. After some time usefully and pleasantly spent on the Continent, and chiefly in Italy, there followed a period of residence as a member of the University of Durham, with a view to the acquisition of sufficient theological knowledge to qualify for ordination. Good anecdotes, easily and naturally introduced, abound to enliven the narrative, and there is now recorded a delightful saying of Dr. Waddington, the Dean of Durham, a dignitary of well-known gastronomic tastes, who modestly laid down an admirable canon. "I should hardly," he critically observed, "call myself an epicure, but what I object to is a dinner without a bird."

The first acquaintance with clerical duties was made upon the nomination of Blomfield, Bishop of London, who seems to have planted upon the Vicar of Fulham a supernumerary curate, whose exiguous stipend of 50*l.* a year was defrayed by the Bishop. The object was that more frequent week-day services should be held, and, as this was not one which fell in with the Vicar's own views, the relations of the young Curate with his immediate superior could not have been of the most cordial nature. There was, too, another source of difference—the Vicar hated the watermen on the river because they did not come to church, whereas the Curate kept a boat, and was on friendly terms with many of them. One of them, with mixed notions of sacred geography, once said to him, "Ah, sir, I often think of old Peter rowing on this 'ere water." A couple of years spent at Fulham ended in an appointment by the Bishop to the incumbency of St. Thomas Charterhouse, one of Dr. Blomfield's newly-made districts, with a population of 10,000 and an income of 150*l.* a year. The Vicar's dislikes to his Curate had prevailed, and although the Bishop told him that in two or three years something better would turn up, nothing of the kind happened during the eighteen years which followed his departure from Fulham. The new incumbency afforded an ample field for work. Its boundaries had been so arranged as to cut out all houses of a better description; it was even partially excluded by some blundering as to the mode of collecting the rates from ordinary police protection, and in consequence contained within itself a sort of Alsatia. It was not the home of any regular industries, but a place of refuge for all that was low and bad. The staple of the population were costermongers; and, as Mr. Rogers shortly puts it, "we were all ragamuffins." Such was the unpromising prospect that lay before the young and little-experienced pastor. There were no School Boards, no Bishop of London's Fund, no local assistance, and external sympathy and disposition to help in such a state of things can hardly be said at that time to have existed. All the bricks had to be made for the erection of a better parochial fabric, and they had to be made without straw. The grown-up people were not fit to go to church, and the only hope lay in getting to work upon the children, so as to improve the condition of the next generation. Energy and confidence were not wanting to cope with the emergency. With much difficulty a site and fairly sufficient school buildings were secured. But at first the new advantages thus offered were seized upon by the parents of a better class of children than those for whom they were intended. By a lucky chance the income of the church was increased; but, with all its charges upon it, the amount left available for the support of the incumbent himself was still a totally inadequate one.

Continued exertions and applications for aid succeeded so well that at the expiration of seven years of unremitting labour the foundation-stone was laid of a far larger and better school-building by the Marquess of Lansdowne, and Goswell Street saw an unwonted gathering of distinguished friends of the now much happier incumbent. There was a procession from the church to the scene of business, headed by the churchwardens and beadles, and the amusing touch is thrown in that "it is not wise to do anything of this kind without plenty of beadles." Next year the new schools were opened; but, after liberal contributions from many quarters, a debt of 1,000*l.* upon them was still due, which was, however, largely reduced by a second banquet at the "Albion," a place where festivity has so often been associated with benevolence; and, finally, a subscription among his own friends extinguished what was left of the intrepid founder's personal liabilities.

But much more remained to be effected. Mr. Rogers says that he never believed in ragged schools. The name was bad, and the suggestions involved were worse. If in a school for the lowest class the rags did not soon disappear, the school was missing its mark. To fill the gap which the ragged schools were intended to fill more schools were still wanted, and means were found for proceeding to erect them. Costermongria was again en fête; Mr. Gladstone laid the first stone, and five years after the last opening of new schools the Prince Consort came to open the Golden Lane Schools. To support them it was necessary to persevere in an indefatigable course of public dinners and appeals to raise funds. Good friends and assistants stuck to Mr. Rogers in his good work, and some offers of easier church preferment elsewhere were made to him. But, hard hit as he was in pocket, and worn as he was in mind and body by the hard struggle to which he had devoted himself, he preferred to abide by St. Thomas Charterhouse, and carry on his campaign there. At last, in 1863, the rectory of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, was accepted, and this offered a sphere of usefulness less arduous than the former one, but not without its own abundant claims. The historical account of his new parish given by Mr. Rogers is an extremely interesting one. He is the sixty-third rector, and has had many distinguished predecessors, including Lake, who was one of the Seven Bishops afterwards, and, refusing to take the oaths of allegiance to William and Mary, resigned the see of Chichester, and came back to die and be buried among his old parishioners. Curious extracts, too, are given from the old registers, in the days when they served as depositories of many facts that would otherwise have gone without any record, and which in common with others contain much information not to be found elsewhere. Some specimens are afforded also of items which occur in the churchwarden's accounts. In 1585 three shillings were paid to the sexton for keeping a child left in the church. Could this have been little Goody Two Shoes, whose adventures were, at least at one time, well known to the small readers of children's books? And, rather earlier, eighteenpence were expended upon a hook and chain for "the booke called Calvenus on Jobe." Great changes, however, have taken place and are still in progress. The great folks who formerly lived in Bishopsgate have long since moved westwards, and now very few of the better class of shopkeepers actually reside in their places of business. The old local industries also have fled for the most part, leaving a population of a lower class than that of the regular artisan, who overcrowd what living accommodation is still left after so much has disappeared to make room for railway requisitions, which must nevertheless be credited with clearing away many very unwholesome quarters. But good work is being done among a set of parishioners whose mixed and ever-changing character makes it more than usually difficult to make much permanent impression upon them.

At the Paris Exhibition of 1867 Mr. Rogers was Vice-President of the Jury in the Educational Section, and he tells an amusing story of how his official dignity enabled him to get invitations for some English ladies of his acquaintance to a grand Ministerial ball. In following years came visits to the United States, and to Russia and Austria, where Mr. Rogers was again a juror at the Exhibition in Vienna of 1873.

The account given of the general progress of popular education during the last thirty years is an excellent one, and no small part in it has been played by the Rector of Bishopsgate. He was a member of the Royal Commission appointed in 1858. In the result of their inquiries things came out rather better than had been expected, but it appeared that not more than one-fourth of the children of the poor were receiving a good education; and the private schools, as a rule, were especially bad. It is not now necessary to trace the history of what has since been done. But it is right to mention that Mr. Rogers was one of the representatives of the City of London in the first London School Board, and that he had a large share in promoting the establishment of middle class schools in the City. A separate chapter is devoted to the history of Edward Alleyn's foundation at Dulwich, and it is an exceedingly instructive one of early mistakes, expensive litigation, and a sad waste of the funds of the well-meaning founder, to be ultimately crowned by the successful application of them to something worthy of his best aspirations; and Mr. Rogers is now permanent Chairman of the present governing body of Dulwich College. The happy combination of the utile dulci which pervades this volume of Reminiscences is continued to the last in the chapter entitled "Past, Present, and Future," and the book may be closed with a lament that the author, as he tells us, has not produced all his best stories, but not without acknowledging the cogency of the reason humorously assigned for this, that if he had done so he might never be asked to dine out again.

THE curious social jumble so characteristic of Mr. Baring Gould's novels comes to a climax—if a jumble can come to a climax—in Richard Cable. He has accustomed us to heroes and heroines who belong to no definite class of society, and who regulate their behaviour by principles of their own. This naturally renders criticism more than ordinarily difficult, for it is impossible to apply the usual standards of manners and conduct to these singular beings, who live in a world of their own, and act as independently and as strangely as if they were an alien race, and lived in the moons of Jupiter. Josephine Cornellis, the heroine of Richard Cable, is a young person of this description. Her father is an ex-missionary, with hazy ideas of honour, who lives on the Essex coast, within reach of a weak and reprobate cousin, Squire Gotham, who has always passed as a bachelor, but has been secretly married in Scotland, and is in reality the parent of Richard Cable. Mr. Cornellis has made away with all his daughter's money, and is anxious to marry her to Captain Sellwood, the rector's son, a young man with expectations. Perverseness being the ruling principle of the handsome Miss Josephine, she declines to fall in with his views, and chance having thrown her in the way of a widower with seven daughters, Richard Cable, the Lightship-man, she soon makes up her mind to marry him. Mr. Baring Gould fails at the outset to furnish an adequate motive for this eccentric union. Girls have been known before now to insist on marrying their social inferiors; but then their excuse, so far as there can be any, is a strong passion. Josephine did not pretend even to herself that she had any motive of this kind. She was discontented and bored at home, and Cable's moralizings interested her, and led her to believe that in him she would find a guide on whom she could rely in every emergency. Add to this that Cable was a handsome man, and that there was a pleasure in outraging the feelings of her friends by persisting in keeping up his acquaintance, and you have all Josephine's reasons for becoming Mrs. Cable. On the bridegroom's side matters are even worse. He is described as a man of strong sense and principle, wholly without ambition, and bound up in his seven wearisome little children. He admires Josephine, and looks up to her; but, until they are safely married and have returned from their two months' yachting, there is not a particle of evidence that he cared for her in the least. The whole thing is as unreal and not half so amusing as the matrimonial complications of Miss Josephine Corcoran and Ralph Rackstraw. One would have thought that during a three months' engagement and a two months' cruise a wife would have had time to notice her husband's solecisms of speech or manners, and to remark the fact that he did not pronounce her name as she wished. She might even, not being wrapped in a blissful dream of love, have reflected a little on the future, and have possibly stooped to consider such details as his lack of proper clothes; but no! The disparity between them bursts upon her like a thunder-clap the first evening they are at home in the hall which Josephine has inherited, and she first worries him till he deliberately leaves her, which does not take long to come to pass, and then insists on a probation of many years as a mere working-woman till he takes her back again. The only redeeming quality about the book is the fresh and vivid descriptions of the Essex coast and the life among the fishermen there. All the rest is overdone; the endless moralizings and metaphors and comparisons—not always in the best taste—the devotion of Richard to his children, the penitence of Josephine. As regards feminine details, Mr. Baring Gould is even more unfortunate. Surely it seems unlikely that a lady should wear round her waist a leather belt that was long enough to lash her to the mast; and since the days of her namesake the Empress Josephine no wedding-dress could be carried about tied up in a blue pockethandkerchief, especially not a wedding-dress which, we are told, consisted of white satin and orange blossoms. It reads like one of the miracles performed in the story of the White Cat; but, then, in Mr. Baring Gould's books so many things besides wedding-dresses and pockethandkerchiefs shrink and expand in an arbitrary manner that it is absurd to lay stress on a detail so trifling.

His Cousin Betty is the history of a Miss Broughtonish family of four young people of good position who lived unchaperoned in a Dartmoor farm. There is a good deal of life and vigour in the description of their family devotion and jealousy of outside interference; and if Miss Peard had possessed the self-control to confine herself to one volume instead of three, she might have made a pleasant story. Unluckily, every incident is detailed at inordinate length, and is sometimes repeated till we are quite weary of it. Never was there a novel with so many illnesses, each of which is made to serve some special purpose. There is Leyburn, the hero's, illness—that is number one—which lays him up in the farm for some weeks till "his cousin Betty" has had time to get over her prejudice and fall wildly in love with him; there is the incident in Germany of Betty's hurt hand, which affords the opportunity of tender solicitude on the part of Leyburn; these is Leyburn's illness in London after their marriage, when Betty is away from him, and the object of this is to increase their estrangement by the loss of the letter in which he asks her to come back to nurse him; there is Betty's accident in the fire at Cowes, and her long prostration after, which serves to kindle Leyburn's smouldering affection for his wife; then there is another illness of Leyburn's in Burmah, when Leyburn goes to look after his brother-in-law, but the use of this is not so apparent; and, finally, there are the severe illnesses of two of the minor characters, Anning and Charteris. It is a matter of no importance, but interesting to the observer, that when married couples go into lodgings for their wedding tours, instead of to hotels, it is an invariable sign that they will be unhappy afterwards. Leyburn and Betty formed no exception to this rule, and there was no reason that they should; for she married him knowing that he was not in love with her, and he married her because his sister informed him he was bound to do it. Leyburn is a poor stick, who (emulating Mrs. Bouncer in Mr. Maddison Morton's immortal Box and Cox) is so foolish as to keep his sister's letter informing him of the state of Betty's affections for many months in the pocket of his coat, where, of course, she ultimately finds it. Betty herself is well drawn and attractive in all her many phases. It is a good touch to make her struggle to subdue her rampant individuality and become the conventionally correct woman that is Leyburn's ideal, with the result of depriving herself of all her charm. Mrs. Hume, too, is natural; and indeed Miss Peard has the art of making her characters live—Leyburn excepted—though she cannot write a long novel. One thing, however, it is necessary to point out, and that is the carelessness with which the proofs have been corrected. In vol. ii. p. 111, we are told that "Rex is as happy as a king on board the Britannia;" in vol. iii. p. 84, it is stated that Rex had just passed into the Britannia; Mr. Carlyon becomes Mr. Cadogan for some pages (vol. ii. p. 61), and the Lady Rosedeane of the first part of the book changes into Lady Rosewarne for the rest. Of course these little slips are unimportant in themselves; but, though it is not in everyone's power to write a good novel, it is the duty of every author to do all he can to avoid errors of his own making.

There is a considerable difficulty in the application of Mr. Colquhoun's title. Which of all the soldiers mentioned in the book is the person to whom reference is made? for not a single civilian except the murdered fakir appears in the pages, and he does not count. Most people would prefer to believe that Hodson of Hodson's Horse was the person meant, but, after mature reflection, they will probably come to the conclusion that the hero, Captain Digby, is the fortunate owner. The first two volumes are very dull indeed. There is the usual description of Indian life, with the beautiful women and the gallant soldiers. Some of both fall in love seriously, some only flirt, but all are very free and easy in their manners, and talk in the most vapid way. The discovery of hidden treasures by one Henry Wake, alias Brown, gives rise to some romantic adventures, and a good deal of promiscuous killing; but Mr. Colquhoun fails to interest his readers in the fate of his puppets. The third volume is rather more lively, as it deals with some episodes of the Mutiny, and the book may be found acceptable by old Indians who desire to recall episodes of their past years.

Margaret Dunmore will prove a mine of amusement to any well-regulated soul. It is the history of a scheme for enabling a large number of human beings to live together in what is called a Unitary Home (which has nothing to do with Unitarians), and to dispense with servants. Æstheticism and culture abound in every page, so do capital letters. The characters have a trick of alluding to themselves by their own names, which sounds odd, and of signing their correspondence in curious ways, such as "yours tenderly" and "yours heartily." The style is not always above reproach, and the metaphors do not invariably bear investigation. For instance, on p. 28 we read "the invalid had long accustomed herself to suck a few drops of comfort into her chequered life, from the belief" that a rich man would marry her daughter. But the daughter marries some one else, and goes to live in the Unitary Home, where she gives rise to the reflection that "The first year of married life is often dangerous to feminine nerves. The emotional state predominates; fluctuations from rapturous joy to moods of depression occur, and in view of the conjugal union, that has yet to be deepened, consolidated, this unstable equilibrium of the young wife is, to say the least, jeopardous." It will be seen that the Unitary Home is fond of long words, and, when convenient, does not hesitate to coin them for itself. Mere worldlings will probably sympathize with this young lady's husband, who very reluctantly consented to take up his abode in the Home, and was always trying to get his wife to himself; but it is needless to say that he is ultimately converted, and becomes as enthusiastic an Unitary-an as the foundress, Margaret Dunmore, herself. Space forbids our describing at length the rules of the Home, but it is only right to indicate a few of its aims. In the first place, it modestly "desires nothing less than the Happiness of all Mankind." It considers it wrong to receive interest for money, especially from the needy, although somehow everyone contrives to have an income derived from one source or another. It is anxious to train the sons of a lodging-house keeper in such a manner that they "should not disgrace an altruistic cultured society"; it has views of its own as to the Bible, and, while allowing that it has done good work in its time, perceives that "its teaching now is discordant, confusing, partly obsolete, and in no way harmonious with the revealed truths of a scientific age." It is almost superfluous to mention that temperance was the rule of the Home, and the "appalling revelation" (appalling indeed!) of the gentleman who related how, when a boy, he and the butler "together drained the wineglasses after every dinner-party" was hardly needed. We own to a little surprise at learning that such advanced thinkers disapprove of trained nurses; but were not altogether surprised to find that, in spite of the admirable regulations as to the changing of plates and the waiting at meals, the inmates of the Home had time to fall in love. One would need, however, to be an inmate oneself to appreciate the attitude taken by the wife towards her husband and too sympathetic friend. She goes away; what is more, she keeps away, in spite of the warnings of her brother, another inmate. And, when her husband at last comes to seek her, she offers to give him up if he loves her friend best; and, when he denies the fact, she informs him that they have the friend's feelings to consider as well as their own! Magnanimity (and contempt of the law) can go no further; but this is the only indication of the attitude of the inmates on this important question. As to many others that are satisfactorily disposed of, all those afflicted with Weltschmerz may read for themselves.

THE SUPPRESSION OF THE MONASTERIES.*

IT would be difficult to name any change that divides mediæval from modern England more sharply than the suppression of the monasteries. Its effects on religious, social, and political history have been abundantly discussed, and little more probably remains to be said about them. On the other hand, the suppression itself, the nature of the means by which it was effected, and the truth or falsehood of the charges brought against the monks have only lately been made the subjects of critical investigation. In the volume before us the Rev. F. A. Gasquet acknowledges the good work that has been done in this respect by Canon Dixon, and seeks to carry it further by treating "the suppression, not as an episode of a greater subject, but as an object of special inquiry." He has taken his facts from the best authorities, both in print and manuscript, and has worked them up into a well arranged and readable history. While he is naturally anxious to make out as good a case as possible for the monks, his work, as a whole, is decidedly trustworthy. His present volume, which goes down to the Act for the suppression of the smaller monasteries, opens with a general sketch of the condition of the Church of England in the early years of the sixteenth century, and of the causes that contributed to lower the tone of monastic life; for while he contends that the regular body had not to any considerable extent given way to gross faults and immoralities, he declares that "it would be affectation to suggest that it was altogether free from them." Before entering on the sweeping policy carried out by Henry VIII. and Thomas Cromwell, he points out the relation in which it stands to earlier measures of suppression and to the attacks made in Parliament on the wealth of the Church in the beginning of the preceding century. Wolsey's dealings with the Monasteries stand in the closest connexion with the subject of his work; and he has wisely devoted a chapter to the means by which the Cardinal obtained extraordinary visitatorial powers, the efforts he made to enforce a stricter observance of the religious life, his scheme for a wholesale suppression with a view to establishing more cathedral churches, and the suppressions he actually effected through the instrumentality of his agents, Allen and Cromwell. The King, who had thus, as Lord Herbert points out, derived "arguments and impressions" in favour of suppression from Wolsey, was brought into collision with part of the religious body by the conspiracy of the Maid of Kent. The attempt made here to represent Elizabeth Barton's utterances as supernatural is, of course, not worth consideration; it is a pity that it should be found in a book which is, as a whole, free from evidences of mere partisanship, and a still greater pity that no notice has been taken of the fact that, in addition to her former confessions, the Maid, when she was on the scaffold and had nothing to gain by the avowal, declared that her revelations had been feigned. A minute account is given of the persecution and dispersion of the Friars Observant, and of the more terrible sufferings inflicted on the Carthusians for refusing to acknowledge the Supremacy. The story, which has been told shortly by Mr. Froude, should be read here in detail. Henry was led to attack the monasteries by two considerations; they were the strongholds of papal authority in England, and they had wealth which he coveted. The first step in the attack was the visitation by Royal Commissioners. What sort of men these Commissioners were is well pointed out; the chief among them were Dr. Layton, a coarse and foul-minded man, who delighted in iniquity and delighted not in the truth; Legh, whose tyrannical insolence drew forth a complaint even from one of his fellows; Ap Rice, and, to quote Cranmer's words, that "stout and filthy prebendary," Dr. London. All of them were mere tools of Cromwell. The intention with which they were appointed, and the spirit in which they performed their work, are abundantly illustrated by their own letters; they were sent to find out evil that it might be an excuse for spoliation, to seize what plunder they could, and if possible to drive the monks to surrender their houses. When Layton was about to visit St. Mary's at York, he writes to his master that he "supposes to find" much evil disposition, "whereof, God willing, I shall certify you in my next letter." Of Bruton and Glastonbury, where even these inquisitors could find nothing amiss, they report that the brethren say that "they fain would offend if they might." They were furnished with Injunctions that could only have been intended to destroy all discipline, to render the monastic life intolerable, and to invite disobedience.

An admirable criticism is given of the proceedings in Parliament relating to the first Act of Suppression; the means that were taken to get a Parliament that would be thoroughly subservient to the King's will are fully explained, and good reason is shown for doubting whether the "Black book," about which many of our popular historians talk so glibly, ever had any existence. Whatever charges against the smaller houses may have been read before Parliament, it is evident that no attempt was made to examine them, and that the Act was passed on the King's "full declaration" of what he knew to be true from the reports of the visitors. In estimating the value of these comperta, or reports, a large allowance should be made for the characters of the men who wrote them, for their unconcealed desire to find out evil, and for the haste with which they went from one monastery to another, giving themselves no time for anything like a judicial investigation into the truth of the charges they greedily accepted and reported as statements of fact. Taking these things into consideration an historian would, in our opinion, be fully justified in demanding that all vague charges and all mere hearsay evidence should be set aside as practically worthless. This still leaves several specific accusations, generally received as embodying the results of inquiries made by the visitors personally, and in each case on the spot. Some of the most famous of these accusations have been carefully examined by Mr. Gasquet. He considers that Layton's report that the Prior of Maiden Bradley—which, by the way, is in Wiltshire, not in Somerset—had six children, "his sons tall men waiting on him," is "disposed of by the fact that he was pensioned by the advice of the Chancellor and Court of Augmentation; and subsequently became rector of Shipton Moyne in Gloucestershire." We fail to see that this proves anything more than that he had good friends. Nor can we agree with the treatment of another famous case, that of the Abbot of Langdon, in Kent. Layton could scarcely have invented the details he gives in his letter, which is partly copied by Mr. Froude from Wright's Suppression of the Monasteries (Camden Society); for he says that the followers of one of Cromwell's men saw what he did, and wondered "what felow I was . . . for I was unknowyn ther of al men"; and he certainly must have caught a woman in the abbey, for he tells Cromwell that he had sent her to the Mayor of Dover to be locked up, and he would not have dared to say this if he had not done so. Mr. Gasquet, however, discredits the story—first, because Layton does not refer to it in another letter written the same day, though there was surely no need for him to repeat the account of his exploit; and, secondly, because the Abbot was granted a pension, which, as we have already said in the case of the Prior of Maiden Bradley, by no means necessarily implies that he deserved one. "Accepting, however, the story as true," we are told that all that it means is that "a woman was caught running away." Well, even so, she had no business to be in the abbey. Layton, it is further urged, is silent on "the main point; he does not even say that the woman ran out of the 'Abbotes logeyng.'" Here we are somewhat puzzled; for this is exactly what, in effect, Layton does say. He describes how he went alone to the Abbot's lodging and knocked at the door "nec vox nec sensus apparuit, saveyng thabottes litle doge that, within his dore faste lokked, bayede and barkede," how he forced the door open, and went about the house; "but for a conclusion" the abbot's "gentlewoman bestyrrede hir stumpes," and ran for it. And all possibility of doubt as to her having been discovered in the abbot's lodging is taken away by a subsequent and curious remark. Mr. Gasquet allows, as we have seen, that cases of immorality existed in some of the monasteries at this period, and it is certain that the smaller houses were, as he also points out, in a far worse condition as regards order and discipline than the larger. He gains nothing, therefore, by attempting to discredit reports in which the evidence against some abbot or convent is especially strong. In his proposal to show that the religious body in England was not infected with "anything like general immorality" at the time of the Suppression, he has an excellent case, and he has managed it so far with considerable judgment. We hope that he will take care not to weaken it by trying to prove too much. There is as yet little fault to be found with his work, and his book promises to be a most valuable contribution to ecclesiastical history.

CLASSICAL TRANSLATIONS AND SCHOOL BOOKS.*

MR. VERRALL'S version of the choral odes of the Œdipus Tyrannus cannot fairly be judged by the ordinary standards of translation. Writing to music, the author has been compelled to temper the sterner qualities of the classical scholar with the arts of the librettist, and often—as, for example, in the latter part of the chorus which closes the second act—to indulge in very free paraphrase, where his unfettered judgment would, beyond doubt, have preferred a closer rendering. In the choice of metre, too, he has, of course, not a free hand. These considerations being taken into account, Mr. Verrall has, on the whole, succeeded well in his task. A hearer who knows no Greek but understands the plot of the play can clearly follow the successive changes of thought and feeling expressed by the chorus, from the opening prayer for help and enlightenment to the final lament over the downfall of him who was once his country's saviour. And if the translation does not fully satisfy the classical scholar, it contains little to jar upon his ear. There is some loss of the Greek spirit, but this was perhaps inevitable. There are a few jingling rhymes, which savour of burlesque and would be better removed, such as this, in the opening chorus:—

What is thy boon to us?
Shall it come soon to us?

and even this is fairly outdone in the antistrophe:—

By your affinity,
Helpfullest trinity.

The opening lines, too, of the chorus which closes the third act suggest the muse of Dr. Watts rather than of Sophocles.

Mr. Conybeare's translation of the dialogue scarcely calls for detailed notice. It proceeds line for line; it is very close and scholarly, and, though the writer is not exactly a master of blank verse, his lines run, for the most part, smoothly enough. He is perhaps at his best in the scene between Œdipus and Tiresias.

Sir George Young's version of the same play cannot be called successful. His dialogue is more diffuse and less accurate than Mr. Conybeare's, and his lyrics, though closer to the original than Mr. Verrall's, are for the most part very weak. He has evidently taken the Elizabethan dramatists as his models, and we now and then catch far off echoes of their style which are not unpleasing. It is no doubt from the desire to conform to their usage that he goes out of his way to render passages of stichomuthia in broken lines, and occasionally introduces rhyming couplets and even triplets among his blank verse, as, for instance, in ll. 93-98. The translation, we are told in the preface, was finished in the year 1871, and its tardy appearance is due to the performance of the play at Cambridge last autumn. In the interval between its composition and publication much has been done for Sophocles in general, and for this play in particular, both in the way of commentary and of translation, and neither English scholarship nor English literature gains very much by the addition of what is no more than a literary exercise interesting mainly to its composer.

Mr. Glazebrook's Prometheus is an excellent school edition of the play, through which probably nine boys out of ten make their first acquaintance with Æschylus. Those who have seen Mr. Glazebrook's Medea will be prepared for the main features of his present work. The play is divided into acts and scenes, and a running analysis of the subject-matter accompanies the text. It seems to us that this part of the work is a little overdone. Boys who are fit to read Greek plays at all might surely be left to make out for themselves what the characters are talking about. However, this is a matter of opinion, and many teachers may be of Mr. Glazebrook's. The introduction deals with questions of metre, geography, and grammar, some of the excellent notes on particles being, if our memory serves us, reproduced from the Medea. The literary and dramatic aspect of the play is not neglected. Mr. Glazebrook is probably right in his view that the third play of the trilogy must have been devoted to vindicating the rightful sovereignty of Zeus. All that we know of the religious beliefs of Æschylus points to this, but now and then Mr. Glazebrook writes rather at random. On p. xii. he says:—"Zeus knew that, if his work was to be complete, the puny race of men must be destroyed and a higher created in its place." At p. xvi. we read:—"The ignorant zeal of Prometheus gives men imperfect boons which turn out to be evil; it is Zeus who, after all, is their true friend." This is what comes of attempting to give exactness and logical consistency to an ancient myth. The pages on metre are good. The idea of illustrating Greek choral metres by nursery rhymes is, of course, not new, but it is none the less useful; and the only complaint to be made here against Mr. Glazebrook is that he has mutilated some well-known rhymes to get the lines he wanted. The notes are short and thoroughly helpful, and attention is frequently drawn to phrases and constructions, not because they are rare, but because they are common, which is what fifth-form boys need. Altogether, despite some little faults of manner, this is by far the best school edition of the play with which we are acquainted.

Professor Seymour's edition of the first three books of the Iliad is intended for the use of American schoolboys. To the notes of the German edition on which it is based he has added a great deal of elementary matter, and there is a critical appendix. The notes are plentiful and correct, but sometimes rather too long: and, as a school edition, the work is not worthy of comparison with Mr. Monro's, for example. Another reason why the book is not likely to be adopted by English teachers is that, as in other volumes of the series to which it belongs, the notes are at the foot of the page.

Dr. Holden continues his labours on the Cyropædeia with his wonted thoroughness. Beside the commentary, there is a critical appendix and indices, one of grammar and subject-matter, the other of Greek words and phrases. Dr. Holden's commentary is equally good in history and in scholarship. His running analysis of the subject-matter is excellently done, and his study of Xenophon's style and language has been unusually thorough. If we may hint a fault, it is that, in an edition clearly not intended for fifth-form boys, we find rather too much help in simple passages. Even for boys it is hardly necessary to translate such words and phrases as ἀνθρώπινα and φεῦ τοῦ ἀνδρός.

Messrs. Rivington have lately set themselves to show that Latin and Greek texts for school use may be both cheap and good. We have already noticed their Cæsar, which they are now following up with Xenophon's Anabasis. Each book is bound separately, contains the text, excellently printed, with vocabulary and notes, and costs one shilling. In these days of lengthy commentary it is refreshing to find notes on the first book of the Anabasis contained within sixteen small pages, and yet, so far as we have tested them, passing over no difficulty which needs explanation. It is announced that the text alone may be bought for sixpence. It is a pity that the notes should not be added to this smaller edition, even at the cost of a few additional pence, for they are thoroughly workmanlike, and do credit to the modestly anonymous editor.

Mr. Sidgwick edits the Eumenides on lines which he has already made familiar to teachers. The introduction contains some account of the play, its plot, and other matters connected with it, and sufficient information on MSS. and editions. The chief variants and emendations are placed at the foot of the text. In editing the Eumenides—more perhaps than any other Greek play—it is difficult to keep the notes short; but Mr. Sidgwick has mastered the difficulty without stinting needful help, and he succeeds admirably where so many editors for schoolboys fail, in translation. In this edition, as in the publications of the Clarendon Press which follow, the text and notes are in separate volumes—a plan which has its advantages, not the least of them being that the pupil can have text and commentary open at once when preparing his translation lesson without having the assistance of the notes in form.

Mr. Merry's edition of the Knights is excellently fitted to the needs of sixth-form boys. The introduction deals with the historical situation, and gives a much needed caution as to accepting the character of Cleon from Aristophanes and Thucydides. It contains also a sketch of the plot. The notes leave no real difficulty obscure; they explain all such allusions as ordinary books of reference would not clear up, and they are commendably short. To say that Mr. Merry is not always happy in his suggestions for translating the puns and jingles of words in which Aristophanes is so rich, is merely to say that he has not achieved the impossible. The only thing lacking to the completeness of the edition is a scheme of the lyrical metres of the play.

Messrs. Abbott and Matheson have set themselves to edit in chronological order the speeches of Demosthenes against Philip. The present volume, the first, contains the first Philippic and the three Olynthiacs. The De Pace, the second and third Philippics, and De Chersoneso are to follow. The historical introduction, admirably written, goes back to the end of the Peloponnesian War, sketches rapidly the Corinthian war, the rise and decline of Thebes, and, rather more fully, the career of Philip to the taking of Olynthus. Each oration is carefully analysed, and the commentary deals with points of history and grammar in brief scholarly notes, in which a careful search has failed to disclose errors or omissions. Something might perhaps have been said about the literary aspect of the speeches, but in a school edition too little is better than too much.

In Mr. Snell's edition of the Epitaphius of Lysias we find rather too much of the editor. The two little volumes of which the work consists contain rather more than eighty pages. Of these the text only occupies twenty, and part even of this scanty space is taken up by a running analysis of the subject-matter. This is of itself almost enough to condemn a school edition, especially when it is considered that the oration is, on the whole, extremely easy. Mr. Snell's introduction, though far too long, is not uninteresting, and his notes are accurate, if sometimes superfluous.

Mr. Jerram's notes on the first Æneid are well suited to the needs of boys reading Virgil for the first time. For more advanced students the help given would be sometimes excessive. Historical references are rather too freely explained, and there is a little too much translation, in which, however, Mr. Jerram is often happy.

The Bucolics, by the same editor, is a good edition for the higher forms of public schools. Its most distinctive feature is the importance attached to the literary side of the commentator's task. The introduction contains a sketch of the history of pastoral poetry, and to the notes are appended passages from Calpurnius and Nemesianus, and extracts from Milton's beautiful Epitaphium Damonis. It was a happy idea thus to illustrate later Latin pastoral poetry, but why Shelley's Arethusa should have been added we cannot conceive. Throughout the notes Virgil's imitations of Theocritus, and the debts of Pope and other English poets to Virgil are duly recorded. Sufficient and not excessive help is given towards solving difficulties of grammar and interpretation, and the only fault which can be found with the book is that rather undue prominence is given to questions of etymology.

Mr. Maguire's notes, for the most part accurate enough, suffer from the prevalent vice of excessive length. They contain too much miscellaneous information on the Latin language and the history of the early Empire, and read as though they were intended to help rather ignorant persons through a pass examination. The student is constantly being admonished to distinguish between decōrā, decŏrā, and decorā; between nisi and nisi; cupidine and cupīdine, and so forth; often a long note is given where a reference to grammar or dictionary would be sufficient, and quite simple words and phrases are needlessly translated. The book cannot, therefore, be commended for school use, though it may possibly serve the purpose already suggested. What does Mr. Maguire mean by saying that a certain word "does not occur in Cicero, or any pre-Augustan writer; neither is it found in Cæsar"? Does he suppose that Cæsar was an Augustan or post-Augustan writer?

At the end of a long list of school editions, such a work as Mr. Nettleship's brings refreshment to the weary reader. The title is a little misleading, for the English passages, well chosen as they are, and ranging from Bacon to Thackeray, constitute only a small part of the value of the book. Other men might have made as good a choice. But very few could have written the introduction. This consists of three essays—one on Political and Social ideas as expressed in Latin; the second, on the range of Metaphor known to Latin writers; the third, on the historical development of Latin prose style. Of the three, the last is the most interesting, and, within its limits, the most complete. It traces the progress of style from Cato the Censor to Tacitus; specimens are given, and the essay is full of excellent criticism. Full justice is done to Livy, who was until lately, and perhaps still is, too little studied at the public schools. Mr. Nettleship rightly points out that he was the greatest master of the periodic style, and it might be added that he affords the best model for narrative prose. The first essay will perhaps be more practically useful to students. It is full of valuable information on the exact meaning and use of many words and phrases which even fairly good scholars often use incorrectly, and on the rendering of such abstract ideas as "duty," "conscience," "character," "passion," and the like. The chapter on Metaphor is shorter than either of the other two, but it is packed with useful information. The introduction ends with some "cautions as to orthography," which, like the rest of the work, ought to be of the highest value to men reading for classical honours.

THERE is not only a fashion in the collecting of miniatures, there is some real love of art itself behind the movement, a recognition of the beauty of workmanship shown in the enamels of Petitot and the water-colours of Cosway, a comprehension of the fact that, if Van Dyck was a master, so scarcely less, in his way, was Samuel Cooper; an interest in miniatures as "documents"—records of the social and political history of our fathers, and perhaps also an awakening to the existence of beautiful works of art executed by native English artists long before the time of Hogarth, when the English school is popularly supposed to have begun. This revived interest in miniatures has not been without public signs. We have had loan collections at South Kensington in 1865, at the Royal Academy in 1879, at the galleries of dealers in works of art in later years; and the want of a good book upon the subject for the use of students and collectors has been growing for some time. That some one or other would attempt to supply it has been a matter of certainty for many years; the only doubts were as to who would do it, and how and when it would be done. These doubts are dispelled now; it has been done by Mr. W. L. Propert, and done in a manner which cannot be said to fulfil the expectations either of the student or collector. Considered as a book, this History of Miniature Art is awkwardly constructed, being more like three books or booklets rolled into one; and a great part of the information which the different sections contain might very well be dispensed with, because it can be found in a more authoritative form elsewhere, or because it is not relevant to the main subject. The late Lord Beaconsfield is said to have described a certain person as one who, if he spoke of steam, would always begin with the tea-kettle; and Mr. Propert cannot write about modern miniature painters without beginning with the artistic efforts of palæolithic man. If he does not know where he ought to begin, still less does he know where to end; for, after finishing his history of miniature painters, he must needs go on with chapters on "La petite Sculpture," "Modelling in Wax," "Snuffboxes, &c.," and a short history of "Collectors and Collections," from the days of Verres to those of the late Mr. Bale.

Most of these later chapters are mere padding, and not very good "at that." For instance, in the chapter on "La petite Sculpture," which occupies but four pages, nearly two are occupied with the question whether Albert Dürer ever carved at all, and half of another with a description of two pieces of extraordinarily minute sculpture—a peach-stone carved by Properzia de Rossi "with the whole Passion of Jesus Christ, showing the Apostles, the fourteen Stations of the Cross, the executioners, and a crowd of people looking on"; and "the famous knife of Leo Pronner of Nuremberg," with its thirteen drawers in a handle four inches long, and their still more marvellous contents. Though the author finds room for these things in a work specially concerned with portrait art, he omits altogether in this chapter on "La petite Sculpture" any mention of the great medallists of Italy; and from the beginning to the end of the book there is not, as far as we are able to discover, any reference to coins, which may surely claim to be the first and the most continuous of all kinds of miniature portraits. The chapters on "Collectors and Collections," though amusing, as such chapters cannot fail to be with the assistance of a good pair of scissors and an adequate amount of paste, are not entirely to be trusted. We doubt whether Erasmus would certify to the text, or be satisfied with the translation of his compliment to Grolier. We give both exactly as they are presented by Mr. Propert:—"Erasmus wrote to Grolier in these terms:—'Non tu libris, sed tibi debent æternum per te apud posteros, memoriam habituri' ('You owe nothing to books, but books will give to you in the future an everlasting glory')."

Much of the same kind of faultiness marks the other parts of the book. The chapters on Missals and Illuminated Manuscripts need scarcely have gone back to early Greek and Roman manuscripts, and information as to "purple vellum" and Cufic inscriptions, the influence of Byzantium on religious art, about Giotto and Cimabue, Opus Anglicum and Gothic architecture, and a hundred other things and persons, is all useful matter in the wrong place. The only reason for such an elaborate introduction about the ancient arts of calligraphy and illumination is that the term miniature has been applied to the little paintings in missals and choir-books; but these "miniatures" have no more historical or artistic connexion with the "miniatures" of Hilliard and the Olivers than with the pictures of Raphael or Titian. Indeed, they have not nearly so much, except in the matters of size and medium; and of those matters Mr. Propert says little. Collectors of miniature portraits will regard this chapter as superfluous; while those who wish for information about the history of art in general and illumination in particular have no need to consult this book at all.

When we come to the chapter on "Miniature Art in England in the first half of the Sixteenth Century," we find ourselves treated to a life of Holbein, compiled from Wornum's book, from which we learn a good deal about the different biographers of the artist, of the origin of the title of the parish of St. Andrew Undershaft, and other irrelevant matters, and comparatively little about miniature art; but yet, if the parts of the book already mentioned had been of the same stamp, it would have been more satisfactory. The chapter at least contains some information about the miniatures ascribed to Holbein, and the reasons for doubting the authenticity of most of them. Here begins the best part of the book. From various sources Mr. Propert has collected a good deal of information about the principal miniature painters of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and has added to it a little by his own research. He has discovered the dates of the deaths of the two Olivers, has some suggestive remarks about the introduction of ivory as a foundation for miniature painting, sometimes recommends a new name like that of Andrew Plimer for admiration, and proclaims rightly the merits of another like Osias Humphrey, and when he speaks of the styles and merits of the different artists he shows knowledge and discrimination. But it is not often that he does this, and when he does it his words are too brief. Of the miniature painters from the days of Cosway to those of Ross his account is good as far as it goes; but it is far too summary, and, as one reads it and notes the gaps in the names and the slightness of the information, it is impossible not to regret that he did not reserve his force to strengthen this part of the book instead of expending so much uselessly elsewhere.

Mr. Propert has at once tried to do too much and too little. He dismissed as too great the task to be exhaustive, and yet he has extended his inquiries further than was necessary. Some one suggested to him that his book would not be complete without a dictionary, as exhaustive as possible, of the names of all miniaturists of every age and school. Perhaps this was not necessary; but Mr. Propert exaggerates the difficulties in the way of such a compilation when he calls them "stupendous," and adds that a lifetime would hardly suffice for its production. As a matter of fact this "stupendous" undertaking has already been begun by Mr. John Bradley, and the first volume (out of three) has already been published by Mr. Quaritch; and in this work, besides the names, a short biography is given of each artist. According to Mr. Propert, two lifetimes would almost be necessary to complete a work of this kind; but, strange to say, this is not the first book by Mr. Bradley involving much research, and we hope it is possible, if not probable, that it may not be the last. At least Mr. Propert might have given us a list of the miniature artists mentioned in his book arranged in something like chronological order, and we think a very little trouble would have sufficed to give a fairly complete list of the better artists of the English school who are known to have painted miniatures. They are very numerous, it is true, especially at the end of the last century and the beginning of this, and it would have been a dull piece of work, perhaps, but it would have been a useful one, and have added a permanent value to Mr. Propert's book. As it is, we fear that he has spent a great deal of time and labour in producing a volume the value of which will be entirely destroyed when somebody (as somebody surely will) treats the same subject in a more methodical and exhaustive manner.

And this is a pity, because so fresh a field is not often to be found nowadays as that in which Mr. Propert has thrust his ploughshare; it is a pity, also, because Mr. Propert appears to be in many ways well qualified and equipped to lead the way as the historian of miniature art. He has, in the first place, an undoubted love of his subject, he has not only love but knowledge of art, and may claim to be a connoisseur as well as a collector; he has also had the industry to gather a mass of material, and, so far as the mere historical part of it is concerned, he has shown some skill in arranging it; finally, he is a good critic, and both judgment and taste are manifest in the selection of his illustrations. Nevertheless he has lost the opportunity of producing what might have been a standard work on a new subject, and has given us instead what is only an amusing and pretty book, very fit for the drawing-room table, but of little use in a library.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL STUDIES IN GREECE.*

THIS handsome and prettily illustrated quarto volume contains three separate essays, the substance of which was originally published by Mr. Stillman in the Century Magazine, soon after a visit made to some of the most historically interesting of the Greek islands. The book is very pleasant to read, and, from its vividness of description and that fresh originality which comes from observation made at first hand, is a most agreeable change to the wearied student after toiling through masses of the dull, though perhaps learned, researches of the ordinary fireside archæologist. The first of these monographs deals with the subject of Ulysses's journey as set forth in the Odyssey, or rather with the latter part of it, which alone seems to come within the narrow limits of the poet's personal knowledge. Till the shipwrecked Ulysses is cast up almost lifeless on the shore of Scheria, the island of the Phæacian king Alcinous, his wanderings are, we think, wisely relegated by Mr. Stillman to the regions of pure romance. But with regard to the island of Scheria or Corcyra, the modern Corfu, and Ulysses's home, the small rocky isle of Ithaca, the author makes out a very good case for his theory of the topographical accuracy of the Odyssey in dealing with these places. There can be no reasonable doubt as to the correctness of the identification of the island of Corfu with the place where Ulysses was so kindly treated by Nausicaa and her royal father. Though the name Scheria is not mentioned by Virgil, yet the passage—Æn. iii. 291–293—is strong evidence to show that in the time of the Roman poet it was identified with the principal island on the coast of Epirus. Æneas speaks of the Phæacian citadel fading from sight as the Trojan ship approached the shores of Epirus and the city of Buthrotum, remains of which, partly Hellenic and partly Roman in date, still exist by the side of the great salt tarn now called Vutzindrò, about three miles inland, on the coast of Albania, just opposite Corfu. The island of Corfu is clearly visible from the ancient citadel of Buthrotum; but the Arx of the Phæacian king would naturally fade from the sight of a sailor some while before he had reached the mainland opposite.

With the island of Ithaca Mr. Stillman thinks that Homer was even more minutely acquainted. He gives good reasons for repudiating the modern traditional "Castle of Ulysses," which Dr. Schliemann so easily recognized as the Palace of Ulysses, with all its details, even down to the pigstyes of Eumæus and the very tree round which the nuptial couch of the hero and Penelope had been constructed. The fact is, as Mr. Stillman points out, that the masonry of this "Castle of Ulysses" is of the earliest form of so-called Cyclopean work, with rough polygonal masses of stone not unlike the famous walls of Tiryns, and therefore in all probability belongs to an even earlier age and race than that of the hero of the Odyssey. As a more probable site for the Homeric city of Ithaca, the author suggests the modern Port Polis—the name of which obviously records some pre-existing town—situated on the west side of the island. Though no remains of Hellenic buildings were to be discovered here, yet Mr. Stillman found clear evidence as to the existence, as early as before 600 B.C., of an important temple, dedicated jointly to Athene, Rhea, and Hera. This evidence was supplied by the fragment of an inscription of that date which catalogued the sacred vessels belonging to the triple temple. According to Professor Comparetti, of Florence, quoted by Mr. Stillman, this inscription treats of hidden treasure, the sacred vessels having been concealed in time of danger, and a record of their nature and number cut on stone, so that their existence might not be forgotten. It is, however, far more probable that this is simply one of the lists of temple property which appear to have been placed in all the sacred buildings of Greece, a new list being made out and verified at the end of the term of office of the ταμίαι or temple-wardens, in whose care the various precious objects were placed. Any one who concealed plate or other valuables would hardly be foolish enough to leave so conspicuous an announcement of the existence of the treasure for the benefit of the enemy who sacked the place. Mr. Stillman's discovery of the second half of this very interesting example of early epigraphy was specially fortunate, as the other—the previously known part—was by itself quite unintelligible, and the mist was rendered thicker by the misstatements as to its being of sepulchral character made by Dr. Schliemann in his Ithaca, Peloponnesus, and Troy, 1868. The illustration of the two fragments given by Mr. Stillman at page 39 shows that this is one of the earliest inscriptions, next to the Thera tombstones, which is now extant. The diagonally set square of the theta, and the almost Phœnician character of the E, are very remarkable.

An amusing example of historical continuity is recorded at page 47:—"As we were passing through one of the villages (in Ithaca) I heard one child calling to others to run to see the barbarians, οἱ βάρβαροι, (Várvari), just as the Greek children of ancient times would have called us—i.e. foreigners, people who spoke a strange language, a babble, unintelligible sounds like those of children."

In the second essay, on "The Odyssey; its Epoch and Geography," Mr. Stillman gives a very lively description of his voyages in a little cutter of twelve tons, hired, with its skipper and crew of two sailors, for the modest sum of 15*l.* a month. Any one who has sailed in a small boat through the Greek Archipelago will know that there are occasionally very exciting and even anxious moments in running from island to island. The rapidity with which a Greek sea gets up, when lashed by one of the not unfrequent squalls, appears sometimes almost miraculous. Happily Greek sailors are extremely skilful in their management of a small sailing boat, and there is usually less real danger than the landsman fancies—provided only that the tackle holds—a very serious proviso, considering the frequently frayed and rotten character of the sheets. Mr. Stillman came in for his full share of these risks and hardships, and it shows no ordinary amount of antiquarian enthusiasm on his part that he spent so long in exploring these very rarely visited islands. His description of Samè, once the principal city of the island of Cephalonia, is of special interest, and shows that it must be a place of very exceptional importance for the student of Greek antiquities:—"I know of no place where the ruins of all epochs are so well indicated as at Samè. The large fragment of wall of the best Hellenic time which runs down the slope of the eastern hill is one of the finest, if not the finest, I have ever seen. Its stones are perfectly hewn, and some of them are twelve to fourteen feet long, and the highest portion still standing is not less than twenty feet high. At other points are various examples of the Pelasgic, similar to that of Ulysses's Castle, but of better work. There are magnificent subterranean passages, one of which leads to the citadel on the easternmost hill." The very large extent of massive walls of fine polygonal masonry clearly shows that Samè must have been an important city long before the Dorian immigration; and the extensive series of remains of all dates down to the fourth century A.D. is evidence of power and prosperity continued through both the Hellenic and the Roman periods, giving altogether a range of probably more than fifteen centuries, a very remarkable length of time for any city to have kept up an unbroken existence.

In the last essay Mr. Stillman discusses the motive and probable provenance of the Aphrodite of Melos. His investigation into the place and manner of finding this most beautiful of Greek statues will be of much interest to all students of Greek art. So much that is purely mythical has already gathered round the story of the discovery of the Aphrodite in 1820, and its removal by some French sailors, that Mr. Stillman's careful sifting of the facts on the spot is a work of much value. The numerous illustrations in this monograph are of great interest; they include a collection of all the chief Aphrodite types, placed together for comparison, and also a valuable series showing all the possible and impossible motives for the complete figure that have ever been suggested. The conclusion which the author draws from his collected materials is that the so-called "Venus of Milo" is not a Venus at all, but a figure of Victory holding a shield, like the magnificent Græco-Roman bronze statue at Brescia; and certainly there is a great deal in the general poise of the figure and in the position of the fragmentary arms which makes this perhaps the most satisfactory of all possible restorations. Mr. Stillman's final suggestion, which has at least the merit of boldness and novelty, is only offered to the reader as a possible hypothesis—namely, that this is the statue of the wingless Victory or Athene-Nike which was enshrined in the beautiful little Ionic temple of Nike Apteros on the Athenian Acropolis, designed as an expression of the vain hope that Victory would never use her wings to fly away from Athens. However, whether we accept it or not, the theory is an interesting one, and well worth discussing. Mr. Stillman's illustrations of Greek scenery throughout the volume possess much artistic merit—especially those which are produced from his own sketches; and the whole book has a wider interest than that of purely antiquarian research.

MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE and Professor Morley, their general editor, have been wise in their generation, perhaps with that wisdom which comes by experience of the woes of others, an experience which even the most cynical philosopher will hardly pronounce to be the school of fools. They have got Sir George Young himself to collect and edit his uncle's prose, and have thus escaped the mishap which befell a selection of the verse not long ago. We are very glad to welcome the present collection, though we cannot help thinking that the first collected edition of Praed's prose might have taken a rather handsomer form. This is no reproach to publishers or editor, but to the public, of whose willingness to pay for a handsome book it may be presumed that persons of experience augured ill; on the other hand, we cannot but be glad to think that there is public enough for such a book to make a cheap edition pay. For we should not have considered Praed, at least in prose, exactly what is called a popular author. He has nothing, not even "The Best Bat in the School" or the admirable "My First Folly," quite so good in prose as "The Red Fisherman" and "My Own Araminta say 'No'" in verse. His interest as a prose writer is mainly what is called a coterie interest—the interest, that is to say, which attaches to work breathing the spirit of the class, never a very large one, which a certain style of education and a combined experience of books, society, and politics breed. Looked at from another point of view, it is purely and even rather reconditely critical, after a fashion which we shall expound a little later. Those who enjoy it enjoy it very much indeed; but we should not suppose that those who enjoy it would be very many. That, however, concerns us little. As to the presentation and preparation of the book few words will suffice. The general scheme of the Universal Library excluded annotation, which is a pity; for Praed is a decidedly allusive author, and his allusion is often to temporary and not generally known matter. But we think that a table of contents, which we cannot find, might have been afforded; and we are sure that the date and place of the appearance of each piece ought to have been added. Professor Morley and Sir George Young divide the task of introduction. The first contributes a few banalities and a few dates. Sir George Young's part is short and good; not biographical at all, but giving some account of the various periodicals from which his collection is drawn, and a page of summary criticism, which is sound and sensible, and certainly does not err in the direction of exaggerating Praed's merits. Only with one thing do we care to quarrel. "One could dispense, perhaps," says this truly wicked baronet, "with all his punning." Now Sir George Young may dispense with it if he likes, and can reconcile it with the duties of a nephew. For our parts, Aristophanes, Æschylus, Shakspeare, Swift, and Thackeray shall bear us out in loving a pun Proper note is also taken of the omissions, which seem justifiable enough. But we wish that Sir George had added what is of the greatest importance in the case of a periodical writer who never published a book—a complete list, as far as is known, of what Praed did write. Perhaps such apparatus is too much to expect in a shilling book; but then we have already hinted our belief that Praed was worthy of something more than a shilling book.

It is extremely important to remember the exact times and seasons when he began and finished writing, for these, as we shall see, condition to a great extent the literary interest of his work. His contributions to the Etonian did not begin till the autumn of 1820, and he died in 1839. But he wrote very little prose for the last five years of his life at least. At the time, therefore, of his beginning only the earliest and least characteristic numbers of Blackwood had appeared, and these for but a short time; the Essays of Elia were not collected; Macaulay and Thackeray -the former Praed's own contemporary and partner on Knight's Quarterly, the latter his junior by nearly ten years—had written nothing; the Noctes Ambrosianæ proper were not begun; and, though Hunt's and Hazlitt's essays had been produced for some years, they were not very widely known or in most cases collected. On the other hand, Praed practically ceased to write before Thackeray had written anything but the Snob and a few unpublished trifles. Any similarity, then, which may be noticed between him and his great contemporaries or immediate successors in miscellaneous writing (we might add to the former Peacock, between whom and Praed there are many resemblances, but none of whose most characteristic work Praed could possibly have seen when he began) is by no possibility to be taken as similarity of imitation. Yet, just as snatches and airs of his half-tender, half-humorous rhythms have been traced in the most serious poetry of the last and the present generation, so may we see the oddest flashes now of this writer, now of that, in his, for the most part, extremely juvenile and tentative work. Praed died so young, and, except for his two years of regular newspaper work on the Morning Post, had been so little in anything like regular harness, that it is almost impossible to know what he might have done if need or chance had exacted more regular work from him. As it is, he is full of those hints, those flashes and suggestions, which are often to be found in writers of more promise than performance. Nobody can read him without being perpetually reminded of Thackeray in prose, just as nobody can read him without being frequently reminded of Mr. Swinburne in verse. And, indeed, as Eton gave the latter a sort of hereditary right in him, so did Cambridge the former.

We have noted "The Best Bat in the School" and "My First Folly" as Praed's best pieces as wholes, and on something like a large scale. The first—the progress, not at all a rake's progress, of the Honourable Ernest Adolphus Volant, who has the happy foible of always possessing the best bat, the most beautiful waistcoat, the finest horse, the most admirably situated chambers, the prettiest wife, the most wonderful pineapples, and the most promising son and heir in the world—is a curiously vivid sketch, just long enough not to be wearisome, and not too short to be substantive. "My First Folly" is much more unequal. It begins with too long an introduction, and ends with a kind of harlequinade. But the central scene is delightful. The hero, a blasé gentleman, speaks to his introducer at a country ball:—

"I am bored, my dear Villars—positively bored! The light is bad and the music abominable; there is no spring in the boards and less in the conversation; it is a lovely moonlight night, and there is nothing worth looking at in the room."

I shook hands with my friend, bowed to three or four people, and was moving off. As I passed to the door I met two ladies in conversation. "Don't you dance any more, Margaret?" said one. "Oh no," replied the other, "I am bored, my dear Louisa—positively bored! The light is bad and the music abominable; there is no spring in the boards and less in the conversation; it is a lovely moonlight night, and there is nothing worth looking at in the room."

I never was distanced in a jest. I put on the look of a ten years' acquaintance and commenced parley. "Surely you are not going away yet! You have not danced with me, Margaret: it is impossible you can be so cruel!" The lady behaved with wonderful intrepidity. "She would allow me the honour—but I was very late; really I had not deserved it." And so we stood up together.

"Are you not very impertinent?"

"Very; but you are very handsome. Nay, you are not to be angry; it was a fair challenge and fairly received."

"And you will not even ask my pardon?"

"No! it is out of my way! I never do those things; it would embarrass me beyond measure. Pray let us accomplish an introduction: not altogether a usual one, but that matters little. Vyvyan Joyeuse—rather impertinent, and very fortunate—at your service."

"Margaret Orleans—very handsome, and rather foolish—at your service!"

Margaret danced like an angel. I knew she would. I could not conceive by what blindness I had passed four hours without being struck. We talked of all things that are, and a few beside. She was something of a botanist, so we began with flowers; a digression upon China roses carried us to China—the Mandarins with little brains, and the ladies with little feet—the Emperor—the Orphan of China—Voltaire—Zayre—criticism—Dr. Johnson—the Great Bear—the system of Copernicus—stars—ribbons—garters—the Order of the Bath—sea bathing—Dawlish—Sidmouth—Lord Sidmouth—Cicero—Rome—Italy—Altieri—Metastasio—fountains—groves—gardens; and so, as the dancing concluded, we contrived to end as we began, with Margaret Orleans and botany.

Margaret talked well on all subjects and wittily on many. I had expected to find nothing but a romping girl, somewhat amusing, and very vain. But I was out of my latitude in the first five minutes, and out of my senses in the next. She left the room very early, and I drove home, more astonished than I had been for many years.

But Vyvyan Joyeuse was an idiot and a coxcomb; he did not marry Margaret.

The note of coxcombry, it must be confessed, does occur in Praed's prose more than once; but it is fair to remember that all his work is the work of a young man, some of it of a mere boy, who from the first received notice which might have turned any one's head. It does not appear that it turned his, or that he ever fell into the dismal swamp that awaits clever boys who are not either very lucky or exceptionally wise as well as clever—the temptation to try things for which they are not fitted. Indeed, it might rather be said that he tried too little. Read "The Knight and the Knave" and remember who afterwards wrote "Rebecca and Rowena," remember the range of Praed's other works, so like the range of Thackeray, and ask whether the older man might not have been almost as great as the younger, who, be it remembered, only made his first uneffaceable mark at the same age at which Praed died. Read "The Union Club" and say whether Macaulay ever wrote anything quite so Macaulayish as the speech there. Or, if merely being like somebody else, even if the somebody came after, seem a poor recommendation, turn to "The Country Curate," a most remarkable sketch, which reads like a kind of quintessence of one of Mr. Anthony Trollope's best novels. Of course Praed was not wholly original. He had the essayists of the preceding century, whom in some mannerisms he perhaps followed rather too much; he had, as has been said, Hunt and Hazlitt and the earliest Blackwoods, to which last he quite honestly acknowledges indebtedness. But his own originality, not Shakspearian or vast, but distinct and unmistakable, appears even in these borrowings, and it appears still more in innumerable passages where the reader says "Let me see, what is that like?" And he finds that it almost always is like something after Praed, not before him. Part of him, of course, such as his specially Etonian touches and reminiscences, has an interest of subject only to a limited class of persons. Yet even there it is noticeable how he makes the handling interesting to others. Not seldom, it is to be feared, an Eton man's references to Eton, an Oxford man's references to Oxford, bore when they do not irritate those who have not "enjoyed" the respective "advantages." That is the fault of the writer or speaker, and it is never Praed's fault. In short, he is almost everywhere delightful, and there are not so many authors in the world of whom as much can be said. But we still cannot think why Sir George Young, who is evidently competent, does not bring out a complete and worthy library edition, with an adequate Life, to supersede the awkward and incomplete compilation of Derwent Coleridge.

THE PYTCHLEY HUNT.*

HUNT chronicles have rarely been written, or at any rate published, an omission which the general reader never dreams of regretting. Yet it would be difficult to imagine a more delightful sporting series than would be furnished by the records of every hunt in England, provided always they were written by such a chronicler as Mr. Nethercote. The volume under review is divided into three parts, the first dealing with the history of the Pytchley Hunt from its earliest commencement about the year 1750, when John George, Earl of Spencer, founded the Club at the Old Hall in the village of Pytchley, down to the end of Mr. George Payne's second Mastership in 1848. The next part contains short memoirs of the subsequent M.F.H.'s, while the third is devoted to the memoirs of prominent members of this great hunt during the last fifty years, Mr. Nethercote's own membership having extended over that period. As an illustration of the widespread notoriety and popularity of its subject, the book opens almost as a matter of course with a reference to Mr. Bright's celebrated lapse in prosody, when in a speech in the House of Commons he spoke of the "Pytchley" as the "Pitchley" Hunt, and to the roars of laughter with which his well-informed audience greeted the famous false quantity; it would be curious in these days to hear the error repeated, and to note how many of our present senators were aware of an unusual pronunciation. Be it said at once that throughout a history which teems with anecdote this story is nearly the only one at all worn-out or venerable from usage; even where the author quotes from such well-known writings as those of the "Druid," he somehow contrives to fasten upon excellent bits which have escaped constant repetition. It is an extraordinary experience for a man to have seen during his hunting career nineteen or twenty changes in the mastership of one country, yet such was the case with Mr. Nethercote, who was so thoroughly versed in his subject that he could not only recall the chief incidents of each of these brief reigns, but he was in a position to know all the circumstances attending the acceptance and resignation of office by this brisk succession of rulers. Want of money appears to have been in most cases the cause of their retirement, while high play in former days and agricultural depression latterly seem to be responsible for the impecuniosity; yet, when speaking of Lord Chesterfield, it is surely exaggeration to say that "the wave of ruin swept over fair Bretby and all its pleasant associations," and to assign this as the reason of the present peer bearing an "unpropertied title," the fact being that the fair estates were not long ago devised by will away from the title, and that the possessor of those estates has every reason to be satisfied with his inheritance of ruin. The great size also of the Pytchley country, necessitating its division into two parts, hunted formerly in the most scrupulous rotation, must have been a serious tax on the strength and constitution of any master. This drawback no longer exists, as, under the names of the North and The Pytchley, there are now two separate establishments managed independently of each other. That such arrangement is likely to be beneficial to the welfare of the Hunt seems proved by the fact that Mr. Herbert Langham, the present master of the Brixworth kennels, the head-quarters of The Pytchley par excellence, has already occupied his position for a longer time than any of his here recorded predecessors since 1818.

And what a muster-roll of sporting heroes it is! Lord Althorp, Sir Charles Knightley, Sir Bellingham Graham, Mr. John Chaworth Musters, Mr. Osbaldeston, Mr. George Payne, Lord Chesterfield, Lord Alford, Lord Hopetoun, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Cust, Lord Spencer, Colonel Anstruther Thomson, Mr. J. A. Craven, are amongst the best known of those who have swayed the fortunes of the Pytchley, and about each and all of them, of their horses, of their famous runs, and of their favourite pursuits and pastimes, Mr. Nethercote had something fresh and amusing to tell his readers. Digressive perhaps, but certainly never dull, is this marvellous miscellany of anecdote; nothing comes amiss so long as it has to do with an habitué of the Pytchley Hunt; and one of the most amusing bits in the book is the correspondence of a swindling deserter with the Rev. Loraine Smith, which is unique in its triumphant impudence. Equally novel and grotesque, but more directly appropriate to the author's theme, is his account of a pauper who, in receipt of outdoor relief, actually afforded himself the luxury of six or seven days' hunting (on horseback) during the mastership of Sir F. Goodricke. The "get-up," as well as the aspect and demeanour, of the steed bestridden by this rate-supported member of the field is described as being "strictly in accordance with his social, monetary position"; yet no one is likely to dispute the statement that to the Pytchley Hunt alone has such a spectacle been vouchsafed. Five-and-forty years ago the Guardians of the Brixworth Union were nothing if not sportsmen; but even they, after the poverty-stricken pair had put in an appearance at a meet seventeen miles from home, felt that the line must be drawn somewhere, "so the proposal of the Chairman of the Board that it should be drawn at hunting was carried nem. con."! Amongst the many masters who carried the horn during the fifty years of Mr. Nethercote's hunting career, three special favourites—to wit, Mr. George Payne, Colonel Anstruther Thomson, and Lord Spencer—roused in him an enthusiastic admiration; and of these three the "real love of his life" was evidently Mr. Payne, whose character has never been so well portrayed as here in these pages by the hand of one who thoroughly understood and appreciated every fibre of that bright, winning disposition. "For more than half a century," says Mr. Nethercote, "'George Payne' has been a name to conjure with, not only in Northamptonshire, but in the wide sporting world; and, now that he has passed away for ever, its magic seems to have lost but little of its power. . . . It would scarcely be going too far to say that no man ever possessed in the same degree a similar gift of making himself acceptable to all sorts of persons." Will any living man who was even slightly acquainted with "G. P." fail to recognize the accuracy of this description?

To Colonel Anstruther Thomson is perhaps awarded the palm as a sportsman and rider, though Lord Spencer runs him very close; but the former is thus credited with "part of the qualifications necessary to form an ideal M.F.H.":—"A knowledge of mankind, womankind, dogkind [why not horsekind also?], command of temper, graciousness of speech, and a thorough knowledge of how to say 'No,' coupled with a willingness to say 'Yes,' ample means, united to a good acquaintance with economic principles." These are indeed words of wisdom, though not very encouraging to any hesitating neophyte who may be pondering over a requisition to accept the responsibilities of mastership.

Colonel Thomson's great "Waterloo," run on February 2nd, 1866, is of course given in fullest detail, together with his personal feats of daring and endurance on that memorable day, which has perhaps never before been so faithfully described and impartially criticized. Ample tribute is also paid to Lord Spencer's abilities and zeal, as well as to the quality of the sport shown during his two terms of office as grand veneur in his native county; and, if his rule in the field was somewhat more despotic than would be tolerated by his present Irish admirers, even they will perchance admit that such severity might not be misapplied in the case of a Saxon, and especially of a Pytchley, crowd. It would be interesting to know if Lord Spencer is still of opinion that "Misrule" is a more appropriate name than "Home Rule" for his good grey mare by "Irish Statesman." Mr. Nethercote tells us that she was thus renamed by the original owner on his lordship declaring that "No 'Irish statesman' would have anything to do with Home Rule."

The third and concluding chapter of this delightful book contains more or less brief memoirs of some forty members, past or present, of the Pytchley Hunt, the longest notice, as might have been expected, being accorded to Major Whyte Melville, who was evidently an intimate friend of the writer. Amongst his numberless admirers Whyte Melville could have found no more appreciative biographer; one, moreover, who avoids a very common error when writing of the Pytchley Poet Laureate; for, while fully recognizing his adoration for horses, and his powers of describing their points either in prose or verse, our author is perfectly aware that Melville's own animals were usually of an inferior stamp; and that Lord Hopetoun was not far from the mark when he described them, as he once did in the hearing of the present reviewer, as "little, weak, violent animals that can't jump." It was no rabbit-hole, as here stated, which cost "poor George" his life; his horse caught his toe in a grass baulk traversing a ploughed field, and want of shoulders probably caused the short, sharp fall which ended a bright career. Amongst the hundreds of readers who will revel in the pages of this scarlet-and-white-clad volume, it may safely be predicted that not one will lay it down without a feeling of deep regret that Mr. Nethercote should not have lived to see its publication and to rejoice in its assured popularity.

"WRITE seriously when you write about serious things," says the Countess, in Le Monde où l'on s'ennuie. The Origin and Diffusion of Religion and Myth is a serious topic, and Herr Gruppe writes about it seriously. His first volume, the only volume yet published, contains more than seven hundred large and closely printed pages. The earnestness of the author, who was frequently tempted, he tells us, to lay down his pen at the prospect of his vast preliminary toils, is honourable and winning. He is learned and thorough in the good German style; he is also lucid. And yet, and yet, his long avenue, bordered, like the avenue at Branchidæ, by the statues of ancient priests, leads up, we fear, to nothing more solemn than a mare's-nest. Even if we are right, Herr Gruppe's book scarcely loses its value. Not his theories, but his array of facts, documents, and criticisms makes the worth of his book—a very great worth, which we heartily acknowledge. We have no rival here to Die Griechischen Culte und Mythen in thoroughness and erudition. Nor is it possible to say that Herr Gruppe's idea is demonstrably wrong, though it distinctly fails to approve itself to our judgment. We may call it fantastic, we may even deny its originality, we are certain that it is too exclusive; but to disprove an hypothesis in matter so remote and obscure is not possible.

Granting that man has the potentiality of worship and belief, how was it developed into actual life? How do the forms of faith, of ritual, and of myth come to resemble each other so closely among the most widely severed peoples? Now, as to the first question, the origin of religion, it is not within our power to give one cut-and-dried answer. The religious answer, that God has not at any time left Himself without a witness; that He has so fashioned men that they are constrained to feel after Him and find Him, cannot be dismissed as a mere superstitious theory. But, setting this aside, people will argue about the steps by which man was guided—or the illusions through which he encouraged himself—to feel after religion. When an inquirer has provided himself with his theory on that subject—his theory on the origins of religion—he will next solve to his own satisfaction the problem of the diffusion of religion. Did the impulses that make for faith, worship, and myth affect men similarly, wherever man existed? Or shall we say that the resemblances of creeds and rituals are to be accounted for by borrowing and transmission? Did man become religious and mythopoeic in one region, and were myths and religion thence transmitted all over the world?

To the latter question Herr Gruppe answers that religion arose in the East, in Asia, and reached the Indo-European peoples after the so-called Aryan dispersion, after they had divided into nations. The "Pro-ethnic" Indo-Europeans cannot be proved, he thinks, to have had any religion; they borrowed it after they reached the Ethnic stage. Religion was diffused from an Oriental centre. To the first question, What was the origin of religion, or of the illusion that begot religion? Herr Gruppe practically replies (though he does not quote the Master) in the mystic word of the Dive Bouteille:—

TRINC!

That there may be no mistake about the matter, we quote Herr Gruppe's own language:—

> Sie, welche bestimmt war, im Laufe der Jahrhunderte das Leben der grössten Culturvölker zu durchdringen, welche dereinst gleichsam das Leben des Menschen vervielfachen sollte, indem sie neben die concrete Welt eine viel wertvollere ideelle setzte, tritt uns in der ältesten Religionsquelle nicht allein in bescheidenen Anfängen entgegen, sondern zugleich praktisch bethätigt in einem Cultus, der mit den künftigen Aufgaben der Religion sehr wenig gemeinsam hatte. Der Cultusact war nicht etwa nur mit einem Gelage verbunden, sondern er war recht eigentlich ein Gelage: man verehrte die Götter, indem man sich berauschte, und der Genuss des Rauschtranks war die Andacht. Diese Art des Cultus musste aber in hohem Maasse förderlich auf die Verbreitung der ältesten Religion einwirken. Die neue Lehre forderte zwar ein Opfer für die Götter, aber diese kleine den Gläubigen auferlegte Entbehrung ward weit überwogen durch den Genuss, den die Religion nicht allein gestattete, sondern recht eigentlich veranlasste.

Drinking was the actual worship, and "this kind of worship must have been extremely serviceable in the propaganda of the earliest religion."

O Bouteille,
Pleine toute de mysteres
D'une oreille,
Je t'escoute; ne differes
Et le mot proferes,
Auquel pend mon cœur,
En la tant divine liqueur.

Our reason for denying complete originality to Herr Gruppe is now apparent. Maître François came before him. Moreover, among the many sources of the religious "illusion" Mr. Tylor had reckoned the visions begotten by various early narcotics and stimulants.

The objections to Herr Gruppe's hypothesis, as it is thrown down like a challenger's glove at the end of his first chapter, are too numerous and too obvious to be dwelt upon. If intoxication can beget religion, man might "get religion" wherever he could get drink. Now most rational beings have their own ways of getting drunk. It is highly probable, if not certain, that Indo-European man had plenty to drink before the "ethnic period." As Mr. Jevons says in the Classical Review, "the stimulant which, according to Herr Gruppe, called into exercise the latent capacity for religious illusion was long known to the pro-ethnic Indo-European, who yet, according to him, had no religion." Indeed, this part of the subject scarcely requires more notice.

The learning and the criticism of Herr Gruppe deserve closer attention. He is convinced that the myths and beliefs of widely scattered races are so much akin that they cannot have been separately evolved, that they must have been borrowed. On this topic every one must judge for himself. If anybody thinks it more likely that a polytheism resembling the polytheism of India, Greece, and Rome was carried to Mexico and Peru than that human beings in similar circumstances developed similar ideas, why, he has a right to his opinion. If he prefers to hold that Australians, Maoris, Dènè Hareskins, borrowed the story of the Deluge from Asiatic sources, his theory cannot be disproved. It is a mere case of balancing evidence. That Aztec ritual should resemble Egyptian ritual may be explained by transmission from Egypt, or may be explained by saying that Aztecs and Egyptians, having similar superstitions to express in action, expressed them in similar ways. It is certain that in times of active commerce, historical and even prehistoric, the Greeks, Phœnicians, Babylonians, Egyptians, borrowed from each other gods, rites, and myths; while the later Orphic poets were under Oriental influences. But we think this borrowing was infinitely more common in historic than in prehistoric times, when the Greeks were pueblo or village Greeks. We cannot agree with Herr Gruppe and Herodotus that the myths and mysteries of the mangled Dionysus were borrowed from those of Osiris. Are we to suppose that the mangled Ymir of Scandinavia and the mangled Dog of the remote Tinnehs are borrowed from Purusha, Dionysus, or Osiris? Possibly Herr Gruppe has a theory to account for the appearance of European Märchen among the Huarochiris; but these are points about which we may agree to differ.

Like every one else, Herr Gruppe, when he criticizes his predecessors, disposes of them readily, though he argues with perfect fairness and urbanity. We need not dally over his inspection of ancient theories of Mythology. It is a pity that he dismisses the Fathers of the Church so hastily; they had some excellent ideas. Mr. Max Müller is met with familiar weapons; the vast divergences of conjecture among the et, mologists are illustrated by copious examples. The Grimms and Mannhardt, an illustrious exponent and improver of their ideas, are criticized. To Mannhardt's mind—and we agree with him—most heroic myths which resemble popular Märchen are younger than some form of the Märchen, are the Märchen elaborated and woven into epic or into national legend. How can the heroes of Greek Saga or the Gods of Olympus have arisen out of such "somebodies as the characters of Märchen"? asks Herr Gruppe. Well, it is not argued that Odysseus, for example, was developed out of the nameless hero of a popular tale. What we say is that some tales were floating about, and that the name of a god or hero was also in the air, and in men's minds. The unattached adventures of the persons in the Märchen were then attributed to the popular god, or hero. Everyone knows that floating jests and anecdotes are always changing owners. Tales are told of Talleyrand, Napoleon, Sydney Smith, which are found in Greek collections of anecdotes, and which were old then. We do not say that Talleyrand was developed out of some person in Athenæus, or that General Jackson was developed out of Villon. But a tale or jest which was attributed to the old Greek or old Frenchman was later assigned to the modern Englishman or American. Does Herr Gruppe himself believe that none of the adventures of Odysseus in Homer were sporadically current before the name of Odysseus was heard of? Does he think that the tale of the hero who jumps inside the monster and kills him was first told of Heracles? The truth is that the Märchen are found scattered among many races who do not possess the heroic myth. The Märchen retain more archaic incidents than the myth. And when the Märchen is taken up into literature, as by Perrault, you can see the most archaic elements disappearing in the process. To be sure, it is certain that some myths have degenerated into Märchen—a fact illustrated in the folklore of modern Greece—and that there is a double process, a come-and go, the people borrowing from literature and literature borrowing from the people. But literature has borrowed most. The people, as Herr Gruppe says, cannot itself invent a story; some one individual must start it. But, when we say that a work is of popular origin, we mean that it came first from some unknown individual, not an artistic poet, but an inventor in the popular early stage of thought and style.

When he has settled Kuhn and Mr. Max Müller, Herr Gruppe tackles the ideas which have often been advocated in the Saturday Review. These ideas are that the wild, unseemly, and irrational element in the myths of civilized peoples is a legacy, preserved by religious conservatism, from times of savagery, times when barbarous men believed in magic, and took little or no distinction between themselves and all other things which they regarded as personal and animated beings. This means that men have advanced from a similar intellectual condition, unlike the "scientific attitude." Herr Gruppe replies that the likenesses among savages are negative, that they all do different things; some are polygamous, others monogamous, and so on. But who denied it? Savages are in very various conditions of culture; but all of them, from the Australian at the bottom to the Maori at the top, have certain similar conditions of thought, have ways and institutions in common which civilized man has abolished. We do not say that, because "Borough English" is common among the lower races, and because it is probably a result of polygamy, and because the preference for the youngest child in Märchen may be a relic of the institution, we do not therefore say that all savages are polygamous. We only say, when we find in Märchen the preference for the younger child among races known to be, or to have been, polygamous, or to have, or to have had, a form of Borough English, that there the institution may help to explain part of the Märchen. Custom is not, as Herr Gruppe seems to believe, the chief source of myth, in our opinion. But survivals of savage customs in civilized story raise a presumption in favour of the earlier existence of the custom in practice: while, again, some stories appear to have been invented to explain certain customs. Herr Gruppe rather boldly denies that a story can retain from earlier times ideas repugnant to people who hear it in later times. The narrators, he says, would modify it to suit their audience. Then did the horrors of Greek myth harmonize with the ideas of Pindar, Xenophanes, Plato? Of course they did not. And how could the narrators modify the story when the narrators were priests who set it forth, on solemn occasions, as the "sacred chapter" of a religious mystery? Does Herr Gruppe think that they would venture to expurgate myths which, as we know, greatly needed Bowdlerizing? The poets, Pindar and the dramatists, did modify the myths to make them harmonize with the ideas of their age. But the exhibitors of the Mysteries, and of the sacred xoana, could take no such liberties. When Herr Gruppe says German Märchen have been modified from their Indian or Arabic originals (p. 209), he first begs the question that the German Märchen are, as a rule, derived from India or Arabia; and, next, forgets that only the conservatism of children preserves Märchen. The conservatism of priests engaged in a holy and efficient ritual, like those who revealed the sacred chapters of Greece, must have been even stronger than the conservatism of children.

The later chapter of Herr Gruppe's vast work examines the sources of our knowledge of Indian, Egyptian, Phœnician, Babylonian, and Greek myths, and contains examples of actual processes of borrowing. It is invaluable to the student of religion, even if he thinks that the borrowing is chiefly late, and of historic times. Few will go all lengths with Herr Gruppe in theory, but all will thank him for his devoted industry and his rare lucidity. That his judgment is equal to his other gifts we cannot venture to say.

NEW PRINTS.

M. ALFRED STEVENS is a wit among painters, but he has done nothing better, either in colour or in words, than the picture in the Brussels Gallery called "La Bête à Bon Dieu," a fine and important etching of which has just been made by Mr. Phillip Zilcken of the Hague. It is a pleasantry, a "good thing," an agreeable epigram, from the first brush-stroke to the title.

M. Stevens excels in the representation of the modern woman; with parisine, that exquisite and taking essence, his art is impregnated; he is one of the few—the very few—true painters of society. One thinks of his men and women as Thackeray thought of those of Charles de Bernard—they are not the invention of a vigorous and brilliant ignoramus, but the studies from the life of an artist who is also a man of the world. The heroine of "La Bête à Bon Dieu" is not a lady who is received; she belongs to the demi-monde, indeed, and is rather inoffensive than respectable; but M. Stevens has painted her as carefully and well as he might a duchess. The type—that of the gentle, patient, amiable creature who is always bon enfant and bon camarade, and who in any crisis is certain to get the worst of the affair, and to endure it without grudge or complaint—has been studied with the intelligence of generosity, and is rendered with a singular charm; the accessories of a brilliant and conspicuous costume are represented with as it were an athletic ease. M. Stevens has what some one has called "le sentiment du chiffon," and he has contrived to make his sitter as attractive in her dress as she is pleasing in herself. In Mr. Zilcken's plate (London: Buck & Reid) the millinery is perhaps more successfully handled than the wearer. Mr. Zilcken's treatment of the modelling of the lady's face is indeed a trifle vague; the type has lost nothing in beauty, but it has suffered somewhat in character and force and art. On the other hand, the several textures are rendered with exemplary skill, the tone is excellent, the effect is charmingly decorative. The etching, indeed, is one to have and to hang. One might tire of it, no doubt; but from time to time one would always return to it with pleasure, and etchings of which this much can be said are nowadays not common.

The Œdipus Tyrannus of Sophocles (Cambridge: Macmillan & Bowes. 1888) is the name of a series of etchings by Mr. Robert Farren, illustrating the play as represented at Cambridge by members of the University in November, 1887. The plates are seven in number, and, if not of very high artistic quality, they are at least agreeably composed and executed with some taste and feeling. The costumes, too, are well rendered and the poses effective, although the outlines and the suggestions of modelling leave something to be desired in the way of exactitude and finesse. These faults become more apparent when tone and drawing are pushed pretty far, as in the etched portrait of Professor Villiers Stanford. Notwithstanding such faults the etchings are pleasant to look at, and form an interesting record of the costumes and mise en scène of the occasion.

SOME NEW MUSIC.

WE have received from Mr. Stanley Lucas several new songs by Mr. Charles Salaman, which, apart from their exceptional merit, are at the present moment particularly interesting, since their distinguished composer has just completed the sixtieth anniversary of his entrance into the musical profession which he has so conspicuously enriched by his talent. The most recently composed of these is "A Woman's Heart," a ballad arranged for the three registers of the female voice, and one of the most charming works which Mr. Salaman has composed since "I arise from dreams of thee." The melody is exceedingly pathetic, and, as might be expected, the accompaniment throughout masterly. "Love's Legacy" is also a delightful song, with excellent words by Mr. Malcolm C. Salaman. "Murmured Music," too, is a beautiful song, the words of which have been admirably selected to suit the music. "Late, Late, so Late" is a really noble setting of the quaint song of the Little Novice in Lord Tennyson's "Guinevere." It is altogether one of the most remarkable of Mr. C. Salaman's numerous and successful songs.

From Messrs. Ricordi & Co., of London and Milan, we have a number of excellent new Italian songs which are printed with that clearness of type which distinguishes the publications of this great Italian establishment, which has, moreover, the advantage of very rarely publishing inferior productions. There are several new songs by Signor Tosti—"Malia," for instance—which is in his usual well-known style, but very pretty; "Vieni," a charming little Barcarolle with a graceful flowing accompaniment, and "At the Convent Gate," already rapidly becoming popular in the concert-room. Five songs by the same composer, published together, include some of his most popular works, such, for instance, as "For Ever and for Ever" and "Help Me to Pray." Mr. J. Roeckel's "Two in a Garden" is so commonplace, and the words so insipid, that we are surprised that so usually successful a composer should have put his name to it. His "Lighthouse Pier" is, however, a very bright and spirited song. Very brilliant is Signor Luigi Arditi's vocal polka, "Fior di Margherita" (The Daisy), which Mlle. Valleria and Mlle. Nikita have already popularized. This last-named young lady has also lately introduced to the concert platform "Mia piccirella" from Gomez's opera Salvator Rosa, one of the most original and graceful songs published in a very long time. Miss Maude Valérie White's Hungarian gipsy song is very characteristic and effective. "Hidden Love," by the same lady, is a quaint Norwegian ballad, with a sad plaintive melody. Two of her pianoforte pieces, "Danse fantastique," somewhat in the style of Chopin, and "Pensée fugitive," have merit, and will be found excellent for advanced pupils. Messrs. Ricordi & Co. are now issuing in cheap book-form, under title of Eco di Napoli, a complete collection of those tuneful Neapolitan ballads which we have often thought would prove extremely popular if translated into English. The edition includes amongst other well-known celebri canzoni, "Te voglio bene assaje," "Santa Lucia," "La Carolina," and "Dimmi na vota si." The extremely pretty music by M. Jacobi, composed for the grand ballet Enchantment, now being performed with so much success at the Alhambra, has been arranged by him for the piano, and published by Messrs. C. Mahillon & Co. of Oxford Street. We can recommend to amateurs both the Waltz and the Minuet, which are delightfully quaint, and by no means difficult to play.

A well-written and excellent piece is a sonata in C Major, by Erskine Allon, published by the London Music Publishing Co. Mr. Edwin Ashdown sends us Five Romances for Violin and Piano, by Mr. G. A. Macfarren, which are capital school studies. A spirited march, "Homeward Bound," is by Mr. W. H. Renshaw. Mr. Albert D. Furse has made a melodious setting of Longfellow's well-known words, "Two Locks of Hair." "Earth's Parting," by J. C. Grieve, has considerable distinction. A nice little song is "My Gentle Swallow," by Mr. Erskine Allon; but we cannot say much for "A Mountain Nymph," by Mr. J. Henderson. It is very commonplace and uninteresting.

Signor Carlo Ducci's studies for the pianoforte always give evidence of great care having been bestowed on their composition. His latest works, "Tzigamesca," published by Mr. E. Ascherberg, a characteristic Hungarian piece, and "Due Melodie," both effective and elegant. "Beyond the Shadows" is the name of a new vocal romance by Signor Ducci, which displays good inspiration, but has not been worked out with that finish which we have a right to expect from so clever a composer.

We have also received one or two new pieces from Messrs. Weekes & Co., among them some favourite melodies for violin and piano progressively arranged by Mr. Frederic Weekes, evidently for teaching purposes; three useful organ pieces, by Cuthbert Nunn; and "Meditation," for the organ, by D. R. Munro, which should be popular as a church voluntary. "Sandringham," gavotte, by C. H. Marriott, is not an interesting addition to the long series of gavottes with which the music trade has been flooded of late; nor is Mr. E. Silas's Gavotte No. 8 of much greater merit. It is pretentious and confusing.

To be cordially recommended, especially for the use of schools, is the "Schletterer Album," which contains a great number of two-part songs by H. M. Schletterer, set to excellent words by A. J. Foxwell. This collection is published by Messrs. J. Curwen & Sons.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

WE had to notice not long ago a book of M. Ludovic Carrau's on La conscience. The title of that book, with the fact that he has also translated Professor Flint's principal work into French, will help to give the measure of his treatment of religious and irreligious philosophy, from Locke to the present day, in England (1). This treatment is full, and in many ways satisfactory, and we have very little fault to find with it. We should not ourselves, we own, have given a final chapter in a book which opens with the great names of Butler and Berkeley to an American person of the name of Abbot; but M. Carrau himself anticipates this objection, and parries it in his preface so good-humouredly that we cannot insist on it very obstinately. Another fault very common in authors of all kinds nowadays, and, to our thinking, a very bad fault, is sometimes a little noticeable in him. He seems more anxious to tell us what Professor Veitch thinks of what Mr. Mill thought of Sir William Hamilton than to tell us what Hamilton thought in the first instance, and though he more than once mentions Mansel, we find (it is true there is neither index nor detailed contents to help us) no account of the famous Bampton Lectures, which to some persons would seem the most considerable work of religious philosophy, strictly so called, which has been produced in England during the last half-century at least. Yet again, in common with all foreigners, he seems to think far too much (we do not mean too highly) of Mr. Herbert Spencer. But the book is a good book for all this.

The increased attention which has been paid of late years to what may be called the scientific aspect of the art of horsemanship is remarkable. For the present we only briefly mention M. Barroil's (2) contribution to these hippo-mathematics, as we may call them, we trust without flippancy, and we shall hope to return to them.

The number of the Artistes célèbres (3) devoted to Velasquez is somewhat bulkier than most of the series, and certainly no one will grudge its bulk. M. Paul Lefort has given a careful summary in his text, and the engravings are numerous. Ordinary woodcuts, however, especially on ordinary paper, cannot do justice to the qualities, and especially the texture, of the incomparable portraits to which the great Spaniard, though by no means only a portrait-painter, owes his fame. The etching-needle and copper can get a little nearer; but it is curious how Velasquez, whose special forte is in black, mocks those arts which deal in nothing but black and white. Reproduction suits such compositions as the capital "Réunion de gentilhommes," given here from the Louvre picture, better than his great single figures. Still, whatever its inevitable shortcomings, the book is a welcome collection of always delightful and admirable work.

People who like a salmagundy of personal reminiscences destitute alike of pretentiousness and spite, with miscellaneous anecdotes nearly always amusing, and with odds and ends of all sorts, cannot do better than read the Souvenirs (4) of the twin singers and reciters, MM. Lionnet. It is some time since we have met a pleassanter book of the peculiar kind, and we have never met one more void of offence—except here and there to very "fie-fie" persons indeed.

Among school books we have an edition (the second recently received) of part of Thierry's Récits mérovingiens (Hachette), by M. Testard, the notes of which, though weighted with the usual overflowings of Brachet, are in the main to the point and sensible; a selection of Florian's Fables, by Rev. C. Yeld (Macmillan), with a vocabulary, illustrations, notes, and exercises, the inevitable Brachet being confined to the introduction; and a Public Examination French Reader, by A. M. Bowers (Whittaker; G. Bell & Sons), giving a good collection of very miscellaneous pieces, marred only by the objectionable vocabulary. Mr. Bowers pleads for this that in hunting the dictionary "much valuable time is wasted." Let us distinguish. If the object is merely to get up a cram-knowledge that will pass public examinations, and then may be forgotten, perhaps it is; if the object is knowledge proper, then no time is better spent than that spent in dictionary-hunting.

M. Léon de Tinseau has gone much nearer in Charme rompu (5) to making good the promise of L'attelage de la marquise than in any of the books which, rather rapidly, have come between the two. The story is touching, and conducts itself not exactly as the reader expects. The heroine, separated from her husband for no fault of her own, loves and is loved by an artist who is also (at least in the author's intention) a perfect gentleman. How, partly by her fault this time, though not wholly, the "charm is broken" may be found out from the book, and shall not be revealed in detail here. If there is a drawback to the novel, it is to be found, first, in the fact that M. de Tinseau does not make Nadia Fresnel's momentary infatuation quite probable, and, secondly, in the fact that the hero seems to be left rather better off than he deserves, while the other heroine—the pattern of virtue and religion—accepts the reversion of her cousin's left-handed husband, in that cousin's lifetime, after a fashion which religion of the strictest kind hardly sanctions. But these things always depend on taste. La petite Marthe (6) rewards virtue and punishes vice much more unequivocally; and, as for the dreadful things which a tyrannic government did to la princesse Tarakanoff (7), are they not written in the chronicles of Danilewsky?

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

FOR the series of American "Men of Letters" Mr. John Bach McMaster has produced a biography of Franklin under the title Benjamin Franklin as a Man of Letters (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), a volume not without industrious research, and commendable for scrupulous adherence to the scheme of the series. It is not a little curious that so many memoirs exist of a man whose chief literary work is an Autobiography, which is one of the best of its class. Mr. McMaster has wisely devoted his energies to the literary work of Franklin, one of the most active pamphleteers in an age of pamphlets. Thus Franklin's ten years' sojourn in France and England, 1764 75, which, excepting the pamphlet provoked by the Hutchinson Letters, was not a productive literary period, is dealt with in some five-and-twenty pages. His political career is set forth within the reasonable limits necessary to the effective narration of the story of his prowess as a controversialist. Mr. McMaster's excellent account of the sources and growth of the "Poor Richard" publications suggests a field of research not yet completely gleaned by the historian of almanacs and their makers. Franklin's scriptural paraphrases with political applications are treated a little too seriously by Mr. McMaster, though he writes of Franklin's absolute insensibility to poetry and the graces of style in the only spirit possible to persons of taste and intelligence. Franklin's vulgarity was indeed ingrained and irrepressible. Here and there Mr. McMaster might with advantage have been more liberal with dates. An explanatory note, or date, seems wanting at page 92, where, after discussing Franklin's "Parable against Persecution" and another tract of the period, the biographer observes, "Each of these pieces was much admired, and the fame of them involved Franklin in a work that signally failed. Sir Francis Dashwood was then abridging the Book of Common Prayer" (with what object Mr. McMaster does not say). "Lord Le Despencer asked Franklin to help." In the following pages the narrative is continued:—"After 1740 Franklin almost ceased to contribute essays to the Gazette." The American reader may need the reminder that the barony of Le Despencer was merged in the earldom of Westmorland at this date, and Sir F. Dashwood became Lord Le Despencer in 1763. The conjunction of the two names without some indication of their relationship is confusing to the general reader. The strange vicissitudes of fate that attended Franklin's manuscripts after the author's death, which embraced the Autobiography itself, are treated at considerable length by Mr. McMaster. It was not until 1882 that the United States Government was induced to purchase for 35,000 dollars the collection of papers which had passed through many hands to be rejected by the British Museum and "a long succession of American Ministers in England." Mr. McMaster's estimate of Franklin's literary work is somewhat elusive, if not contradictory. After declaring Franklin to be the best imitator of Addison, with wit as keen and "style sometimes better," and the speech in the "Divorce of Algiers" to be unsurpassed by Arbuthnot and Swift, he finds it "impossible to place him with respect to Irving and Prescott" and the makers of American literature. "There is no common ground of comparison." If Franklin's early essays do not permit comparison with Washington Irving, it is hard to admit him of Addison's company.

Mr. and Mrs. Pennell's Our Sentimental Journey (Longmans & Co.) is a lively account of a cycling tour in France, along roads and through towns and hamlets immortalized by Sterne, the results of which ought to communicate much of the pleasures of the excursion to the discreet reader, even if Mr. Ruskin be not converted to the new progression of travellers. You may fairly measure the enjoyment of the trip by the joyous spirit of the voyagers' notes and the radiance and expansive force of Mr. Pennell's delightful drawings. These last are as full of character and suggestiveness of line as those on the Italian journey, and indeed comparable only with them. Some of the tiny landscapes in Picardy or the Bourbonnais possess a strange power of moving latent reminiscences; a little vignette of an ancient château, with its red-capped tourelle overhanging a stream, brings to the eye a pageantry of river and valley scenes at a mere glance. Despite its title, the book is a tribute to the fascination of Sterne in an oblique sense only. To be sure there is a letter dedicatory which might well astonish the thin shade of Lorry Slim. But the Letters to Dead Authors of Mr. Andrew Lang are properly held responsible for this.

The Apostle of the Indians of Guiana (Wells Gardner & Co.) is the rather compromising title of a readable memoir of the late Rev. W. H. Brett, compiled by the Rev. F. P. L. Josa. The book deals mainly with the labours of Mr. Brett during forty years' sojourn among the Caribs and other Indians of Guiana, who appear to have been as docile and amenable to civilization as the Caribs of the West Indian islands were in the old days of Spanish conquest. Certainly the results of Mr. Brett's able and energetic efforts are remarkable reading. At p. 35 there is a reference to the odd custom among the natives of flying to the woods and cutting down trees to impede the evil spirit of pestilence, though at p. 98 we read of the flight of Caribs from a fever-stricken place and the cutting down of trees "to stop others from coming among them."

Mr. Raphael Ledos de Beaufort has translated Prince Napoleon's recent work on Napoleon under the title Napoleon and his Detractors (Allen & Co.), to which he has prefixed a biographical sketch of the author which reflects a good deal of the enthusiasm of conviction.

Burke's Peerage and Baronetage (Harrison & Sons) makes due reference to Her Majesty's Jubilee in a prefatory article, indicating the various honours created in connexion with that celebration. These are sufficiently numerous to add considerably to both Peerage and Baronetage, while the lists of Knighthood, with the new Distinguished Service Order, show a notable augmentation. The work of revision appears in all respects to have been carried out with the thoroughness and accuracy of previous issues. From the obituary notices two peerages expired in 1887 by the decease, without issue, of Viscount Lyons and Lord Northwick; and five baronetcies have become extinct.

The new Debrett (Dean & Son)—the 175th—in accordance with its system of personal revision, benefits by the voluntary aid of more than thirty thousand correspondents interested in the completion and accuracy of this well-proved favourite. The Jubilee honours are computed at upwards of 420, a number that may naturally be said to be unprecedented. In addition to the Viscounty of Lyons and the Barony of Northwick, the Barony of Clermont (created in 1885 in the United Kingdom peerage) is recorded as extinct by the death of Lord Clermont, though the title is borne by Lord Carlingford, on whom the older Irish peerage devolved. The extinction of the United Kingdom peerage is, of course, recorded in Burke, but that authority does not reckon the Barony of Clermont among extinct peerages in its annals of the year.

The volume is a record of the highest type of exploring work. There is nothing trivial in the whole volume, and although it contains few incidents of adventure, every page abounds with interest. A MILLIONAIRE'S DA[illegible]TERS. By JOHN A. STEUART.
"There is a refreshing touch of originality about 'A Millionaire's Daughter,' and the account of Peter McGlashan's meeting with the devil is as laughable a thing in its way as anything we have read for a long time. The millionaire (an American)......buys a Scotch estate, and comes to reside on it with his two charming daughters. The volume reveals considerable power, and closes with a strong touch of tragedy."—G. BARNETT SMITH, in the Academy.
"The young ladies are drawn with a firm, true hand. So also is the purse proud, arrogant, yet indulgent father. There is a good deal of love-making, a sensational murder, plenty of lively, natural dialogue........Will be read with deep interest."—Dundee Advertiser.
"One of the most sprightly and readable of recent novels........The story is new, and fresh and interesting."—Cambrian.

THE DEPTFORD ELECTION.

FEW recent elections have excited more interest than that at Deptford, and probably the result of none has been awaited with less sanguine feelings by Unionists. Except goodness of cause, Mr. BLUNT had almost everything on his side. The normal strength of the Radical party in Deptford was shown by the large minorities which such an absolutely ridiculous candidate as Mr. GHOSE was able to show against an antagonist of unusual local strength. "How many will Mr. EVELYN take over with him?" was the question asked, not without anxiety, by those best acquainted with the facts. It is the general experience that when a popular local member changes sides, he carries, at any rate for a time, the constituency with him; and though Mr. EVELYN, having more grace than Mr. BUCHANAN at Edinburgh, did not present himself to obtain as a Black those suffrages which but a few months ago he asked as a White, Mr. BLUNT was in many respects his alter ego. The imprisonment of the Gladstonian candidate gave him at least three advantages. It created a sentimental interest in him among one class, a fellow-feeling among another, and it prevented him from doing or saying any of the silly things which, from his past history, he pretty certainly would have done or said had he been present. The two great engines of the Irish Nationalist propaganda—misrepresentation and violence—have been resorted to without shame or stint on the Separatist side; and violence has been carried to such a pitch that it may very well have frightened away some timid or lukewarm "respectables" from a scene where Mr. DARLING himself was repeatedly attacked and Colonel GRAHAM seriously injured. Irish or Radical rowdies have constantly attempted to break up Mr. DARLING's meetings, and have made argument impossible at them. Mr. GLADSTONE has not spared his personal influence in a neighbourhood which he once represented, and from which, contrary to his usual electoral experiences, he was never actually ejected. Yet, in spite of all this, Mr. DARLING has very largely increased Mr. EVELYN's poll, and kept quite enough of Mr. EVELYN's majority. We have invariably set our faces against the foolish exultation and the equally foolish depression sometimes shown at the results of single elections. But if Separatists will appeal to such things as showing the course of the tide, Unionists may certainly allow them to do so with great equanimity as far as the recent group of such elections is concerned. The retention of Southwark by an increased, and the retention of Mr. BUCHANAN by a narrow, majority must be but cold comfort against the great drop of Separatist votes at Dundee, the unrelieved and serious defeat at Doncaster, the necessity of letting Hampstead go unchallenged, and the failure with quite exceptional advantages to carry Deptford. If such a thing may be said of any bye-elections, it may be said of Doncaster and Deptford combined, that judging from two large constituencies of the most opposite character no change in the general sentiment of England towards Home Rule has taken place. And if anything more could be wanted to prove the Separatist disappointment, it would be the falling back of Gladstonians on the old stories of Burnley and Coventry and Spalding. "My grandsire drew a good "bow at the battle of Hastings" was a plea about as pertinent.

There is a habit among good players at not a few games of considering, even in case of a win, whether they could not have played better, and it is well not to neglect this in the present instance. No such reproach as was justly brought against the Tories of Southwark could be brought against those of Deptford in the matter of work. But the intimidation and violence of Gladstonian roughs above referred to is a matter which is common to both the constituencies, and it requires careful looking to. It is, of course, natural in those English agitators who have not hesitated to make the natural dislike of a section of the population to the police an engine for political use, and still more in those Irish agitators whose whole tradition, whose whole argument, whose be-all and end-all as politicians is the use of violence. But it is exceedingly discreditable that it should be allowed either to prevail, or even to exercise any considerable influence. It is sometimes said that there are police and police-courts. But, in the first place, there are strong and obvious reasons why the police should interfere as little as possible in electoral meetings; and, in the second place, it is by no means so easy as may be thought to draw the exact line where horseplay ends and actual illegal violence begins. On the other hand, the employment of paid "chuckers-out," though sometimes unavoidable, is discreditable in itself, has many inconveniences, not infrequently fails to effect its object, and sometimes brings those who use it into trouble. In all constituencies where there is a rowdy element there ought to be no difficulty in arranging a force of volunteer guardians of order who could make it exceedingly unpleasant for those persons who are hired to introduce into England, on a mild and timid scale at first, the practices of the Home Rule Danites in Ireland. British youth has no absolute dislike to a row, and, being athletic, is often capable of making a very efficient example of a rowdy. Organization of this kind would, of course, require care and intelligence; but we are not aware that there is any kind of political organization which does not require those qualities. At any rate, Southwark and Deptford have shown that the Gladstonian party, despairing of success otherwise, has made up its mind to use intimidation of the kind which is not unlikely to be effective, and which, from its character, is very difficult to make the ground of a petition in case it is successful. And it is not to be tolerated that such means should be successfully, or even unsuccessfully, employed.

Mr. MORLEY's speech at the Oxford Union and its result, though they will scarcely cause the heart of any Unionist to beat high with hope, must discourage those Separatists who devote themselves to the straw-and-wind or straw-and-tide study. The five hundred undergraduates and the seventy or eighty graduates who have been boasted of as Home Rulers in the University which King ALFRED did not found appear to exercise a judicious distinguo in their support of the dogma. They will dine for it, but they will not vote for it. That, however, is of less importance than the character of Mr. MORLEY's speech. And we confess that we are surprised that a man of Mr. MORLEY's acuteness—a man who was once an Oxford undergraduate himself—should have selected the kind of arguments which he did select for that particular assembly. The "eternal "undergraduate," as he has been called, has his merits and his defects. It may be a defect or a merit that he has, as a rule, a lofty contempt for peddling details; it certainly is a merit that he does not like "funk." Now Mr. MORLEY had nothing to produce but his old plea that the Irish are dreadfully violent people, and that they will "teach "treason and hatch murder" if you do not let them—what shall we say?—teach sedition and hatch cattle-maiming. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL had taken exactly the opposite line. And then Mr. MORLEY went into a wilderness of petty cases about PATRICK This, who got six weeks, which Mr. MORLEY thinks he ought not to have got, and DENIS That, who got a week more than Mr. MORLEY thinks he should. There can hardly have been a freshman present who did not say to himself, "I daresay "there may have been individual hardships in carrying out "coercion, but whose fault is it that coercion has to be "carried out?" And as even freshmen are not above reading newspapers, the person who thought this must have had his [illegible]ened when he read next day the correspon[illegible] Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. King. To begin with, these awful examples are irrelevant, and to follow, they are too frequently inexact. When a prominent party leader has nothing to bring forward but such things in particular, and in general an argument for running away, he must not be surprised if he does not carry an undergraduate audience with him. And we shall add that, in refusing so to be carried, the undergraduate audience showed itself to be animated by the common sense which animated the majorities of Doncaster and Deptford, and which, it may be hoped, will continue to animate the people of England.

THE SENTENCE ON M. WILSON.

THE comparative severity of the sentence passed on M. Wilson may possibly cause some surprise in England. It may seem that in a country where manslaughter is generally condoned, and the throwing of vitriol by angry women is counted a peccadillo, two years' imprisonment, five years' deprivation of all civil rights, and a fine of 3,000 francs is a very severe punishment for the offence to make bargains for the sale of the cross of the Legion of Honour. But this is not the only wonderful thing about the trial of M. Grévy's son-in-law. The proceedings were amazing to an Englishman who is not more or less accustomed to French judicial habits. A judge of First Instance who dines at a café with a person suspected of criminal practices, and then uses a telephone in his name to trap an accomplice, is a wonderful object enough, and it must be allowed was too much even for the French. The trial itself was as astounding as the preliminaries. Witnesses talked at large, and were never cross-examined; irrelevant matter was introduced copiously, the President of the Court prejudged the case, wrangled with the accused and the witnesses, and was snubbed by counsel. The advocates appealed to sentiment, and eschewed argument, for which, no doubt, they had their reasons. M. Lenté, who acted for M. Wilson, is held to have gained a great forensic triumph, though to an Englishman he seems to have indulged in a great deal of easy loose assertion, and some lachrymose appeals to pity. His picture of M. Grévy in his melancholy fall dissolved the court into tears. M. Lenté himself sat down overcome with emotion. The President wiped his eyes, whether with a law document, his hands, or his pocket-handkerchief, we are not told. There was not a journalist or lady in the hall whose eyes were not turned into fountains of running water, and for a good space naught was heard save sobs and snuffling. This, however, is the old practice of French tribunals. "Monsieur, voyez nos "larmes," as L'Intimé, a distinguished predecessor of M. Lenté's, observed on a somewhat similar occasion, and he produced his effect on the judge. This time the judge took a week to think, and was not unduly influenced by the "famille désolée." What to us appears not the least astonishing feature of the whole business is that M. Wilson, who has got two years and the rest, was only tried as an accessory, while the principals get off with from eight to one month and no rest. Mme. Rattazzi, again, who is proved on equally good evidence to have been mixed up in the traffic, escapes scot free. The lady has luck; but the distinction made in her favour is good cricket as the game is played in French courts.

There is still an appeal to the Supreme Court, which will probably reduce the sentence, but it does seem as if justice had been done—in a rather popular fashion, certainly, but done none the less. From the uncontradicted assertions made, and from M. Wilson's own defence, it is plain that, if he did not directly sell his influence with his father-in-law to secure nominations to the Legion of Honour, he was willing to make money for his newspapers by allowing it to be believed that his help could be bought. This is the most favourable view which can be taken of his conduct, and even that is more than he deserves, if the evidence of M. Delizy is to be accepted. Since the French law provides a punishment for this offence, it was right that M. Wilson should suffer. As he undoubtedly employed Ribaudeau and Dubreuil, it would have been a miscarriage of justice if he had escaped more easily than they did because he was technically only an accessory. Now, however, that the business is over, Frenchmen—at least the Republicans—have certainly some cause to regret that it was ever brought so far. Any good it may do as a warning to future possible imitators of M. Wilson must be more than counterbalanced by the discredit of the scandal. M. Grévy was, after all, the twice-elected chief of the State, and the ignoble disaster which has overtaken him must, to some and no small extent, reflect on the Government of which he was the head. No ruler of France ever fell among such surroundings. The Third Republic, which was already sufficiently besmirched, is now dirtier than ever, and no Government, even in France, recovers certain kinds of discredit. If the pertinacity displayed in running down M. Wilson shows that the French are unmerciful to some forms of intrigue, it shows still more clearly the rancour of the clique hatreds which divide the Republicans. The trial has proved the truth of the charge often brought against the politicians of the present Government, that they are surrounded by a discreditable society of brokers of places and managers of bribes. The Republic must suffer by the demonstration. It is discredited, and the jibes of its enemies are made more telling. The feeling that it is scandalous and ignoble will be strengthened, and so will the belief that it is weak, which will certainly not be counterbalanced by anything the Chamber is doing. In a country in which no sanctity attaches to any form of government, this loss of character—where there was not too much to lose—must bring on a crisis of some kind at no distant date. The fact that 50,000 votes have been given spontaneously to General Boulanger in widely distant constituencies is an awkward sign for the present race of politicians. It shows that, in spite of apparent failure and his recent comparative obscurity he is still popular, and popular elsewhere than in Paris. There are apparently many voters who believe him to be the man to whom they must look to pull the country out of its present condition of division and weakness. A man, and particularly a soldier, who is considered in that way is apt to go far in France.

MR. COTTER MORISON.

NO shock of painful surprise can have accompanied the regret with which the friends of the late Mr. Cotter Morison heard the news of his death. For more than two years past his health had been declining with distressing rapidity, and the disease from which he was suffering was one which seldom or never spares. Not even the most resolutely hopeful of those who saw him lately could have anticipated for him any permanent recovery; we believe that to most of them the end appeared as near as in fact it was. Could his life, indeed, have been prolonged in the state of physical and mental exhaustion to which his wasting malady had reduced him, the boon, to a man of his temperament, would have been a more than doubtful one. The discovery made by the writer of one obituary notice that a decline of his intellectual faculties is traceable in his latest work is perhaps a little fanciful; but few who knew him doubted that that work would be his last, and many must have regretted that neither in it nor in any of his previous writings, admirable as in many respects these latter are, has he left behind him any adequate monument of his remarkable powers. As it is, he adds another name to the not inconsiderable list of writers who pass a good part of their lives in the preparation of an opus magnum which is never destined to see the light. Mr. Morison had for years been meditating an elaborate history of the growth of French institutions from, it is believed, the time of Charlemagne down to the overthrow of the ancien régime. No one could have been better fitted by tastes, attainments, and abilities for such a task than he. In pursuance of it he was understood to have accumulated a mass of valuable materials, and in particular to have devoted a closer and more minute study to the fiscal and jurisprudential sides of the French polity during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries than any English scholar had yet bestowed upon them. From time to time he has whetted the curiosity of the literary world by the publication in one or other of the periodicals of some brilliant fragments of his work. But it never grew to its completion in his lifetime, and in what stage of maturity he has left it we are unable to say.

A review of Mr. Morison's career can hardly fail to revive—it has, indeed, already revived—the eternal question as to whether ample competence and abundant leisure are really better for the student than those opposite conditions under which so much of the world's work has been actually done. It cannot be said that in Mr. Morison's case they produced their commonest and least satisfactory effect. There was certainly nothing of the dilettante about him, in the sense, at any rate, in which dilettantism is only another name for the literary recreations of the elegant trifler. All his work, or all at least which he has ever given to the world, was eminently of the thorough and conscientious kind. But it may be doubted whether his complete exemption from all external pressure did not tend to foster that excessive intellectual fastidiousness which is almost as fatal as indolence itself to the achievement of such a task as Mr. MORISON had set himself. He was an ardent admirer of MACAULAY, and even a frequent, though perhaps an unconscious imitator of his manner; and we all know that a writer with unlimited time on his hands, and a keen appreciation of style, may easily continue polishing epigrams and balancing antitheses from manhood to past middle age. It may not be good for any man to work always with the spur of necessity in his flanks; but perhaps an occasional touch of that wholesome stimulus is necessary for most of us. It is not impossible, too, that the brilliancy of another gift than that of literary expression may have occasionally exercised a distracting effect upon his work. He was one of the most admirable of talkers, as excellent in manner as in matter, and one of those rare masters of the art who seem to use it far more for bringing out the conversational powers of their company than for the display of their own. With his store of accurate and varied knowledge, and his unfailing command of felicitous expression, with the wit, good sense, and intellectual enthusiasm which he brought to bear upon his subject, he could not fail to take a prominent part in any discussion; yet he never left upon any mind the impression of having appropriated more than his due share of the conversation. No doubt there are some minds which are only braced and quickened for the labour of the study by these exercises of the salon. But there are again others which find their store of intellectual energy sensibly reduced by them, and Mr. MORISON'S may very possibly have been a mind of this particular order. Distractions of some sort or another there must have been, or the amount of his literary production could hardly fail to have been greater. With indolence in the common acceptation of the word it would have been impossible to charge him. Nor could he be accused of that improvident dissipation of the mental activities which sometimes results from a wide variety of intellectual interests. It could not be said of him that he had "too many irons in the fire." He confined himself pretty closely, so far as is known, to that work of historical and historico-literary criticism in which he felt that his true strength lay; and it was assuredly not from attempting too much that he accomplished so little. Other causes, some of which we have conjecturally indicated, must be sought to account for the fact that the work of his pen should have fallen so curiously short of the power of his mind, and that the public can now never be expected to share that high estimate of his abilities which was universal among his private friends.

JOURNALISM AS A PROFESSION.

THE venerable Uncle (surely it must be great-uncle?) of his Nephew returns, in Macmillan's Magazine, to his charge on the Profession of Letters. The hoary sage admits that a series of letters on this topic may be regarded as making a good thing too common, and, indeed, he seems to have more difficulty than of old in coming to the point. He quotes a curious example of American journalistic manners—the brief question asked by a New York paper when one of our lecturers alighted on Western shores, "What does this "old fat fool come here for?" And he fears, most unwarrantably, that, as the world beholds him again entering the lists of controversy, the world may ask itself a similar question. Perhaps there are readers who do not quite believe either in his corpulence or in his antiquity, and the substantive, of course, is most inapplicable. The sage is always a welcome sage; but it may be doubted whether he has anything new to say. Much, undoubtedly, of what he says about the profession of journalism is true, and should be read and pondered on by the young who propose to enter one of the schools of the journalists.

The real question which this Uncle, like many guardians of youth, has to answer is—What can a clever young man honourably make of himself and his talents? He may be a barrister; but the Bar is crowded. He perhaps does not wish to be a soldier. He may not care, after seven years of school and four of Oxford, to go back again to school with the intention of passing his life there as a master. If he objects to a public office, our sympathies will not be alienated, especially as officials of his class are likely to have hard times in the future. If he has no ambition to be a college don, "sitting ay ben, Correcting college essays with a weary "pen," our sympathy with him rises to enthusiasm. Finally, should he desire to make literature his profession, he must first make it seem probable that he has something to sell which the booksellers will want to buy. If he can write novels that the public will read, he may not starve; nay, he may even roll in the comparative abundance of some two thousand pounds a year—as long as he has the public favour. But it is a notable thing that not from the first-class men of the Universities come the novelists of this world. In the words of a song at one time popular, when the aged kinsman was young, they are "too jolly clever by half," with the wrong sort of cleverness. They are too critical, and, in Mr. CARLYLE'S phrase, "too high-sniffing," for success in fiction. They have not enough human nature in them, or, if they have, they are too cultivated to let it find expression. There have been, and there are, University men among our novelists—THACKERAY, GUY LIVINGSTONE, Mr. PAYN, Mr. BESANT, LOCKHART, and others—but none of these University men were academic in their hearts. The Uncle is thinking of an academic young man. An American critic and professor of Greek once discovered close resemblance between Mr. R. L. STEVENSON and DIONYSIUS of Halicarnassus. But it is alleged that the resemblance is accidental, and that Mr. STEVENSON'S Greek is not much stronger than that of SHAKSPEARE, or of him who was called "The Greek Dunce" of Edinburgh College, and who supported the thesis that ARIOSTO was a greater poet than HOMER.

It is not likely that our academic Nephew will prove a successful novelist, and there is no livelihood to be made in any other field of book-writing, unless a man be a FROUDE, or a CARLYLE, or a MACAULAY. Probably the Nephew is not numbered among these, though he cannot be sure till he tries—till he tries with that uncompromising courage which was Mr. CARLYLE'S most amiable quality. He would have nothing to do with Captain STERLING and journalism. But it is towards journalism that the Nephew will incline, if he wishes to live by his pen. From this endeavour the Uncle dissuades him, and he speaks wisely. Even if the Nephew confines himself purely to that kind of literature which some journals accept, his life will be precarious, and plenty of drudgery will await him. It is not true in England, as in France, that literature leads to everything—if you leave it. Political journalism occasionally leads to a political career; but there be shorter cuts; and a political career, in the present condition of affairs, may itself lead to a very short and sharp "cut" indeed. Moreover, the Nephew is supposed to want another kind of profession, not professional politics. Would any one advise him to make his choice of political journalism?

The Uncle states the disadvantages very clearly. A great authority says that a noble character may possibly be maintained in politics, but never can be made by them. Now political journalism has even more temptations to base and degrading compromises than actual politics. Being anonymous, a writer can tamper with his conscience even more easily than a man who speaks openly for himself. He may learn to sell his conscience to his paper. He will find himself carried, like a rather dirty straw, down the stream, flowing swifter and swifter day by day, where the iron pots are floating, and the pots of clay are breaking. A man with genuine revolutionary beliefs is almost the only man who can now jump into that current with a clear conscience, and a certainty that he will not be carried where he has, at present, no intention of going. Is it worth while for any other young man to try these waters? We agree with the Uncle that the experiment were better avoided. "Ranching," schoolmastering, doctoring, breaking stones on the road, are better than compromising with one's conscience, adopting a professional conscience, learning to regard such party work as a thing necessarily to be advocated, learning to regard the interests of your paper as higher than the interests of England.

Perhaps the Uncle is even too severe. "Is there, think "you," he says, "an editor of one daily paper published "in England who would consent to suppress any piece of "intelligence, out of regard to the interests of the State, "until such time as it suited those interests for it to be "known?" We speak with diffidence; but we fancy that there are such editors, and that probably more matters of news are kept thus in reserve than the Uncle supposes. But he may be right, and it is perfectly certain that the journalist's temptation is to blurt out all he knows.

THE NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE.

IF the new Rules of Procedure are administered in the same temper in which they have been discussed, they will serve their purpose even better than the ancient code which was largely altered in 1882. The most sanguine anticipation of their efficiency is necessarily conditional; but it is possible that, having been carried to an extreme point, the spirit of obstruction may be permanently subsiding. The worst offenders cannot but have discovered that in preventing legislation they impede the progress of change, and the revolutionary party may perhaps hereafter become impatient of restrictions on the power of the majority. The additional facilities which are offered by the new Rules for the summary closure of debate are intended to sharpen a weapon which may not always be wielded by a Conservative Minister. The Rules, as they were settled a year ago, though they could not prevent waste of time, were sufficiently stringent to enable the Government to defeat the [illegible] resistance of the Nationalists and their allies. The whole Session was occupied in the contest on the Procedure Rules themselves and in the prolonged debates on the Crimes Bill. In both cases the Ministers attained their main object, and they could afford to bear with equanimity the reproach of having neglected or delayed general legislation. Their adversaries were notoriously responsible for the systematic interference with the course of business, and the process of remodelling the institutions of the country might be suspended with little inconvenience. The amiable language of Mr. PARNELL and Mr. GLADSTONE at the opening of the current Session showed that they had reconsidered the policy which had perhaps been forced upon them by their followers. It was not their interest to provide the Government with an excuse for inaction as comprehensive as CALEB BALDERSTON's fire at Wolf's Crag. Both the leaders of Opposition hoped that the Local Government Bill or some other proposed measure might make an opening in the phalanx which had closed its ranks against the apologists for Irish sedition. They have accordingly determined to provide Mr. SMITH and his colleagues with an ample and, as they hoped, fatal supply of Parliamentary rope. In these circumstances it is doubtful whether the new Rules of Procedure will be adequately tested by the experience of a single Session.

The alteration in the hours of sitting has been almost unanimously approved. Every member has a personal interest in the change, though perhaps some Irish obstructionists take more pleasure in annoying their opponents than in going to bed at a reasonable hour. They may also have foreseen that, if obstruction should at any time be revived, the adjournment of the House at a fixed hour will increase the opportunities for calculated garrulity. The automatic termination, as it is called, of a sitting has long been tried on one day in the week. A few good measures and many mischievous proposals have been talked out on Wednesdays. The balance of advantage is on the side of compulsory interruption of debate; but the twelve o'clock Rule will affect serious business as well as the schemes of private members. The only security against undue prolongation of debate will consist in the frequent or periodical exercise of the power of Closure, and the contests of Ministerial majorities with the Opposition may prove to be invidious and troublesome. It is true that a Parliamentary day of eight or nine hours ought to be sufficient for the transaction of business, and it is well worth while to try the experiment of shortening night sittings. The substitution of 3 P.M. for 4 P.M. as the hour of meeting may perhaps be inconvenient to some members; but the greater number are not required to attend during the time of questions or at occasional debates on private business. Committees will probably accept the suggestion that they should sit from eleven to three, the members having not had occasion to attend the House during the greater part of the night. The House of Lords Committees have always met at 11 and have sat till 4. If the Rule proves to be inconvenient, it can at any time be rescinded, as it has no necessary connexion with the rest of the Ministerial project.

Provision was made in the Rules of 1882 for the devolution of legislative functions on so-called Grand or Standing Committees. The experiment has thus far not been successful, or rather, it has seldom been tried. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's Bankruptcy Bill of 1883 was considered and modified by a Grand Committee with advantageous results. An important Bill for the codification of the criminal law was during the same Session dropped after it had been referred to a Grand Committee. There may, perhaps, have been two or three similar references; but the plan has not met with general favour. Attempts will now be made to apply the principle of devolution more generally; and perhaps it may be profitably applied to Bills which involve no political issue. The members will probably be nominated by the Committee of Selection, which has hitherto exhibited both impartiality and sound judgment. The main difficulty is that of inducing competent members to serve. Some of them have expressed a doubt whether a more numerous body is preferable to an old-fashioned Committee of smaller dimensions. The opinion of a Grand Committee, though it may perhaps carry with it greater weight, is still not binding on the House. If there is any considerable opposition to a measure on which a Grand Committee has reported, its labours may prove to have been wasted, as the Bill may still be debated at length. When party interests are concerned devolution would be impossible or useless. As in the Election Committees of former times, the decision of the Committees would be known as soon as the list of its members was published, though it might not even have commenced its sittings. The Notice-paper of the House of Commons already contains many projects, including a scheme of universal suffrage, on which the opinion of a Committee would be absolutely worthless. In cases where the conclusions of a Grand Committee would perhaps be accepted by the House, there would be much inconvenience in the simultaneous examination of two or three separate measures.

The complaint which has been made of the dull and commonplace character of the debates on Procedure is somewhat hypercritical. It is almost impossible to be eloquent on the details of Standing Orders. When Mr. GLADSTONE first undertook to reform the Code of Procedure, the task was not a little difficult and tedious. There was a general indisposition to diminish the established securities for freedom of debate, and the chief promoters of obstruction, then hostile to Mr. GLADSTONE, naturally wished to preserve the licence which they had systematically abused. The proposals of the present Government involve little novelty in principle, and for the most part they are suggested by recent experience. The brevity of the discussion seems to show that the promises made by Mr. PARNELL and Mr. GLADSTONE express their real policy, at least for the present Session. They have, perhaps, reminded their followers that the Conservatives may not have consulted their own interest in strengthening the hands of the majority. Mr. DILLON could not refrain from threatening the Government with retaliation if his own friends succeed to power. He apparently assumes that, by the provisions of the next Home Rule Bill, the Irish members will retain their seats in the Imperial Parliament. Mr. SMITH, who has conducted the debate with his usual good temper and tact, might have replied, if it had been necessary to answer Mr. DILLON's challenge, that the present business is to restrain Irish disorder, even at the risk of facilitating the exercise of Irish tyranny hereafter. It is impossible to take profound interest in the question whether the names of the majority or of the minority should be published when the Speaker, under the new Rules, calls on members to rise in their places. The penal clauses of the new code provoked less opposition than might have been expected. It is true that the punishments which are to be inflicted on Irish or English offenders against decency and order are not calculated to strike terror into their minds. Almost all the resolutions proposed by the Government have been carried without difficulty, though much might have been said of the proposal that orators may be silenced when they indulge too freely in useless repetition. It appears that, according to the best interpretation of the new Rule, it will be permissible for a member to repeat the arguments of others, but not his own. If the Speaker construes his duties liberally, an effective check will be imposed on excessive loquacity.

It has perhaps not occurred to those who are endeavouring to regulate the proceedings of the House of Commons that entirely new Rules of Procedure must be framed if at any time an Irish Parliament should be created. In that contingency the Imperial Legislature must submit to limitations of its power which would necessarily be embodied in a written Constitution. If the control of the police, of finance, or of any other branch of government were entrusted to the subordinate Legislature, some external authority must decide on the competence of the Imperial Parliament to exercise any power which it might suppose itself to have reserved. Restrictions of its former omnipotence must be recognized in its own code of procedure. Parliament is not at present liable to encounter the objection that any of its proceedings are ultra vires. It is remarkable that the same politician who exults over the alleged non-existence of fundamental laws should at the same time attempt to substitute a federal compact for absolute sovereignty. In the meantime the House of Commons is well employed in devising schemes for the prevention of obstructive practices. Such precautions would have been superfluous only a few years ago. A legislative assembly in which all, or nearly all, the members are loyally desirous to perform their duty, requires only simple rules to maintain the freedom and regularity of debate. The new Rules will perhaps save during the present Session as much Parliamentary time as has been devoted to their enactment.

THE WIMBLEDON RIFLE MEETING.

It is, no doubt, difficult to find just ground of complaint against the decision of the Duke of Cambridge in the matter of the Wimbledon rifle ranges, but it is impossible not to regret it on more grounds than one. The reply of Messrs. Jarrett, the Duke's solicitors, to the last proposal of the National Rifle Association—namely, for the purchase of 120 acres of his land behind the butts and lying between them and Coombe Wood—is beyond question the reply which would have been received from the solicitors of ninety-nine out of every hundred landowners similarly situated, and we have no right, perhaps, to expect even a Royal Duke, commanding-in-chief, to be the hundredth. At the same time, and having regard to the serious consequences which that decision will entail upon the National Rifle Association, we must confess that we had rather it had come from almost any other quarter. The particular facts on which the Duke founds his conclusion that the sale of this particular portion of his land "would be a most serious "injury to the estate, and might interfere very seriously "with its development hereafter," are, we will assume, incontestable; we do not find, indeed, that they were contested—or, at least, to any purpose—at the recent meeting of the Association. If it be the fact that rifle-bullets do at present pass the proposed boundary of the ranges, and fall into Coombe Wood, then undoubtedly something else falls also—cadit quæstio. It is certainly no sufficient answer to say that this could only happen when rifles are "fired some-"what at random into the air above the line of targets," and that "only experienced shots use the Wimbledon ranges." Spots which are only safe from the impact of rifle-bullets so long as every one out of a large number of riflemen is shooting in reasonably good form cannot be described as eligible plots of building land. Lord Wantage, moreover, who advanced the proposition just criticized, took no account of the fact that the contemplated introduction of a new rifle for practice with an increased range will still further diminish the area which can be regarded as safe from the occasional invasion of its projectiles.

Nevertheless we are disposed to agree, on the whole, with the same speaker as to the very serious consequences of a removal of the meeting from Wimbledon. It may be too much perhaps to speak of it, in Lord Wantage's terms, as "a crushing blow to the future of the Association." That is to take the worst view of the matter, and to assume both that no fresh arrangements can be made for the retention of Wimbledon and that no equally, or nearly equally, satisfactory meeting-place can be obtained elsewhere. Yet we must admit that, while the first solution appears on financial grounds to be unattainable, the second will, to any one who considers the condition of the problem, seem even more remote. The substituted meeting-place must be on land owned by the Association; it must be in the immediate neighbourhood of an extent of open ground sufficient for a Volunteer encampment on a large scale; it must, above all, be near London—that is a point of first importance—and there must be complete and easy access to it by railway. Any one who endeavours to think of a spot which will satisfy all these conditions will find it a very discouraging task. Insufficiency of space excludes half a dozen eligible meeting-places within ready reach of London. Distance from London is fatal to those at which unoccupied ground is plentiful, and can be acquired at a reasonable cost. The mere suggestion of such places as Pirbright and Hassocks Gate is enough to show the desperate character of the problem in one of its aspects, while an observation of the Chairman's throws a strong light on its apparent hopelessness from another point of view. The Duke of Cambridge, Lord Wantage said, was "also moved by a "conviction that the increased range and penetration of "modern rifles are destined soon to render all populous dis-"tricts unsuitable for the purpose of rifle practice." If this conviction be well founded, it will follow from it that even the few districts in the neighbourhood of London which are still suitable for this purpose will cease in a short time to retain that character. The Wimbledon meeting, if its popularity is to be preserved at all, must continue to be held in some district which, if not exactly populous at the moment, is within the area of expansion of the most populous and most expansive city in the world. This, however, is a reason for making renewed efforts at an arrangement for the retention of the present site. It is apparently only to a sale of this particular amount of his land that the Duke of Cambridge objects. We do not understand that he would necessarily be indisposed to part with a larger portion, or even the whole of it, if a fair price were forthcoming. And for a national purpose of this kind it should surely be possible to raise the money.

MRS. BUNCH AND HER BAG.

Every now and then the innocent layman, glancing over the Law Reports in the Times, thinks that at last the vexed question of a Railway Company's liability for the loss of a passenger's luggage has been settled for ever. Meanwhile there are some who laugh, men who are accustomed to laugh best because they laugh last—we mean legal practitioners of both branches. They know very well that the "special circumstances of the case" have governed the decision, and that judges, who have been barristers, are above spoiling sport for barristers who wish to be judges. Mrs. Bunch may feel the glow of honest pride at having perplexed the judicial talent of the country, and even divided the House of Lords. But, though she has succeeded herself, and though it may be hoped, after all we have recently heard about economy in litigation, that her "taxed costs" will bear some reasonable relation to those actually expended, she has won a victory for herself alone. The next lady who loses a bag in travelling, and has the pluck to pursue it through four Courts, will in all probability find that between her and Mrs. Bunch there is a great gulf fixed. There is sure to be a distinction, of which no ordinary man of common sense would have dreamed, but which some one out of many men versed in the common law will be able to take. Mrs. Bunch might have fared worse in the House of Lords, though she could not have gone further if she had not been sustained by the finding of the County Court Judge on a question of fact. Here her ground was impregnable. For mark the beautiful arrangements of our legal system. On appeal from the County Court to the Queen's Bench Division, two of Her Majesty's Judges were equally divided. Mr. Justice Day thought that Judge Stonor was wrong in law; Mr. Justice Smith that he was right. Thereupon Mr. Justice Smith, as the "junior "Judge," in all the gravity and stillness of his fifth lustrum, withdrew his judgment, and the Great Western Railway was acclaimed victor by the more than Hibernian majority of one judicial authority against two. So much for the question whether the porter was holding the bag on behalf of the Company, which is a point of law. Now for the point of fact. Judge Stonor found that forty-nine minutes before the starting of the train on Christmas Eve was a reasonable time for Mrs. Bunch to have placed her bag in the hands of the porter, and here he was irreversible. Not all the Queen's Judges, including the keeper of Her Majesty's conscience, nor all the noble and learned peers of this realm, could touch him here. Nothing but an Act of Parliament, which, if it cannot make a man a woman, can make a woman a man, for political purposes, could affect the solemn declaration that it was reasonable for Mrs. Bunch to give herself forty minutes, without her bag, on the Paddington platform on Christmas Eve.

The bag, as the civilized world now knows, was lost, and the conscience of the civilized world will not be revolted by the decision that the Great Western Company must pay for it. Three Courts have said so, and the fourth Court practically refused to say anything at all. The porter undertook to provide for the safety of the bag, and he failed to fulfil his undertaking. He was the servant of the Company, and as such he took charge of it. If he had not been in the uniform of a porter, Mrs. BUNCH would not have given him the bag, or, if she had, she would clearly have done so at her own risk, inasmuch as there would have been no use in suing the man. The LORD CHANCELLOR pointed out, in his exhaustive, not to say exhausting, judgment, that Mrs. BUNCH was entitled to her verdict if there was evidence upon which it could be founded. It is a strong thing to say that there was not, though Lord BRAMWELL said it with his accustomed energy of expression. Baron MARTIN once addressed the counsel for a Railway Company in these emphatic terms:—"You took the plaintiff's money, and you "killed his beasts. Why don't you behave like honest "men?" Whether Mrs. BUNCH paid the porter does not appear. It is to be hoped in the circumstances that she did not. But, as Lord HALSBURY puts it, the Company's servants are employed in taking luggage from the outside of the station to the trains, and the liability of the Company cannot be affected by the mere fact that the particular train has not yet drawn up at the platform. Lord BRAMWELL is, of course, equal to this or any other emergency. He holds that the retention of the bag made all the difference in the world. If that article of furniture had been taken straight towards the carriage in which Mrs. BUNCH was about to travel, and had been lost on the way, then, and then only, according to him, the plaintiff might have had a good case. This is certainly reducing the liability of the Company to a minimum, if not virtually destroying it altogether. It is curious to contrast the Lord CHANCELLOR's judgment with Lord BRAMWELL's. The former is involved and confused, seldom logical, not always grammatical, but obviously right. The latter is clever and ingenious, full of point, terse and lucid, but obviously wrong. He says that Mrs. BUNCH asked a favour, to which she was aware that she had no right. According to Lord BRAMWELL, we should all be lost in daily gratitude to Railway Companies for condescending to provide porters at all. The secret of Lord BRAMWELL's dissent from the majority is revealed in a sentence where he says, "We all know that large packages are taken to the luggage-"van, smaller packages (often much too large for the comfort "of other travellers) are, if requested by the passenger, "taken to the carriage in which the passenger is to be "carried." Lord BRAMWELL has evidently suffered from the evil he so feelingly deplores.

CANADA.

THE scheme of a Customs Union between Canada and the United States is not unlikely to succeed at some future time. The proposed policy has a great advantage in the advocacy of Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, whose position in the controversy is probably unique. It is possible that other supporters of the measure may be equally competent to expound its economic merits; but in the judgment of ordinary Englishmen they propose to confer a benefit on the Dominion at the expense of the mother-country. Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH has, for reasons of his own, to the regret of many of his countrymen, so far divided his allegiance that he has voluntarily become a Canadian. He nevertheless, as he has had ample opportunities of proving, remains a loyal and patriotic Englishman; and, although his combination of two separate duties may appear paradoxical, in both cases his feelings are altogether sincere. If he has in the present case yielded to the temptation of reconciling inconsistent objects of pursuit by disguising from himself their necessary antagonism, there is no doubt of his perfect good faith. The native Englishman and the adopted Colonist have not consciously come into conflict with one another in his person. In further vindication of his own consistency Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH might suggest, if he thought apologetic statements necessary or desirable, that the question is not one of benevolent partiality, but of economic justice. It may be argued that the loss to Canada incurred through a protective tariff against the United States is greater than the advantage which English commerce derives from the discouragement of competition. It must be admitted that every restriction on perfect freedom of commercial intercourse involves an absolute sacrifice of wealth, even where one of the parties to the arrangement may be a gainer by the general loss. Perhaps Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH would dispute the assumption that in the present instance the interests of England and of Canada are incompatible. The unanimous opinion of all parties concerned is perhaps not conclusive.

If the Parliament and Government of Canada were willing to form a Customs Union with the United States, no American party would raise a serious objection. By a curious inconsistency, protectionist communities are almost always willing to enlarge the area of internal and unqualified Free-trade. Between Maine and the Southern frontier of Texas there is an entire absence of duties on commerce, and, even if the establishment of such barriers were allowed by the Constitution, any attempt of the kind would be at once defeated by popular indignation. In the days before the Civil War, when both the Northern and the Southern States were constantly engaged in efforts to extend the limits of freedom or of slavery, the objection that an enlargement of the Union would involve the relaxation of a protective tariff was never urged. The vast Territory of Texas was first occupied by private adventurers, and then added to the dominions of the Republic without an audible remonstrance on the part of American producers. Immediately afterwards a large portion of Mexico, including the Pacific slope, was conquered, and again no opposition was offered by manufacturers or farmers. It was almost by accident that Cuba escaped the annexation which had been more than once threatened in Presidential Messages. About the same time, and afterwards during the Civil War, the conquest of Canada was announced as expedient and probable, and the Republican party which represents commercial protection would have acquiesced in the enterprise, if it had been found practicable. The Reciprocity Treaty, which was in force for several years, was ultimately denounced on political grounds, and there is little doubt that it might be renewed, if the English and Canadian Governments would comply with certain conditions. On the whole, it may be said that the decision for or against a Customs Union rests with the Canadian Government. The measure would excite dissatisfaction and perhaps irritation in England, but no attempt would be made by the Imperial Government to defeat the deliberate policy of the Dominion. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN was somewhat hasty in condemning by anticipation a policy to which no effective resistance could be offered.

Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH provokes criticism by his frequent description of commercial Union with America as Free-trade. By voluntarily entering the region which is enclosed by the American tariff, Canada would indeed obtain freedom of trade with the United States, but at the cost of commercial separation from the rest of the world, and especially from England. Perhaps the gain would exceed the loss; but both sides of the question ought to be considered. The opinion of the Parliamentary majority in Canada, and of the Government which has for many years held office, cannot be reasonably treated with the contempt which Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH apparently feels. Sir JOHN MACDONALD and his colleagues seem to be thoroughly in earnest in their determination to prefer their English connexion to the proposed union. They have lately, with the consent of Parliament, prohibited the construction of two railways which were intended to connect Manitoba with the American railway system, and their claim of control over railway enterprise has been judiciously recognized. As long as the Canadians, rightly or wrongly, disapprove of the Customs Union, it will scarcely become the English Government to oppose a policy which is ostensibly, and perhaps really, patriotic. One argument which has been strongly urged by the advocates of the existing state of things is apparently plausible. If Canada and the United States were included within the same frontier for fiscal purposes, the smaller and less powerful community would have no voice in the maintenance or readjustment of the tariff. Duties would be imposed or modified, or remitted by Congress, without reference to the wishes or interests of the less powerful partner. In the first and most important Customs Union which was established, the minor States of North Germany had a voting power which would have enabled them to resist any encroachment on the part of Prussia. It would be impossible to obtain similar security against a giant allied with a dwarf.

of the party which he opposes by the statement that the manufacturers, combined with certain political parties, have wrongfully obtained the control of the Government. His authority is weighty, though it may perhaps be impaired by his active participation in the movement for a Continental Customs Union. Englishmen at home cannot be expected to understand the circumstances and relations of Canadian parties, and they can only take it practically for granted that the Government of the day represents the community which maintains it in power. In Canada, as elsewhere, manufacturers and traders probably prefer their own interests to the public welfare, but it is not at first sight obvious that the cause of protection would be injuriously affected by a Customs Union. The manufacturers would acquire additional security against competition with English producers, though they may perhaps now profit by the exclusion of American imports. The political bearings of the struggle are less easy to understand; but, on the whole, the party which incurs Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH's displeasure may have something to say in its own defence. It is not certain that the attachment of Canadians to the English Crown and Government is wholly imaginary or insincere. It is true that the Colonies are not inclined to give up their fiscal prejudices for the purpose of facilitating either federation or any other kind of tie which may unite them more closely with the Empire. Nevertheless it appears, on credible testimony, that there is a sentiment of loyalty in the Colonies as well as a calculation of material advantage. Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH is not disposed to deny that commercial union tends in the direction of political annexation. The German Customs Union prepared the way for the North-German Federation, which soon afterwards ripened into the Empire. Even if a similar result were not of itself likely to follow the proposed measure, it would be certainly contemplated by the other party to the compact. Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH himself neither disputes nor deprecates an eventual fusion of English-speaking Americans in a single nation. His hope that the English beyond the Atlantic will maintain friendly relations with their kindred at home may possibly be fulfilled. Up to the present time the people of the United States have neither entertained nor affected any feeling of the kind. At the present moment there is reason to fear that the Fisheries Convention will be rejected by the Senate because a just and amicable settlement of a long-standing dispute with England might diminish the popularity of the PRESIDENT who approves it, and consequently give his Republican adversaries an advantage at the impending election. The question of a Continental Customs Union is less urgent; but it is well that it should be fully discussed. There is no reason to regret that the defence of the measure should be undertaken by Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH. Prudent disputants always wish that the adverse opinion should be fairly and fully represented; and in the present case the advocate of commercial union between Canada and the United States is neither an enemy nor a neutral. In no circumstances would Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH intentionally be a party to any scheme which was unjust and injurious to England.

MR. JOHN CLAYTON.

THE death of Mr. JOHN CLAYTON is, to his many friends and admirers, the terms are interchangeable, a visitation not less untoward than severe. In its way, too, it is something of a public misfortune. Mr. CLAYTON's place and function were unique; there is none left to fill his room and none to continue his tradition. The stage is not lacking, it may be, in artists of greater genius; but with artists of the rare and admirable type of which he was an exemplar it is ill provided indeed. There is plenty of talent, and there is plenty of accomplishment; but the two are not often found in combination to such an extent as in him. He was a born actor, to begin with, it is true; but he was the most patient, the most laborious, and withal the most intelligent of students, and his education had been so thorough, his mastery was so complete, that whatever he did was to the judicious well done enough to be exemplary as art and as invention alike. It has been said of him that he was the one English actor who would not have seemed out of place on the boards of the Rue de Richelieu; and to those who knew the great theatre at its best of late years—when it was the house of GOT and COQUELIN and BARRÉ and THIRON and DELAUNAY, of FAVART and MADELEINE BROHAN and the SARAH BERNHARDT of a time which knew not of Théodora or La Tosca and the seductions of Chicago and Cincinnati—the description, which is no more than just, is enough.

His capacity was the outcome of a long, an arduous, a desperate struggle with difficulties. Even in the beginning his figure was far from graceful; his arms were too short for his body, his tongue was too large for his mouth; he had, until the end, a vice of articulation which not even his accomplishment in elocution could utterly conceal. But he was a man of singular intelligence, he was a man of culture and gentle breeding—a student of books and life and character for their own sake; and the means he thought out for his education were rigorous and exigent enough to make him, as we know, perhaps the most accomplished actor—using the word "accomplished" in its strictest sense—on the English stage. The results were immediate and honourable. He was with PHELPS and with Mr. DION BOUCICAULT at the old Princess's; and he distinguished himself by his performance of, not only such parts as the young and commonplace hero of After Dark, but such character-parts as the GINKELL of The Rapparee. He was at the Gaiety—the new Gaiety then—with ALFRED WIGAN, first of all, and afterwards with Messrs. TOOLE and IRVING and NEVILLE, and the late ADELAIDE NEILSON and Miss HENRADE; and here he was simply admirable as the VAUBERT of an adaptation of Le Drame de la Rue de la Paix, effective as JOE LENNARD, the blacksmith jeune premier of BYRON's Uncle Dick's Darling, and beyond praise as Lord MOUNTFORRESTCOURT in ROBERTSON's Dreams. The actor's next achievement was worthy of his promise; was, indeed, the JOSEPH SURFACE of the Vaudeville revival. Who that has seen it can ever forget that incomparable piece of art? Handsome, plausible, gross, commanding, JOSEPH—JOSEPH, and not CHARLES—was the hero of the piece. Not even PALMER (so far as we can discover) had played the part with this amount of intellect and force; to many it was a revelation; it was evidence to those who knew and cared for acting, that here was a possible TARTUFE, a possible FALSTAFF even. It was intellectual, yet radiantly sensual; it was daring yet natural in conception, large yet finished in method, irresistible in effect; at the Français it would have stamped the executant an artist in creation, and opened up to him the range of great parts included in the old repertory. Even more popular, and to the full as remarkable, was the HUGH TREVOR of Mr. MERIVALE's and the late Mr. PALGRAVE SIMPSON's All for Her. Here was youth, here was romance, here was passion. It seemed that CLAYTON had but to go on—had but to have opportunity—to take his place at the head of his profession, to be the darling of the play-going public, as—in another way, and to a different purpose—GARRICK and KEAN had been before him, and Mr. HENRY IRVING has been since. But it was not so. Perhaps the dramatist was wanting; save for the judicious the actor did his best—and how good it was, that best!—in vain. Piece after piece was tried; upon each and all the manager (CLAYTON was now the co-lessee of the Court Theatre) expended his almost unequalled talent of production; in each and all the comedian shone with a discreet, an unfailing, an artistic and delightful brilliance. But the result was in a sense disheartening; the theatre was none of the most popular; the comedian, by sheer force of art and intelligence, was able to maintain his reputation, and from defeat to snatch a kind of victory. Then came a change. As the principal figure, if not the hero, in Mr. PINERO's pleasant and brilliant farces he achieved a popular success; and it seemed that he was at last upon the point of reaping his reward, and taking the place which was his by right—of talent, culture, intelligence, patience, accomplishment, fame; when, as we know, he died. It is impossible to say what he might or would not have done. He had always been a light of comedy; he was not too old for romance; first and last, he was an exemplar of his art. As we have said, there is none to take his place, or continue his tradition.

He died at forty-three, with, as one hoped, and as it seemed, at least twenty years' good work in him yet. What he was as an actor we have tried to record; as a stage-manager, an artist in production—one who could do much with little, and with means the most exiguous achieve the finest results—he had scarce any rival; as a talker, an intelligence, a personality he stood alone in his profession. It will be some time, we take it, ere the stage is itself without him.

THE SWEATING SYSTEM.

THE appointment of a Committee of the House of Lords to inquire into the sweating system of unsavoury name and associations will meet with general approval. Lord DUNRAVEN'S speech, and the Report of Mr. BURNETT on which it is founded, show that a state of things exists in some parts of the East-End of London calling, in the vague phrase commonly used when a scandal is reported, for "something to be done." There are tailoring shops in that part of the capital—and others could be found elsewhere, no doubt—as filthy, as unwholesome, as much overcrowded, as the worst dens denounced by KINGSLEY. Terrible spells of work are done for the most wretched pay under the pressure of competition. In one district foreign Jews in sufficient numbers to people a country town work during parts of the year as hard as negroes on a sugar plantation at harvest-time, and starve during the rest of the year. It is one of the worst evils of the trade that the work is equally heavy and irregular. By necessity or by choice—in all probability from the first of these causes—the contractors crowd the work they give out into a few days of the week. The hands—men and women—can only get through it by working for eighteen hours of the twenty-four. If the pay given is sometimes fairly good while it lasts, the intervals of idleness bring the average throughout the year very low. As is usually the case, women suffer more severely than men. Eleven shillings is thought a good week's earnings for a machine woman. The average gains are far smaller. This life of toil at starvation wages is led among surroundings often of the most filthy description. Workshops are overcrowded and undrained. Inspectors find that the law is frequently eluded, and houses kept in a condition which is a danger to the whole community. Into these places is crowded a population which lives on fishes' heads and putrid vegetables, which takes no exercise, has insufficient sleep, never washes, and is engaged in the production of cheap ready-made clothes, which are packed off for home use and export, as probably as not carrying with them the germs of typhus.

It is the best, if not the only, proof that we are better than our fathers that such a picture cannot be drawn now without exciting a desire to pull the crooked things straight. The gorge rises at the sight of this squalid misery, and even men who make no pretensions to exceptional humanity feel disgust at the thought of the existence of such a hotbed of human degradation and filthy disease in the very midst of London. Therefore, the decision of the Government to allow the appointment of the Committee asked for by Lord DUNRAVEN will seem to have been very proper and even natural. But whether something can be done, and what it ought to be, are by no means matters so easy to decide upon. The Lords' Committee can hardly confine itself to inquiring alone. That would only lead to the re-doing of Mr. BURNETT'S work, and to superfluous proof of what is already known. It must suggest remedies; and, when it begins to do so, the real difficulties of its task will be seen. Some improvement may be effected by a better system of sanitary inspection, and by inflicting severer penalties for breaches of the law; but by these means the utmost we can effect is to make it more probable that journeymen tailors, who have to work eighteen hours out of the twenty-four, shall not be required to do it in rooms insufficiently ventilated and reeking with effluvia from drains. Crushing work will still have to be done at starvation wages. The sweating system is, as Lord DUNRAVEN himself acknowledged, the inevitable result of the struggle in modern industry, the competition of contractors for profits and of workmen for wages. The Government itself helps to perpetuate the evil. It pays two shillings apiece for the making of postmen's greatcoats, of which one shilling and fourpence goes to the actual maker. If it gave more, somebody in the House of Commons would want to know why the nation's money was being wasted; and, indeed, it is very doubtful whether anybody but the contractor would profit by the extravagance. How can buyers be prevented from buying in the cheapest market, contractors from under-selling one another, and workmen from preferring starvation wages to none? It is this struggle which is cutting profits and wages alike down to the quick, and it is as much beyond legislative control as the fogs of the Channel. Much is said from time to time about the influx of foreign Jews who have been prepared by their own Polish and Russian squalor to live on garbage and toil for a pittance. Even if all that is asserted about them and their influence is true, it does not follow that permanent good would be gained by their exclusion. If it did raise wages and diminish hours of work in the ready-made clothes business, the effect would be to increase the cost of production, which would again show its influence in the price of Government contracts, in additional burdens on the workmen who buy cheap clothes, in greater difficulties for the exporting merchant, and diminished freight for the shipowner. The weight would be relieved in one quarter to be increased in others. The sweating system is one result of the ever-increasing pressure of population on means of subsistence—it is the City equivalent of the destitution in the Lewis. Unhappily it is less capable of remedy, for its victims are absolutely unfitted for life in a new country.

THE RUSSIAN PROPOSALS.

IT is understood that the proposals in reference to Bulgaria which, as a consequence partly of the recent language of Prince BISMARCK, Russia has made to the Porte and the Powers have been answered by all the Governments concerned except Turkey; and Turkey, in the nature of things, would have to answer last. The reported answers may very probably be taken as at least approximately correct. In fact, they were indicated beforehand with sufficient accuracy to make their nature all but certain. It was clear that all the Powers would in one way or other acknowledge the fact—a fact of the same kind as the fact that two and two make four—that Prince FERDINAND'S situation has not been regularized as it should have been. It was very probable that France, from her desire to curry favour with Russia, and Germany, for reasons which in the Palace of Truth might be a little different from those recently given to the Reichsrath, would support the Russian proposal for the removal of the audacious Coburger. It was equally probable that Austria, Italy, and England would, in one way or another, demur; and it was at least possible that the demur of Austria would be less decided than that of the other two, partly because Austria's good friend, Prince BISMARCK, shows such a touching anxiety that nothing should be done to hurt the CZAR'S feelings, and partly also, it is fair to remember, because the matter is much more momentous to Austria than to anybody else. If the CZAR were to be seized, as has not uncommonly happened in his family, by the desire for a coup de tête, the immediate consequences to England and Italy are quite problematic; the immediate consequences to Austria might, and very likely would, be the flooding of Galicia with Cossack cavalry. Therefore it is not altogether just to accuse the Imperial and Royal Government of hesitation or half-heartedness.

If, as has been announced, the English reply is practically confined to an acknowledgment of the incompleteness of Prince FERDINAND'S commission, coupled with a refusal to advise the Porte to take any steps for his removal until it knows what is to be done next, this particular round of the fight may be said to have gone in favour of Bulgaria, and it is quite clear that no better answer could have been returned. For the weakness of the Russian position always has been that Russians have seemed to argue as if the Berlin Treaty, in their own very peculiar reading of it, were an end in itself and not a means to an end. That end is the order, prosperity, and good government of Bulgaria. These three things, despite the efforts of certain persons not wholly unknown in Russia, have been secured, and are secured, by Prince FERDINAND'S de facto Government, which, moreover, needs nothing, and never has needed anything, to turn it into a de jure Government but the assent of Russia herself. She has caused a technical error, and now she seeks to profit by it, and to profit by it without giving any assurance that she will not play the same game over again. It is difficult to believe that even the encouragement of Prince BISMARCK can have induced her to commit the amazing tactical mistake assigned to her in some reports, and to vouchsafe the information that she could not consent to any Roman Catholic candidate. Sarcastic remarks have been made before now on that peculiar and, as it would appear, quite private version of the Berlin Treaty of which Russia and Prince BISMARCK, as her "fourth plenipotentiary," alone possess copies. But it would appear that there are many more clauses in that unknown edition than were thought. Here is a bran-new one, of which even Prince BISMARCK, when he testified to the clause about Russian "sway," which had escaped all other observers, said nothing. Perhaps the demurs of England and her companions will bring out more, and in that case we shall have some extremely interesting diplomatic revelations which will set all the learned editors and commentators of the instrument at work making appendices to their former labours.

A great deal, no doubt, depends upon the present action of Turkey, and that action, even by persons best acquainted with the subject, is never to be counted on with absolute certainty. At times it seems incredible that any Government should go out of its way to please a secular enemy and robber of its own goods; and the occasional deference of the Porte to Russia appears not unlike a curious phenomenon sometimes noticed in school life, where one boy seems unable to keep away from another, though this other may do nothing but bully, torment, and cheat him. The fact, no doubt, is that the Porte, seeing, and with some justice, in the "European Areopagus" nothing but an assembly of lukewarm friends and unscrupulous foes, thinks it, on the whole, best to pay most heed to that Areopagite which is the most open, most unscrupulous, nearest, and most formidable of the foes. On no other consideration can such proceedings as the distinction made between the Montenegrin ruffians and the Bulgarian ruffians, who lately, at the instigation of Russian agents, if not of Russia, invaded Bulgaria, be accounted for. The SULTAN knows too well that in any new European war he has hardly the smallest chance of recovering anything that has been stolen from him, and that he is very likely to be made to pay the price of reconciliation by fresh stealings. Still, whatever bad things may come out of the lap of fate for him in the direction of Austria or of anywhere else, it is so demonstrably impossible that any good thing should be brought out for him by the direct or indirect agency of the CZAR that playing into the hands of the latter on the part of the Porte seems simple madness. And it is doubtful whether it would ever be resorted to if it were not for the great delusion about gaining time which prevails in all diplomacy more or less, and in Eastern diplomacy most of all.

Some attention has been called to speeches of two Royalist Deputies in the French Chamber on foreign policy, both of which had some reference to England. That of M. DE LA FERRONAYS appears to have been mostly foolish, and the references made by this bearer of a not unhonoured name to the "immemorial rights" of France in the New Hebrides would seem to show that the gibes of the profane as to the historical and other teaching in the clerical schools frequented by Monarchists are not unfounded. M. DE BRETEUIL'S, though much abler and much less unfriendly —indeed, not unfriendly at all in form—displays in curious fashion the new craze about an Anglo-Russian alliance. M. DE BRETEUIL represented England as in a state of mortal terror about her empire in the East, and as ready to buy off Russia there at any price. It is sometimes, if not generally, forgotten in England, where ideas of French politics are rarely very precise, that the French Monarchists are, as a rule, rather worse disposed to England than their opponents —which is saying much. These speeches may do something to revive knowledge of the fact. The truth is that there is no considerable French party which is not ill disposed towards England, and that only in some yet unforeseen circumstances could England ever find a trustworthy alliance in France. With Russia it is, no doubt, different; for there is no inherited ill-will between England and the CZAR'S country. But there, on the other hand, is the fatal fact that in both directions in which the ambition of Russia prompts her most to advance, the interest of England is peremptorily to keep her back. M. DE BRETEUIL thinks that in our debilitated condition we should be glad to compound for halt in the one quarter by permitting advance in the other, and certainly if we have come to that, there is nothing more to be said. But Englishmen—not Gladstonians —naturally cannot be expected to take that view. M. DE BRETEUIL'S further remarks on the fears of Germany and the probable "bolting" of Austria and Italy in case of actual war were likewise too obviously prompted by wishes which fathered the thought. What is known is, that Russia is committed to a course of conduct in which, if she does not gain, she must lose very humiliatingly; and that if Austria and Italy allow her to win, the western half of the Mediterranean will very probably become a Russian lake, tempered perhaps by an English Egypt. We should not have supposed this consummation likely to be very agreeable to M. DE BRETEUIL'S countrymen; but, doubtless, they must be allowed to know their own affairs.

THE ARMADA MONUMENT.

CENTENARY festivals are things not always spoken of with respect. Fastidious persons call them bores, and austere persons call them follies. The proposed festival to celebrate the tercentenary of the defeat of the Spanish Armada will doubtless be called bad names; but the Plymothians need not be greatly troubled on that account. If it amuses them to have a ceremony in honour of the great event they may innocently have it, since they not only hurt nobody, but might be worse engaged than in having a little glorification over the famous deeds they did in ancient days. If, too, there is to be a tercentenary celebration, a fitter place for it could not be found than Plymouth. The English fleet lay there when the excellent pirate FLEMING signalled the Spaniards off the Lizard. The great game of Kales was played on the Hoe. The good people of Plymouth helped materially to worry PHILIP into sending his lumbering Armada into the Channel, and then had their own distinguished share in the good work of worrying it out again. Besides, Plymouth Sound is the fittest spot in the world for a water frolic, which is, we suppose, the form the celebration is to take, partly, if not wholly. We trust the frolic will be held, and will be very gay; and that the approaching summer in South Devon will not be so warm as to make everybody too limp to enjoy him or herself. If the show is to be organized, as it should be, on the Flemish scale, and properly adapted to the place, it ought to be worth seeing.

In the meantime Plymouth has decided to make a record of the occasion in the form of a "monument for ever" which is to stand on the Hoe. As is most becoming a former townsman has been chosen to do the work. We shall not express any opinion as to the value of Mr. HERBERT A. GRIBBLE'S design. His shaft, surmounted by a statue of Britannia, his laurel wreaths and medallions of Armada heroes, his bronze bas-reliefs, his statues of an old Viking and of Vigilance, his anchor and cannon balls of the period, may all combine to produce a good effect, but no monument can be called good till it is finished. A severe regard for consistency would perhaps lead to the exclusion of the Viking, who is not quite in place in a monument designed to record the defeat of an invasion. The defence of the shores of England was not what one generally associates with the name of the Vikings, and, on the whole, SALVATION YEO would be much more in place. The Tercentenary Memorial General Committee has shown itself so sensible that perhaps it will listen to this suggestion. A proposal has been made to use up the statue of DRAKE, which has already been erected—and it has been very properly rejected. Sir FRANCIS is very well entitled to his statue, and can very well stand by himself, but he ought not to be the only prominent figure in a monument to the "heroes of "the Armada." If he is to be there larger than life, then Lord HOWARD of Effingham, Sir JOHN HAWKINS, and Sir MARTIN FROBISHER ought to have the same honour, to say nothing of Lord THOMAS HOWARD and Sir WILLIAM WINTER. The Memorial Committee has, therefore, done well in deciding not to sacrifice other names to DRAKE'S, or commit itself to the erection of a Brobdingnagian monument. The first Englishman and the first commander of any nation who circumnavigated the globe ought to have a record to himself. But the defeat of the Armada was not the work of one man—or even of six or seven. It was done by the English people, and by every class in it acting together spontaneously. If the fit sculptor could only be found, it would be better that the figures, if there must be any, should represent types rather than individuals. If a portrait-statue must be there, then it should be the statue of Queen ELIZABETH, for when everything has been said that malice and bad criticism can say, it was she who governed this country, and prepared the defeat of the Armada. But the Committee, which will have to pay for the monument, is entitled to choose the design for itself; and, since it has chosen, there is little good in pointing out that it might have made a better choice—or at least that it might have had better things to select from. For the rest, there is no reason why Mr. GRIBBLE's materials should not combine into a fine monument, worthy to stand for ever on the Hoe, a pleasing object to townsmen and visitors. It is not often that architects and sculptors get such a chance as this; and, as there is rather a craze for setting up statues and memorials all over the world now, it is better they should rise for great historic events than to successful railway contractors or small celebrities of the political kind.

THE GOOD LAWYER AND THE BAD CASE.

NOTHING could more vividly illustrate the confusion into which Mr. GLADSTONE's sudden abandonment of the offensive in Parliament has thrown his party than the crowd of notices which jostled each other on the Order Book last Thursday night, under the common heading of "Public Meetings in the Metropolis." First on the list stood Sir CHARLES RUSSELL's reformed, or "converted," resolution—that shorn and enfeebled formula whose sole strength lay in that portion of it which Mr. GLADSTONE's hand so ruthlessly clipped off. Then followed the proposition embodying Mr. BRADLAUGH's revolt against these craven counsels of his chief, and claiming a full and public inquiry into the alleged unlawful assembly in Trafalgar Square of the 13th of November last, and the conduct of the police in connexion therewith. Whom succeeded the thoughtful Professor STUART, dissatisfied with his predecessor's mere empirical treatment of external symptoms, and going, statesmanlike, to the root of the malady, with the declaration that "the police of the metropolis ought to be placed under "the control of the ratepayers of the metropolis, by means "of a properly constituted municipal authority." And the rear was brought up by "ATHERLEY JONES the Liberator," and "the People's PICKERSGILL," one inviting the House to affirm the undoubted right of HER MAJESTY's subjects to assemble, &c., and the other contented, with the humility of the truly great, to repeat Mr. BRADLAUGH's own amendment, almost in Mr. BRADLAUGH's gracious words. This, it will be admitted, is not exactly a picture of brethren dwelling together in unity; but it is hard to blame the quasi-mutineers who have thus broken away from their commander. No man with a sense of the ridiculous, to say nothing of the sentiment of self-respect, can be severely condemned for objecting to be confined within the limits of such a formula as Sir CHARLES RUSSELL's. It is desirable, says that eminently cautious proposition, that "an inquiry should be instituted by a "Committee of this House into the conditions subject to "which open-air public meetings may be held in the metropolis, and the limits of the right of interference there-"with of the Executive Government." A Committee of the House of Commons, in other words, is to be appointed to hold a solemn investigation into the "conditions" and "limits" in question, and then as solemnly to record their twofold conclusion—(1) that public meetings may be held, subject to the conditions that their purpose is lawful, and that their behaviour is not calculated to cause terror to the inhabitants of the district; and (2) that the right of Executive interference with them is coextensive with their failure to conform to these conditions. If Sir CHARLES RUSSELL, or rather Sir CHARLES RUSSELL's leader, deemed it politic to confine himself to such truisms as this, there was no reason, the malcontents might well urge, why they should associate themselves with so idle a performance.

Fortunately, however, for a speech which, as it was, fell far short of the speaker's usual standard of performance, Sir CHARLES RUSSELL was not bound to stick closely to his text. As a sound lawyer, he knows better than most men what really are the "conditions" of lawful public meeting and the "limits" of the right of Executive interference; and his argument was throughout so framed as to suggest, without openly affirming, that the conditions of lawful public meeting existed at Trafalgar Square on the 13th of last November, and that the Executive, in prohibiting the meeting announced for that day and place, overstepped the legitimate limits of interference. Considering, however, how clear on the merits is the contrary contention, it follows that, even confining himself to suggestion and eschewing direct affirmation, Sir CHARLES RUSSELL undertook a sufficiently arduous task. In order to make even so much as a show of accomplishing it, he was compelled to devote the first half of his speech to the establishment of a proposition which, whether true or not, is irrelevant, and throughout the second half of it studiously to shirk an encounter with the actual facts of the situation in November last. The proposition which he so industriously laboured in the earlier portion of his argument need not detain us for a moment. Even if we assume, as Mr. MATTHEWS judiciously consented to assume for the sake of argument, that the right of the Crown to control the use of Trafalgar Square by the public was claimed incorrectly in point of law by the Government, we do not get one inch nearer to the determination of the question whether certain Radical clubs had a right to use, or the Executive a right to prevent them using, the Square for the purposes contemplated on the 13th of last November. That question depends upon two others—first, whether the public user of the Square did or did not invest the promoters of the prohibited meeting with a primâ facie right to hold a meeting there; and, secondly, whether this right was or was not liable to be, and was or was not in fact, defeated by the nonexistence of those "conditions" which figured so prominently in Sir CHARLES RUSSELL's resolution, and received so little discussion in Sir CHARLES RUSSELL's speech. Had he succeeded in proving the affirmative of the former of these propositions, he would then only have been brought face to face with the fact that the Government claim to have overthrown it by proving the affirmative of the latter. As a matter of fact, he could not and did not succeed in even proving the affirmative of the former. The public user of the Square, as was laid down, with, we believe, the universal approval of lawyers, by Mr. Justice CHARLES, imports no further or other rights over it than is imported by the public user of any other London thoroughfare. That is to say, it imports a right to make use of it, as of other thoroughfares, primarily for the purpose of transit from place to place; and, secondarily, for such other purposes as are consistent with the convenience and security of other members of the community. The mere fact that meetings have been frequently held, and allowed to be held, in the Square, can no more have created a "right" to use it for such a purpose than the fact referred to in the debate, that crowds are in the habit of collecting outside the publishing offices of certain sporting newspapers has created a right to perpetuate that particular form of street obstruction. That the public can "prescribe" against an individual landowner to the limitation of his full normal rights of proprietorship is admitted in every law suit over a disputed right of way; but it would be a monstrous extension of this legal doctrine to hold that a minority of the public can prescribe against the majority, so as not merely to limit, but to annihilate, their concurrent right of transit over a particular piece of land.

Even supposing, therefore, that there were a right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square, it would be impossible for any man of common sense, to say nothing of a lawyer, to contend that it is more than a conditional right, and one liable to be defeated on coming into conflict with other rights of the general community. It was incumbent, therefore, upon Sir CHARLES RUSSELL to address himself to the question whether it had or had not come into conflict with any rights in the case of the proposed meeting. How far aloof he held himself from this question may be judged from the almost incredible circumstance that from the beginning to the end of the speech he made no reference whatever to the fact that the meetings in Trafalgar Square had even so much as been alleged to have created any inconvenience, let alone any danger, to the public. To listen to him one might have thought that people had never met in the Square for any other purpose or in any other mood than that of a Social Science Congress. We might have fancied that no meeting in the Square had ever been entertained with inflammatory speeches or broken up into riotous and predatory processions, and that the looting of the West End in February 1886 was a mere nightmare. Yet these incidents, and the alarm inspired by them, constitute that very case of the Government with which it was Sir CHARLES RUSSELL's business to grapple. As a lawyer he [illegible] and did not contest the proposition that an [illegible] ful meeting will become unlawful when [illegible] cause reasonable alarm to the inhabitants [illegible] in which it is held. He did not even [illegible] so many words that the meeting [illegible] November was [illegible] could only [illegible] meetings in Trafalgar Square has been made general and permanent, whereas it ought, he contended, only to hold good for the particular occasion on which the prohibition was originally issued. But why so? If, and so long as the alarm which justified it continues, why should not the prohibition hold good? And we should like to know whether Sir CHARLES RUSSELL is prepared to assert that the alarm does not continue, or at least that it would not at once revive if the prohibition were removed. His whole speech was a melancholy example of the total failure of even the ablest advocate to deal with a certain kind of hopeless cases. We should pity any lawyer who was forced to undertake such a task as Sir CHARLES RUSSELL had, and if we do not pity him, it is only because he undertook it, not under compulsion, but as a rash and misguided volunteer.

THE WAR OFFICE MEMORANDUM.

THE Memorandum published by the War Office to prepare the minds of members of Parliament for the due discussion of the Estimates is a truly remarkable document. It is not that the results it has to report are so wonderful, though it shows an addition to our effective force of 275 men (an important increase of strength, nearly equal to a German infantry company on the peace footing), and a simultaneous decrease in the Estimates of 152,019*l.* Neither does its merit lie in the absence of a supplementary estimate for the first time in eight years. A supplementary estimate may be a necessary and even welcome thing. Besides, more money is to be asked for, and rightly too; and, after all, the difference between asking for more and presenting supplementary estimates is practically not great. The wonderfulness of the Memorandum does not lie in the multiplicity of its details, though it touches on more subjects than the unassisted human head can hold after one reading. Neither is it the cheerful confidence of the Memorandum which fills us with the patriotic pride and amazed delight which are, for the moment, the emotions of the Saturday Review. Mr. STANHOPE does, indeed, tell us that our army is ready to supply all needful garrisons, to meet the calls of any of "those small wars so common in "our history," and turn out two army corps for a more serious business, ready to go anywhere and do anything; that the regiments first on the roster for service abroad are in an unprecedented state of efficiency; that—that, in short, barring a few deficiencies, such as the total want of tents and transport for a second corps, Militia, and Volunteers; the absence of any reserve of artillery when our two corps army is in the field (we supply Mr. STANHOPE with this detail); the want of horses, and a few trifles of that sort not worth mentioning, our army is as near perfection as it is given to the work of the erring race of human kind to attain. Something like this we have heard before. It is not in any of these things that the wonderfulness of the War Office Memorandum consists.

Its peculiar and original merits are a certain lofty thoroughness of view, a comprehensiveness of grasp, and a manful facing of the fact that the duty of the War Office is to supply efficient defences, and not only to avoid expenditure. "It is, perhaps, characteristic of the want of thorough- "ness which has too often marked our military prepara- "tions," says Mr. STANHOPE, speaking of Lord PALMERSTON'S defence scheme, "that the cost of the armaments correspond- "ing to these fortifications, which was to have been borne "on the annual Estimates, was not provided till a later "period." When the War Office is found talking about want of thoroughness in our military preparations, it is clear that the abundant criticism of late years has not been wholly wasted. Things will be materially altered when the Department counts want of thoroughness as the greatest, or even as only a very great, sin. Its gradual conversion to that view ought by no means to be checked, and so it may be heartily praised for the progress it has made. The transfer of the cost of transporting troops from the Navy to the Army Budget, and of naval ordnance from the Army to the Navy, together with the much-talked reorganization of the War Office, belong to those incessant reforms which delight the official mind, but are, after all, mere readjustments and changes of names. Provided the work is well done, it does not much matter under what [illegible] it is done. But to find the War Office forming a [illegible] comprehensive scheme, and trying to carry it out, is [illegible] a change for the better. Mr. STANHOPE'S Memorandum shows that at least he has something like an aim and a plan. To settle that we must be able to meet small wars without disturbance, to provide two army corps without depleting the garrisons for a great war, to make your mind up as to what ports ought to be fortified and how, and, best of all, to come to Parliament with a request for 3,000,000*l.* to pay for guns and fortifications to be supplied at once—this is to have a policy. As it is so much better to have even an insufficient policy than none at all, we need not be extreme in inquiring whether the War Office has decided to do all that might with advantage be done. The ports of war are to be put in a position to defend themselves without the constant presence of a squadron. The coaling-stations are in course of being fitted with teeth and claws for the terror of hostile cruisers; mercantile ports are to be armed according to their importance. Steps are being taken to improve the weapons of the army in pattern, and test their quality properly. The Volunteers are being helped to provide themselves with transport, and the beginning of a field artillery is being made for them. The effort is as yet feeble and tentative, but it is better than none. When the War Office, having taken the plunge, has become used to the surrounding temperature, it may be asked whether it would as much as be possible to send our two corps abroad in case of a great war in Western Europe till another army capable of marching and manœuvring had been provided for the defence of the coast. What the answer will be after a little experience of thoroughness the ingenious reader may judge.

WINTER IN THE AUSTRIAN ALPS.

WINTER in the Lower Alps is not very different from what it is in the plains below, but in the higher mountains it assumes quite a new character. Even there, it is true that the late autumn and early spring are intensely disagreeable. The constant succession of snow-storms and thaws renders walking all but impossible, and the outside world is cheerless with leaden skies and drifting mists. Indoors things are not much better; the winds that whistle up the valleys pierce the double windows, and it is days before even the huge tile stoves can thoroughly warm rooms that have stood unoccupied for weeks. But when the cold at last sets in one may reckon with considerable certainty on from six weeks to two months of clear, bright, frosty weather, when for a man in good health mere existence becomes a joy. The fogs that are the curse of the lower valleys are then unknown on the heights. A sun of an Italian splendour shines from a cloudless heaven. Every waterfall and mill-dam is set in a glittering frame of icicles. The snow is crisp underfoot and soon forms the smoothest of paths for the sledges. The air is motionless, and though the thermometer falls from $-13°$ to $-19°$ C., the cold is not unpleasant in the light, dry air, at least for those who take the precautions of Sam Weller's Polar bear, and are well wrapt up before they go skating.

It has been said that fogs are unknown at this season, but at sunrise and sunset, and sometimes in the moonlight, a thin veil of silvery mist may be seen hanging over the larger brooks, and from a height their course may be traced for miles by means of it. It generally vanishes long before noon, but occasionally spreads to some distance on either side. In the immediate vicinity it is hardly perceptible, but it transforms all the more distant views. The snowy peaks are still distinctly visible, but they seem invested in a strange mystery, and when on such occasions the sunset lights glow upon them, they seem to belong to another world than ours—a world in which, if we could penetrate it, we might find the castle of the Holy Grail. In our world, meanwhile, the common cares of life continue, and fortunately there is winter work to be done. Before the continued cold begins there is usually a heavy snowfall, which blocks all the thoroughfares. Then, at least on the roads that are acknowledged to possess an Imperial interest, the snow-plough has to do its work. From eight to twelve pair of horses are hired and harnessed to the unwieldy machine, and it is a merry sight to see the foremost plunging through snow that reaches high above their knees, while the riders shout, swear, and gesticulate, and seem altogether to be having a good time, as indeed they are, since they have a right to stop at certain wayside inns, where the Government pays the score. The snow-plough, while it opens up a way between the villages, makes new work in each, as it heaps up the loose snow on both sides of the street in such a way as to render the doorways impassable until it has been carted away.

The purpose for which the plough is used is not so much to remove the surface snow as to press what remains into a firm track for the sledges; and it has, therefore, to be employed with some caution. If it goes its rounds before a sufficient quantity of snow has fallen, it pushes the whole of it away; and, as wheeled vehicles are useless during the winter, it thus renders part of the road impassable. If, on the other hand, too much snow is allowed to accumulate, it becomes difficult to force a passage through it. It is generally thought that it ought to be used when forty centimetres have fallen; but this is a matter which must to a great extent be left to the judgment of the single inspector. If the district under his charge is large, it will frequently happen that the fall is heavy in some parts of it, while in others it barely suffices for the sledges. This is particularly the case when the road leads up a mountain valley with side openings. In such districts it is impossible to lay down any fixed general rules.

The mere removal of the snow from the streets and courts gives work for almost every honest labourer who would otherwise be unemployed; the ice harvest is a still more fruitful source of gain to those who depend on stray jobs. A large quantity of ice is yearly exported from the Southern Alps to Northern Italy, and this involves a good deal of labour, as the solid blocks must be hewn out of the surface of the lakes, carted to the nearest railway-station, and carefully packed there. The Alpine innkeepers who have ice-cellars are usually contented with the huge icicles that can be procured from the nearest mill-run. These are broken into small pieces, and stored away in underground cellars, where they are crushed together so as to form in a few days a single solid mass. The Italian dealers, however, will have nothing to do with wares of this kind. They say they melt more easily, and they can easily be known by their fracture, and also by their colour when large blocks are taken. Thus the higher lakes become, if not gold, yet copper, mines when the winter frost sets in, if only they are near enough to a railway-station.

The chief winter work, however, consists in bringing down the hay and timber from the upland meadows and woods. In such of the former as are not used for alms, the grass is mown twice, or even thrice, in the course of the summer, and the hay is stored away in rough block-houses upon the heights. As soon as a sufficient quantity of snow has fallen, it is brought down to the valleys. For this purpose mountain sledges are used. As they are mere skeletons, though large and strongly built, they are light enough for a single man to be able to draw them up to the heights, though this is hard work, particularly before the snow has been trodden down. When they have once reached their destination, they are placed on the verge of the steepest declivity, free from woods and precipices, that can be found, and there loaded, the hay being firmly bound upon them, and then pushed down the mountain-side. The first day's labour is heavy; but, as soon as a track has been formed, the descent, at least, is easy and merry enough. An impetus is given to the sledge, the driver springs up in front, with his legs suspended between the two handles, and the vehicle rushes rapidly down the steep incline. If it is desirable to retard the speed or alter the course, the driver can do so by digging his heel into the snow on either side; in other cases he keeps his knees slightly bent to prevent his feet touching the ground. When seen from below the headlong career looks dangerous, and it must be confessed that accidents frequently occur, but they rarely end in anything worse than a tumble in the snow. The sledge that has been deprived of its driver usually behaves with discretion, and arrives at the bottom of the slope as safely as if it were still under his charge. Of course a single track is not used at the same hours for ascending and descending.

The timber that has been hewn in the autumn is brought down from the mountains in exactly the same way, and in either case, when the loads are heavy, horses are harnessed to the sledges as soon as they reach the level ground. But sledges can only be loaded with timber on an open place above a clear and direct slope, and in order to collect the single trunks in such an opening another contrivance is used. Felling in well-regulated forests is always confined to certain portions of the woods, and from each of these a pathway is broken to what may almost be called the great timber-yard below. Along these paths stems of an equal size are laid side by side. The first snow shower or heavy rain followed by a frost binds them together, so that they form a course as smooth and certain as a railway, and down them the trunks felled in the upper woods are shot. If one happens to glide to either side, the stoppage is easily remedied. But this does not often happen, and the continual downflow of timber is one of the most interesting sights that can be witnessed on the uplands in the early winter. The branches are, of course, lopped from the trunks before they are sent on their apparently perilous way. For the most part they belong by law to the inhabitants of the neighbouring villages, who are left to bring them down as best they can. As the stems are dressed early in the autumn, there is no injustice in this arrangement. The villagers either themselves appear or send representatives up to the scene of operations, and the loose firewood is divided in just proportions between them. The poorer peasants generally bring it down on their own backs or those of their wives and daughters while it is still green; the richer let it lie till the hay has been safely housed, as they believe that the frost and even the frozen snow, if it be carefully knocked off before the wood is stored, improves its quality for burning purposes. Wood that has once been thoroughly frozen gives more heat, they say. Such fuel is brought down either with or after the hay.

In places where amusement is sought, many other sources of profit are, of course, open to the poor. The sweeping of snow from the surface of lakes, which would otherwise be inaccessible to skaters, is one of the most profitable of these, but it is usually let to enterprising capitalists in a small way of business, who provide the labour and charge "ice-money"—that is to say, who take a toll of a few pence from every one who wishes to skate on the parts of the lakes which they have swept. The formation of private ice-grounds which may be used either for skating or other purposes is also a source of profit for the well-to-do and of employment for the poor. But an account of these things had perhaps better be left for another article. It is something to be able to say that no Austrian who has a right of residence need suffer either from cold or hunger in the Alpine villages during the winter, if he is willing and able to do hard work, and that, if he is physically incapable of it, he will be amply and even tenderly cared for by his neighbours and public charity. If he is simply lazy and improvident, his life, it must be confessed, is not likely to be agreeable.

FRAGMENT OF THE TWENTIETH PROVINCIALE.

[To discuss at length the many curious problems presented by this hitherto unpublished fragment, apparently, of Blaise Pascal's work would be impossible, and perhaps unnecessary. It is enough to say that for the convenience of students the passages which textually agree (in a few cases tenses and pronouns being altered to suit context) with Mr. Gladstone's recently published correspondence with Mr. Arnold White are printed in italics; passages which textually reproduce the words of the already known Provincial Letters are put within inverted commas. It may be permitted to remind those who have a little forgotten their Pascal that the Letters are from the supposed Louis de Montalte to a friend, reporting interviews with a distinguished Jesuit. Few more surprising prophecies or fulfilments or coincidences, whichever word may be preferred, have ever been recorded than this, in which "the good fathers" generally may, it seems, be taken for the Gladstone-Parnell party.]

. . . . On my last visit to our venerable friend I presented myself before him in some trouble of spirit. I reminded him that not long ago I had been engaged in some political matters for the good fathers of his Society, and that I was able to deliver to the persons concerned a message from himself. He had therein bidden them to bethink themselves well on the position in which they stood, to look back upon the history of the past and forwards in the prospects of the future, to listen to prudence and courage and honour. I did not tell him that this requisition of a kind of Janus-faculty from the common people had seemed to me excessive, but I showed my satisfaction at the mention of prudence, courage, and honour, as guides of the political conduct of all honest men. At this he appeared pleased, for the good father is not like the blessed St. Patrick, whose modesty was so great that when they read to him hymns composed in his honour, it was necessary to omit the stanzas where his name occurred, and to explain that in poetry the superlative is sometimes put for the positive. Then I continued. He had, I said, more recently expressed himself in public concerning a certain thing called the Plan of Campaign, which, my friend, as you will doubtless know, is a device already pronounced to be contrary to human law, whereby the friends of the good fathers in Ireland retain so much as pleases them of the debts due to the good fathers' enemies. I said that he had never, so far as I could discover, denounced this plan in the simple and straightforward language which [his countrymen] like and understand; that, so far from being denounced, it was condoned and even warranted by him, and that any person looking to him for a conscience [here I thought that he showed a curious tendency to frown, to smile, and to blush at the same time] would be justified in combining with others in a similar way for any purposes. I said that so long as the Ten Commandments were not repealed, this plan would continue to seem to many unrighteous and dishonourable; that I feared no party condoning it could receive the support of those who prefer the principle of justice to the principle of tactical expediency, that the Plan was either morally and politically right or morally and politically wrong, that I could not silently bear the strain of condoning its dishonesty, with much more to the same effect.

He replied to me "with a great deal of sweetness, for he is seriously afflicted by all this disorder," that any communication from me commanded his sincere respect. But he thought my reference inaccurate, if by condoning the Plan of Campaign I meant anything more than this, that he had treated the Plan as an evil which may have averted greater evils. He had quoted the Swing fires [which have hitherto been put in force in Ireland imperfectly and only against animals] in a like view, but he had not condoned the Swing fires. And then he pointed out to me how this distinction of his was supported by the best authorities among the good fathers, while some of those authorities had gone even further than he had in similar cases. Thus Father Bauny had established this great maxim in favour of those who were not content with their wages—clearly a parallel case. "Servants," says that good father, "who have complaints to make of their wages may increase them by laying their hands on as much of their master's property as they think necessary to adjust these wages to their work." This, he remarked to me, should be read:—Deduct as much of their rent as is sufficient to adjust it to the value of their farms, and you have the precise equivalent. Further, Father Bauny alleges as a justification of this exactly the case of the Irish campaigners, saying that the servants in question may act in the manner defined "when they have been so poor at the time of [making the contract] seeking service that they were obliged to take it at the terms offered." Here I reminded him that this doctrine had actually once been put in practice, and that in the case of Rex v. Alba a distinguished judge had laid down that it was a doctrine "illicit, pernicious, contrary to all law, natural, divine, and human, capable of upsetting all domestic order." But he was quick to reply to me that for a long course of centuries in Ireland law and order had been called in aid of and made a cover for the most wicked and cruel wrongs, and he had therefore nothing to do with this judicial dictum. He then continued to argue his general principle of treating things as evils which may have averted greater evils. I interrupted him by referring to another dictum about doing evil that good might come; but here he rebuked me severely. "I understood very little of the matter," said he; "the authors of this dictum were good as far as regarded the morality of their own time, but they were too far off for ours." And he produced, as an instance of this necessary development, the well-known fact that "Sotus [how justly named!] and Lessius said that it was not lawful to kill the false witness and the judge who [as in the case of the martyrs Brady and Kelly] conspire to kill an innocent; but Emanuel Sa and others disapproved of this." And he alleged a dictum even more pertinent—to wit, the famous maxim that, "If a religious person should lay aside his habit when he visits disorderly houses or goes a-picking pockets, he ought not to be excommunicated." For, though the leaving off the habit is an evil, and not to be condoned, yet the scandal brought on the habit would be a greater evil, and this the taking secular garb may have averted. So also, the illegal retaining of rent is an evil, and not to be condoned, but the possible deprivation of funds which might happen to those friends of our good fathers, the holy Irish agitators, would be a worse. I asked him whether the term "evil" was not ambiguously employed here, inasmuch as the Plan of Campaign seemed to me a moral evil, while any possible consequence that could follow the payment of rent was at the most an economic disaster or a personal loss. But "while speaking very amiably to me, for he loves me still," he rebuked me, and said this distinguishing two sorts of evil was casuistry. And he bade me take particular attention to see that his language was marked by care and caution.

In reply to this I frankly owned that no want of care or caution had marked his language in regard to the Plan of Campaign; but that I feared the construction likely to be placed on it by ignorant men would lend by implication his authority to means in themselves bad. And further, I asked his permission to publish this conversation to you, my friend, and others interested. He replied (for it is in vain to address him with irony) that he was glad to mark that his words bore in my sight a more favourable construction, and that, of course, they were liable to misinterpretation. He seemed a little chagrined at the notion of publication, saying that this was a personal correspondence, but added that he should not object. And indeed I know not why he should, seeing that whatever you, my friend, and I, and others may think of his language, it has the amplest support in the writings of the good fathers. He might have quoted to me many venerable names besides those mentioned above. Thus, for instance, the maxim of the great Escobar himself that "no one is obliged to fast who finds that he cannot sleep without supper," whence it follows that no one is obliged to pay his rent who finds that, if he did, it would be necessary to curtail his supplies of whisky. And yet again Vasquez saith:—"That which men keep in order to improve their condition and that of their relations is not superfluity," or surplus. Now it is acknowledged that rent is surplus profit; therefore tenants are not bound to pay rent, though they may have balances in the bank. Consider, too, that of Filiutius:—"The laws of the Church [and how much more, therefore, of the State?] lose their authority when they are not obeyed." Now this of itself justifies, not merely the Plan of Campaign, but the whole conduct of those who support it; and is, indeed, as I understand, the exact plea of their defenders. And Sanchez and Castrus Paläus say that, when two opinions are held on a disputed point, it is permitted to a man to take that quæ sibi gratior fuerit, and in the same breath that "the command of the Superior [i.e. the Government], though just, need not be obeyed" in certain cases. This again comports a complete justification of all that is done in the Isle of Saints.

This and much more might our good father have said had he chosen, but doubtless his time was precious. And yet, my friend, I must repeat that I am not convinced, and that I prefer the obscurity of political death to conniving at that which is inconsistent with the older forms of prudence, courage, and honour, though it may be approved or condoned by Bauny, Escobar, Sanchez, Vasquez, Diana, Filiutius, and Mr. . . . .

EXHIBITIONS.

THE result of the co-operation of "the most distinguished artists of the day" in illustrating Shakspeare's heroines for the Graphic is far from being entirely satisfactory. Some of these painters are distinguished for anything but good qualities, and they are ill advised to venture out of the crowded seclusion of the Academy into the more lonely eminence of a small show of twenty-one canvases. Thus the Graphic Gallery in Brook Street presents an inequality of workmanship and artistic feeling both undesirable and unnecessary in the case of so small a collection. One thing we must say for these artists that could not be said of some men with the most special genius for paint. Most of them seem to have studied Shakspeare intelligently, and to have understood that they were bound to illustrate a character and a writer, not only to do their best at painting any figure anyhow. Some of the pictures, however, are so very poor in workmanship that they look like work transcribed from good originals by copyists who have had no further training than copying from the flat. The purpose of modelling seems to be overlooked, and the charm of deft suggestion of various planes on the flat almost totally ignored, while the nobler uses of handling in emphasising character and supporting style are replaced by a cult of insignificant neatness. Sir Frederick Leighton and Mr. Frank Dicksee have perhaps searched the most effectually for elevation of type and style. The President's charming picture of Desdemona, leaning forward intent on Othello's adventures, and Mr. Dicksee's finely draped head and bust of Beatrice, both show a considerable amount of grace and dignity. Others have been conceived with a powerful and painter-like realization of circumstance and effect, as Mr. Alma Tadema's original and strange-looking "Portia, wife of Brutus," in which the elaboration of the moonlit bald head surely verges on levity; Mr. J. W. Waterhouse's "Cleopatra," a picture very true and strong as to large facts of construction, but showing a hard, cold, and unpleasantly black young man, rather than a voluptuous woman; Mr. Henry Wood's "Portia," with a charming Venetian background of sea, sky, and glimmering houses seen through a sunny, summer haze; and Mr. Herbert Schmalz's firmly drawn and nicely worked presentment of Imogen approaching the cave. That capricious, unequal, but always interesting artist, Mr. R. W. Macbeth, has also illustrated Rosalind with due surroundings in a suggestive and personal, if hardly realistic, way. Anne Page is also shown by Mr. G. D. Leslie in a trim and neat Elizabethan garden. The painting of the house, garden wall, and other surroundings please one more than the figure. Mr. Calderon puts Juliet on her balcony in the moonlight. The work is serious and of his best sort; his figure, however, appears to us of rather a sickly yellow, as well as much too old and lackadaisical for Shakspeare's impetuous child of fourteen. Mr. P. R. Morris has done one of his best things in "Audrey." The type is most happily found, and the main masses of light are kept right in tone; it is a pity, then, that we should see in the modelling of the arms, &c., any of that lamentable carelessness which so often ruins his work. Mr. Blair Leighton's "Olivia," in spite of a look of confused overcrowding, will be found on inspection excellently drawn and full of careful, conscientious painting. Mr. L. Fildes's "Jessica" is below his average; Mr. C. E. Perugini's "Silvia" is tame; Mrs. Alma Tadema's "Katharine of France" a delicate and picturesque piece of work, especially in the rendering of costumes, and Mr. Poynter's "Cressida" rather a weird and dreary revival of some archaic Greek type than an illustration of the Shakspearian ideal of lightness and perfidy. Whatever we may think of Mr. Long's method of painting, we must admit that he has managed to give us a convincing view of the devil that was in Katharine, the Shrew. The remaining pictures are the work of Messrs. Marcus Stone, Val Prinsep, W. F. Yeames, F. W. W. Topham, and F. Goodall. To each of the titles in the Catalogue is attached a very readable account by Mr. W. E. Henley of the play from which the character is taken. It was surely hardly necessary, however, to assume on the part of the public such an entire ignorance of the plots of Shakspeare's plays.

Messrs. Dowdeswell have two collections of paintings on view, a set of pictures and sketches in oil made by Mr. Edwin Hayes during the past twenty years, and a small exhibition of Mr. A. Ludovici's work. Mr. Hayes's art must be very familiar to the public, but those who have only seen his large and more formal pictures in the exhibitions will be agreeably surprised by the vivacity and charm of many of his small sketches. Some of these—too many to treat of in detail—are charming in their well-balanced arrangement, their pleasant lively handling, and their artistic suggestion of the main features of coast scenery. Perhaps we might call "Mills at Ostend" (121), a stretch of flat Dutch country, and "Margate Cliffs" (122), with its pleasant tones of warm chalk, the best of all. Mere notes as they are, they have that accidental sort of variety in colour, that grasp of broad effect in tone, that magical and aerial suggestion of form which please artists more than all the laborious niggling of a person who can only see a view piecemeal. Mr. Hayes, on the whole, is rather an elegant painter than a keen observer or a striking and original realist. His brushwork is often effective, as may be remarked in the spirit and ease with which the waves dashing over the foreground in "Constantine Bay" (2) are treated, in the clever and suggestive "drag" of the light on the water in "Mount Batten Island" (73), in the touches that model the surface of the sea in "Study of Sea" (61), and in the artistic confusion of "Mount's Bay, Cornwall" (22). A fine quality of colour has been obtained in "Dordrecht on the Maas" (31), "Mount's Bay" (8), and many others. By looking about one observes a slight tendency to cold unaerial blues in clouds and open sky. This fault, rare in the sketches, becomes pronounced in the large pictures, of which there are three examples. In "North-West Gale" (127), for instance, the uniform cold lead of the lower clouds, unbroken as it is by any play of colour, displeases the eye and gives an appearance of weakness and falseness happily absent from most of the sketches. The power of the colour scheme is not increased in proportion to the size of the canvas. Moreover, by enlargement the handling loses significance and charm, the sea liquidity and feeling of freedom, and the convention of the style becomes too thin and apparent. Mr. Hayes would require an altogether bolder style of work to produce on a large canvas the effect of freshness and vigorous broken colour that he has got in the atmospheric sky of the little "Mount's Bay" (8).

Mr. Ludovici's sketches in oil and water-colour are called "Dots, Notes, Spots." Splashes and Blots would better describe his manner than Dots and Spots. Some Whistler, some Van Beers, some Clara Montalba, dilute the natural Ludovici, at times with pleasing effect. The artist has some peculiar habits of his own, especially in the drawing of legs and in the exhibiting of spots, which should be kept in the studio till they happen to suggest a picture. We are not raising a Philistine outcry for finish, meaning thereby plenty of elaboration in drawing, tone, and colour; for the vaguer Mr. Ludovici remains the better. His "made out," comparatively big canvases are an utter failure, while many of the smaller suggestions are charming arrangements of decorative colour. Such amongst the oils are "A Query" (3), "Fantasia in Black" (4), and "Harmony in Grey (Pierrette)" (16). "The Dog Cart" (25) pushes to affectation a good style of painting in true tones on rough canvas without details. "Southampton Waters" (32) and "On the Quay, Boulogne" (48), are fresh water-colour blots nicely dabbed in. We keep the best to the last. This is "A Study in Brown" (6), a really serious and artistic sketch of a warm, candle-lit interior steeped in rich tones, leading up to a fine note of red in the bow on a child's shoulder.

THE METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAY COMPANY.

THE formidable opposition offered to the re-election of Mr. Forbes and Lord Gort at the meeting of the shareholders of the Metropolitan District Railway Company this week is a natural result of the Directors' Report for the second half of last year, issued the other day. How very formidable that opposition was is apparent from the statement made by Mr. Forbes himself of the number of proxies sent to the Directors and to the opposition. Roughly the opposition received proxies representing about seven-ninths of the total number sent in. In other words, there were seven for the opposition to nine for the Directors; and these figures are all the more significant when we bear in mind that all that was proposed by the opposition was the postponement of the adoption of a part of the Report and of the re-election of the Chairman and Lord Gort until a searching inquiry had been instituted into the accounts. Apparently the opposition were not prepared with a substitute for the Chairman. Had the amendment been carried, it is very probable that Mr. Forbes would at once have withdrawn from the Board, and thus the Company would have been left without a chief. Many persons, utterly dissatisfied with the present management, were not ready to face such an eventuality. They desired to know who was to be the ruling spirit before they rejected Mr. Forbes; and yet, as we see, the proxies given to the opposition constituted an exceedingly large proportion of all the proxies sent in. It must be confessed that the Directors' Report furnishes solid ground for the dissatisfaction thus evinced. It appears that, comparing the second half of last year with the second half of 1886, there was a loss of passengers amounting to the enormous number of four millions—equal practically to the whole population of the metropolis. As the result, the net revenue shows a falling off, comparing again the same two half-years, of 36,572*l.*; the consequence being that there is no dividend for the preference shareholders, while the prospect of the ordinary shareholders ever receiving a dividend has become more and more remote. In their Report the Directors assign as reasons for this unfortunate state of things the cessation of exhibitions at South Kensington, the general depression, and the intensified competition of the omnibuses. It has been well observed, however, that, if the cessation of exhibitions at South Kensington has had so disastrous a result, then it follows that the Company has been living for years past upon mere windfalls, and consequently that the collapse that has now occurred would have come long ago had the exhibitions not been held. As for the general depression, it is not easy to see how it can affect the condition of the District Railway. General depression is a good explanation for a falling off in goods traffic; but it can hardly lessen the number of persons within the metropolis who have to travel from the suburbs to the City and other places of business. The real reasons of the collapse, no doubt, are more correctly stated in the circular issued by the Directors in reply to the circular sent out by the opposition—namely, the unprofitable investment of the Company in the "City" lines, constructed jointly with the Metropolitan at a cost to each Company of about a million and a quarter, and the fierce competition of the omnibuses. "The main thoroughfares of London, especially those running over or immediately parallel to the District Railway for its whole length from Aldgate to Charing Cross, Westminster, Hammersmith, and even to Fulham," says the Directors' circular above referred to, "have been improved, repaved, and relit at enormous cost to the ratepayers; horse provender has fallen to a price lower than ever was known, and the consequence has been an extraordinary development of the omnibus service, helped by fierce competition carried on between the Road Car Company and the General Omnibus Company, at fares so low as to be ruinous to one Company and very damaging to the other. Between them they have abstracted from the District a vast number of "short" passengers, with a loss of revenue estimated at about 25,000*l.* per annum.

At the shareholders' meeting some of the speakers comforted themselves with the hope that the fare-cutting of the omnibuses must some time or other come to an end, and that horse provender will not always be as cheap as at present; but this is cold comfort for the shareholders. There is no early prospect of any considerable rise in the price of horse provender, and the success of the omnibus Companies is likely to encourage them to compete still more keenly with the railway. The real hope must be in a change in the system of management. The Directors ought to recognize that their past policy has been proved unwise by the event, and they should so improve the accommodation they give to their customers, and so lower the fares, that they would attract back again the four millions of passengers who have been lost. The truth is that the Board believed they could dictate terms to the public. The atmosphere of the railway has been allowed to remain poisonous, and the accommodation in many respects requires improvement; while the omnibus Companies have been vigorously striving for the support of the public. Again, the unprofitableness of the "City lines" is very largely due to the antagonism between the District and the Metropolitan Company. Unfortunately the Chairmen of these two Companies are in conflict with one another, not only in the Metropolitan system, but also in the South. Mr. Forbes is Chairman of the Chatham and Dover as well as of the District, and Sir Edward Watkin is Chairman of the South-Eastern as well as of the Metropolitan. In both systems they are carrying out policies antagonistic one to the other, and there seems to have grown up a personal feeling out of this antagonism. The completion of the Inner Circle, which was to have done so much for the benefit of both Companies, has proved of no value. At the meeting Mr. Forbes confessed that the whole of the capital sunk in the "City lines" is practically returning no interest; but it is quite clear that this ought not to be the case if the two Companies were worked harmoniously one with the other and if they pursued a more far-sighted policy. Now that the Inner Circle is completed the two Companies ought obviously to be amalgamated. Their lines ar part of one system, and there is really not enough work to do for two staffs. Were the Companies amalgamated there would be but one Board and one staff, and, consequently, there would be a very considerable saving of expense. Still more important, there would be but one policy pursued. Unfortunately the antagonism between the Boards, and especially between the Chairmen, is such as to have rendered fruitless in the past all efforts at amalgamation. One of the reasons assigned by the opposition to Mr. Forbes's re-election was distinctly stated to be the impossibility of arriving at any understanding with the Metropolitan as long as he and Sir Edward Watkin remained at the head of the two Companies. It is no part of our business to take sides in the controversy between these two gentlemen or to attempt to apportion the blame between them. In the interests, not alone of the shareholders of the District Company, but of the travelling public also, it is, however, very clear that a good understanding of some kind ought to be established between the Companies. If amalgamation is out of the question, a working arrangement ought to be practicable; and now that so powerful a body of shareholders have taken the matter earnestly in hand, we hope they will persevere and insist that some such working arrangement should be arrived at.

There is one other point which ought to be striven for—namely, to connect the Metropolitan system with the greater systems North and South of London. We observed some weeks ago, when commenting upon the struggle between the Southern Companies, that it was absurd in the interests of the Companies, and very inconvenient for the travelling public, that a person arriving, let us say, at Dover, Folkestone, or Newhaven, cannot travel to Holyhead, or Edinburgh, or Glasgow, as the case might be, without changing carriage, and similarly that goods cannot be conveyed without breaking bulk. It would be very easy to establish connexion between the Metropolitan system and all the systems north and south of the Thames, and, indeed, communication of a kind already exists. The East London, for example, of which Sir Edward Watkin is also Chairman, is another unfortunate concern which might be utilized in establishing the communication between the Northern and the Southern systems. All the metropolitan Companies would benefit thereby; there would be considerable benefit likewise to the greater Companies; while the advantage to the travelling public is obvious. As it happens, Mr. Forbes and Sir Edward Watkin are in a very favourable position for carrying out such an arrangement. As we observed above, the one is Chairman both of the District and the Chatham and Dover Companies, and the other of the South-Eastern, the Metropolitan, and the East London Companies. They could very easily, therefore, establish a working arrangement between their Southern lines and the Metropolitan system if they could only once come to an understanding between themselves; and there ought to be no serious difficulty—and we apprehend, indeed, that there would be none—in coming to an agreement with the great lines north of the Thames. As a rule, the great lines are quite alive to the necessity of giving improved accommodation to their customers and of increasing the facilities they offer in every direction; but it is hopeless to look for any arrangement of the kind until the Boards of the Southern and of the Metropolitan Companies are brought into harmony, and we fear that this can be done only by the pressure of the shareholders of the two Companies. If the present state of things continues, it is they who will suffer most; whereas, if harmony is established, they will benefit most. In their hands, then, the remedy lies; and, unless they bestir themselves, the remedy will not be applied. Some of our contemporaries write as if they thought that the position of the District had become desperate. We do not think so. The original expenditure upon the line was no doubt enormous, and a great mistake was made when four tracks were not at once laid down; but yet it is to be borne in mind that the District serves a most important and constantly growing district, and that it needs but better management and a better understanding with the Metropolitan to regain the favour of the public. In weather such as we have been having of late the District has an enormous advantage over either omnibuses or cabs, and that advantage can only be squandered away by utter mismanagement. But, if the favour of the public is to be regained, the interests of the public must be considered; especially the atmosphere of the line must be improved, and some better accommodation likewise must be given.

FRENCH PLAYS.

M. COQUELIN has been engaged by M. Mayer for a series of performances at the Royalty which will last over seven weeks, and in which he will appear in a variety of his more famous impersonations, assisted by his son, M. Jean Coquelin, and by his brother, M. Coquelin cadet. We doubt whether it will be possible for him to select from his extensive repertory a play in which his talent is shown to greater advantage than in L'Étourdi, given on Monday evening. This comedy is little known in England, but is still very popular in France, where, whenever it is announced, the house is sure to be well filled. Although Molière himself acknowledged that he founded it upon an Italian comedy, called L'Inavvertito, of Nicolò Barbieri, it is not improbable that it formed part of the repertory of the Venetian Segella whose marionette theatre proved so formidable a rival to Molière and his troupe of living actors during their earlier struggle for fame. At least this is the opinion of M. Guépin in his most interesting Histoire de la Ville de Nantes, in which he gives some very curious details of the performances of both Segella and Molière. L'Étourdi is, in some historical senses, a more interesting play than the greater masterpieces which succeeded it. Needless to enter into details of a plot which is familiar, of course, to all students of the greatest French dramatist. It is really a one-part play; for the entire intrigue devolves on the extraordinary endeavours of Mascarille to assist his master Lélie to obtain possession of the beautiful but enslaved Célie. M. Coquelin plays this character to perfection. He reverently adheres to the traditions connected with it, which have been handed down from the days of Molière to his own through a long and unbroken chain of actors; so that in all probability, when witnessing his performance, we can feel pretty certain that he is acting it as Molière would have played it himself. His vivacity never flags, his joyous laughter is contagious, and the series of comical expressions which he assumes are so appropriate to the words as to be amazingly diverting. Nothing could be funnier than his demure expression when inventing the story of the supposed death of Lélie's father, in order to extract money from Anselme to give his master Lélie, so that he may purchase the coveted slave. He tells this little fiction with an earnestness that almost deceives the audience, and it is only now and then by his sly winks and shrugs of the shoulder that we are made aware he is only funning. Equally excellent is he in the celebrated scene in which he prompts Lélie, disguised as an Armenian, how he should conduct himself when he has once got inside the house of the slavedealer, to enjoy there under false pretences the hospitality of that ancient adventurer and the society of the adored Célie. There was a mingled look of exasperation and sly drollery on his face when his feather-brained master insisted upon stating to Trufaldin that he came from Turin instead of Tunis, which cannot easily be effaced from the memory of those who watched closely such consummate acting. M. Coquelin, too, was extremely funny in the masquerade scene, and indeed throughout we are bound to admit that it would be almost impossible to find a flaw, unless it be that sometimes he speaks too rapidly to be followed with ease by those not very familiar with the language or text. His son, M. Jean Coquelin, played Lélie, and, although he is very young, showed not only talent but considerable experience, doubtless the result of the excellent coaching he has received from his father, to whom he bears a striking resemblance. The rest of the cast has little to do; but the company is far above the average which usually surrounds a star, and the acting of MM. Duquesne, Deroy, and Ricquier was in every way commendable. The female interest of L'Étourdi is trifling, but Mlle. Lemercier and Kerwich wore very becoming costumes, looked well, and spoke their lines with grace and distinction; and this was well, for Molière, like Shakspeare, very often gave the finest poetry in his pieces to characters who only appear once. In a certain sense, L'Étourdi is the most Shakspearian of any of Molière's plays. It is constructed somewhat after the fashion of our own great dramatist's comedies, and scattered throughout in the most unexpected places appear gems of poetry. As an instance, to Trufaldin, certainly not a very important character, is entrusted the celebrated speech beginning—

> D'un chêne grand et fort,
> Dont près de deux cents ans ont fait déjà le sort—in which he graphically and in thoroughly Shakspearian fashion describes, not only the tree from which he cuts it, but the stick itself, which he has prepared for the back of the tricky Lélie. M. Deroy gave it due importance, and was consequently much applauded. On Wednesday M. Coquelin appeared again as the ambitious advocate Destournelles in Mlle. de la Seiglière, a polished and sympathetic piece of acting which we have already described not a very long time since.

MR. ARNOLD ON WELSH DISESTABLISHMENT.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD, as we all know, is nothing if not egotistic and ingenious. No doubt when dealing with matters other than theological he generally writes to the point and often has the best of the argument. But even then his ingenuous egotism always impels him to infuse an amari aliquid which goes far to discount the value of his testimony. He reminds us, at the opening of his article in the current number of the National Review, that he had pledged himself to write no more on religion or politics, whereas he is now dealing with a mixed religious and political question—"Disestablishment in Wales." But the present frank and moderate temper of the Conservative party has emboldened him to break his pledge, and interpose as the candid friend with his advice on the burning question of the Welsh Church, or rather let us say—for that phrase is a "question-begging" one—the Church in Wales. His leading principle is that, in a country like ours, full at once of old traditions and modern ideas, the true policy is neither to destroy nor to maintain intact things which have become "absurd," but to "mend" them. He thinks, for instance—as does Earl Grey—that this would have been the right course to pursue twenty years ago with the Irish Church, instead of disestablishing it; and supposing concurrent endowment to have been then feasible, as no doubt it was in Mr. Pitt's time, we are disposed to agree with him. But we are not by any means convinced, as will appear presently, that his parallel between Wales and Ireland will hold good, or, to speak plainly, we think it manifestly does not hold good. But of that more anon. As regards the Church of England generally Mr. Arnold considers that an intelligent Conservative should say—the italics are his own—"We desire to keep a National and Established Church; and also to get rid of Lord Lonsdale," that is, of Lord Lonsdale as patron of forty livings. Nobody disputes that there is room for improvement in the existing system of Church patronage—notably as to sale of next presentations—though it must in fairness be allowed that, like other illogical—or, if Mr. Arnold prefers the term, "absurd"—English institutions, it works far better than might à priori have been expected, infinitely better to our mind than e.g. the more consistent and logical method of filling vacant cures in the Established Church of Scotland. It might not be difficult to prove on paper that the rectors and vicars nominated under the present régime must usually be wholly unfit for their post. Nor would it be more difficult to prove on paper that the education of our public schools before the Arnoldian reform—say of "Eton under Keate"—must have been wholly inefficient, if not something worse. But somehow the faultless abstract demonstration does not square with facts. However, we are not concerned just now with the Church patronage controversy, but Mr. Arnold imports into his treatment of the Welsh Church too much of the same doctrinaire spirit, besides betraying an imperfect and inaccurate appreciation of the facts of the case, which by no means corresponds with the situation in Germany at the close of the Thirty Years' War, when the local division of religious endowments which so much pleases him was first arranged. In one respect indeed he allows that the three great "corporations" put in possession by the Treaty of Westphalia no longer remain as they were, though he evidently fails to estimate the importance of the change imposed on them much against their will in 1817 by Frederick William III., who by a coup d'état fused the Lutheran and Calvinistic bodies into one external communion under the name of the Evangelical Church. But it would take us too far afield to discuss that matter here.

Mr. Arnold's fundamental fallacy lies in his supposed analogy between the ecclesiastical condition of Wales and Ireland. The following passage defines the basis of his argument, the italics being our own here:—"In Ireland formerly, and now in Wales, the form of religion established [at the Reformation] is not that followed in those localities at the outset [as neither was it in England in the sense Mr. Arnold means] and has not been adopted by more than a minority of the people there since. A grievance in this case there certainly is, and it will be felt to be a grievance, will provoke complaints. In Ireland it was removed by disestablishment; the question now is as to the grievance in Wales." In Ireland the facts are of course pretty much as Mr. Arnold states them, except that the "grievance" was always more a sentimental than a practical one, and its removal by disestablishment has, to say the least, done nothing to allay the bitterness of religious feuds, while in the opinion of many who have no theological bias in favour of the disestablished Church, it has resulted in a thriftless waste of large funds which before contributed something at least to the moral and social benefit of the great bulk of the population. To a certain extent Mr. Arnold would agree with us here. He would have preferred concurrent endowment to disestablishment in Ireland, and that is what he wants in Wales, only organized on the German model of a geographical limitation of rival Churches. But Wales, we repeat, is not as Ireland, and to say of it that "the form of religion established [at the Reformation] has not been adopted by more than a minority of the people there since" betrays a strange ignorance of the religious history of the country. Of the present statistics of Welsh Dissent we shall have a word to say by-and-bye. What we desire to point out here is that it dates, not from the Reformation, but from the middle of the last century. Mr. Arnold says, correctly so far, that the principal Welsh sects follow the Presbyterian form of worship, and he would like to see that form established, in place of the Anglican, in those parts of Wales where it preponderates. He may have ascertained the fact from Whitaker's Almanac, and he might have learnt from the same source that the Welsh Presbyterian body dates from the year 1735, more than two centuries after the Reformation, and cannot properly be regarded as a Dissenting sect till 1810, when it first had ordained ministers of its own; up to that time its members were in the habit of communicating in their parish churches. And it is a curious memento of the late and very gradual introduction of Welsh Presbyterian Calvinism that up to our own day the Welsh Calvinists retain, and are the only Dissenting community who do retain, definite formularies of faith, their formularies being, moreover, in addition to the Scotch "Shorter Catechism," the 39 Articles and the Apostles' Creed.

But there is a good deal more than this to be said as to the late origin of Welsh Dissent. So far from Anglicanism having never been adopted by more than a minority of the people, the exact opposite is the case. Mr. Gladstone himself, if we recollect aright, used to insist, in an earlier stage of his mental evolution, that in no part of Great Britain had the Church of England been so universally and so heartily accepted. So true is this that, when Wesley's preachers first appeared there—about the period from which the origin of Welsh Calvinism is dated—they were stoned by the people. At that time there were hardly a dozen Dissenting chapels throughout the Principality. The main cause of the rapid increase of Welsh Dissent since then is a very simple one. In the "rationalistic" eighteenth century Church life was at a low ebb everywhere—of which the Wesleyan movement was itself a striking evidence—and in Wales as in Ireland a custom had grown up of utilizing the episcopal patronage of the Crown for purely political ends. The bishops appointed sometimes did not reside in their diocese at all, seldom showed much interest in it, and never spoke Welsh. And they naturally enough appointed rectors and vicars like-minded and of like qualifications with themselves. Hence the game was thrown into the hands of teachers who, whatever their shortcomings in other respects, could speak a language understanded of the people. Within living memory all this has been so completely changed that there even seems to be some danger now of too exclusive stress being laid on the provision of Welsh-speaking bishops and incumbents. And meanwhile one difficulty is steadily curing itself with the spread of education and of railways. Welsh as a spoken tongue is surely and not very slowly dying out in spite of the galvanic efforts of the Eisteddfod; from a literary point of view it never had any claim to live. In all human probability it will be extinct in another half-century at latest. And thus we are brought to notice the existing state of Welsh religion, of which Mr. Arnold speaks, not indeed so inaccurately as of its history, but in a manner which is very misleading. He observes quite truly that hitherto the Dissenters have prevented the taking of a religious census—for reasons sufficiently obvious—and that without it no precise certainty as to the relative strength of the rival Churches is obtainable. But he greatly overestimates the actual majority of Dissenters, and underestimates the steady advance of the Church in Wales during the last few decades. In the absence of any official census—which they "prevent"—the Nonconformists are much addicted to starting every now and then a private census of their own managed of course entirely on their own lines. Such a census was arranged and loudly trumpeted last year by a Welsh Dissenting organ called the Baner (sic), the unfairness of which in many particulars was promptly exposed by its opponents. One little detail we may mention here. Among the attendants at Nonconformist chapels were included Roman Catholics. Now in many parts of Wales there is a large Irish mining population, which of course is Roman Catholic, whose numbers, however large, equally of course have no bearing whatever on the point at issue. These Irish immigrants are not Dissenters from the Established Church, to which neither they nor their fathers ever belonged; nor would they have been reckoned among its members if its practical working for the last three centuries had been as faultless and as successful as at one time it was partly the reverse. Yet they are lugged in head and shoulders to bolster up a comparative plea with which they have no sort of connexion or concern. When Mr. Arnold urges that there is "no other territory in England, well defined and considerable as Wales," where Dissenters are in a majority, the method of statement involves a confusion of thought. On his own showing it is only in parts of Wales that there is this marked preponderance, and there are certainly parts of England—Cornwall for example—of which the same might be affirmed, and for very similar reasons. If "there are districts of Cardiganshire and Carmarthenshire" where Presbyterian Calvinism ought on this ground to be established, just the same argument would apply to Cornwall, probably also to parts of Yorkshire and other English counties. To argue that as "disestablishment in Ireland lessened the security of the Church in England, disestablishment in Wales would lessen it still more," and therefore it ought to be disestablished in certain parts of Wales, sounds strangely like paralogism. The natural inference surely would be that a process of local disestablishment in Wales, assuming it to be as feasible in practice as it is easy to map it out on paper, would suggest the application of a kindred process to any district in England where Dissent was equally prevalent. A very sufficient reply to the plea in either case is, first, that the alleged preponderance of Dissent is greatly exaggerated; and, secondly, that to such a scheme of piecemeal disintegration might fitly be applied the Scriptural axiom, "the beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water." Mr. Arnold is confident that the Church, if allowed to try the experiment, could not in a century "absorb" Welsh Dissent. Is he prepared to deny that in a fraction of that period the Church can and will, if left to itself, at least reduce the relative average of Dissent in Wales to the present, and steadily diminishing, average in England? And in England he is himself—rightly in our judgment—opposed to disestablishment altogether.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

A PLAY entitled The Mystery of a Hansom Cab, founded upon the novel of the same name by Mr. Fergus Hume, and dramatized by Mr. Arthur Law, was performed for the first time last week at the Princess's Theatre. The novel had one merit which the play does not possess—the identity of the murderer was ingeniously concealed until the end; whereas in the play the collaborating dramatist has been obliged to reveal it to the audience from the beginning, thereby considerably weakening the interest. The piece is constructed with ability, although the dialogue is rather weak. Nevertheless, audiences who delight in watching the solution of mysterious events and forming the acquaintance upon the stage of people of shady antecedents will doubtless derive much pleasure from a visit to the Princess's. There is nothing objectionable in the piece, which runs much on the same lines as a dozen other melodramas we could name, the plots of which turn upon events connected with neglected wives, missing documents, the evil-doings of blackmailers, false accusations of murder, and like exciting incidents crowded together in such a manner as to bring before the spectators as in a panorama a varied picture of life in its gloomiest aspect, tempered, however, by the introduction of comic characters imitated from Charles Dickens. Miss Grace Hawthorne is to be congratulated on having gathered around her a strong company; so that the acting was above the average of what we usually see in pieces of this class. Mr. Fernandez plays an unsympathetic part with a dignity which saves it from becoming wearisome; Mr. Barnes is the wrongfully accused hero; and Mr. Harry Parker makes a capital detective; but, beyond these personages, the long list of male characters on the programme does not include one of importance. Miss Grace Hawthorne does her best to render the character of Sal Rawlins, "a storm-tossed waif on the sea of life"—whatever that may be—interesting, and if she fails the fault is scarcely hers. Mrs. Huntley plays a gin-drinking old hag with great power, but her death from delirium tremens is the reverse of a pleasing exhibition. Miss Dolores Drummond—one of the most versatile actresses on the London stage—achieves a veritable triumph as Mrs. Sampson, a comical landlady with an inexhaustible flow of rambling conversation à la Gamp. Nothing can be better than her "get up," or more inimitably droll than her acting.

Mr. Charles Wyndham has been a wanderer, and for the past three months, together with Miss Mary Moore, has acted in David Garrick at Berlin and other German cities, and has even performed with immense success at St. Petersburg and Moscow. His pronunciation of the German language is said to be perfect, and his reception everywhere was flattering. On Wednesday night he returned to the Criterion, and repeated his well-known impersonation of David Garrick, in which he displayed a decided increase of power. He showed throughout a marked improvement in his acting, which has become much more vigorous and earnest in the dramatic parts, whilst the lighter scenes are as brisk and mercurial as ever. Miss Moore repeated her quiet and ladylike performance of the rather doleful part of Ada Ingot. Mr. David James's Ingot is so well known and admirable a piece of acting that we need only refer to it to recall its many excellences, and the same may be said of Mr. W. Blakeley as Smith and young Mr. Sidney Brough as Jones. Miss Terriss, who made her début recently, now takes the part originally created by Miss Norreys in Why Women Weep, and plays it with sweetness and grace. She is very young, but already manifests distinct talent for the stage, which study and experience will soon improve.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

THE programme of the last concert was good, though in no way remarkable. Nothing absolutely new or of controversial interest was introduced. Sterndale Bennett's "Overture to Lord Byron's Poem of Parisina" (Op. 3) opened the concert.

This work, though composed at the early age of nineteen, shows Bennett already fully alive to style, inclined to dignity of idea, and, moreover, somewhat original in his workmanship. It has little of the coloured picturesqueness of later days, and perhaps not all the warmth of feeling which the poem demands; but it shows a vital sympathy with the great masters and a real comprehension of music as a pure art. A work of this sort, lofty in aim, and claiming before all things to be judged with serious music, would be even now a severe standard by which to judge the first efforts of young musicians. The performance was excellent; the stringed band, on whom a good deal of the effect of the Overture depends, being in fine disposition for their work.

The Symphony of the day was Schumann's in C (Op. 61), by no means the most agreeable of his works. In spite of the power and nobility of the imagination in this music, of the many happy "finds" in the way of motives, of the incessant energy of invention, and in spite of the magnificent interpretation which it met with on Saturday, one could not listen to this prodigious tempest of sound with feelings of unalloyed pleasure. Even the grand swing and passionate utterance of the first movement became tedious, owing to an over-insistence on certain effects that play too violently on the nervous sensibility. The emotion of the Symphony is that of a screeching passion without lucid intervals. No nerves will stand this constant shiver of excitement of the same sort. The second subject, for instance, is intensely expressive; but it is not preceded by, followed by, and contrasted with stuff which makes its appearances refreshing and effective. In its treatment one is conscious of an abuse of the high, loud, and piercing qualities of an orchestra. Something similar may be said of all the movements of this the most feverish of symphonies. With the magnificent playing and sonorous volume of the Crystal Palace orchestra the effect of the music was unquestionably less exhausting than usual. Their rendering of the untiring activity of the "Scherzo" and the noble calm of the second "Trio" was quite worthy of the best movement in the Symphony.

Miss Fanny Davies charmed us once more with her exquisitely refined playing of Beethoven's "Concerto for Piano," No. 4, in G major. Her sympathy with this work is so manifest, and her reading of it so consistent and so artistically complete, that while she is playing one cannot imagine it treated otherwise with any advantage. Her touch was delicately tender in the magic and warbling entrance of the piano after the first long orchestral tutti. Further on her liquid notes allied themselves marvellously well with the rich, low, guttural quaver of sound which seems to thrill through the second part of this sensuously beautiful movement. Certainly Miss Davies is constantly improving in pathos, in breadth of phrasing, and in power of cantabile, as may be seen in the ease with which she makes the real song of the music appear to float over technical difficulties and gymnastics. She plays with that nervous force which suggests the infinite power of the orchestra waiting behind, and which produces more effect of energy on the mind than can be done by coarsely-used physical strength. Miss Davies chose her solo pieces with more taste than the greater number of instrumentalists have led us to expect. This part of the concert the soloist too often regards as the proper moment to arrest the flow of soul and pour out a libation to technique. Miss Davies gave Brahms's sturdy Rhapsodie in G Minor with considerable robustness of execution, and she made great play of the contrast between a lively brilliant staccato and a charming legato in Rubinstein's Staccato étude. Mme. Patey, the singer of the afternoon, was in good voice, but we felt a little want of the dramatic stateliness which Mme. Trebelli has taught us to demand in Handel's "Ombra mai fù." Sullivan's Recitative and Air, "The Lord is Risen" (The Light of the World), she sang with a perfect understanding and much expression.

M. Camille Saint-Saëns has written higher and more dignified work than the "Poème Symphonique," Le Rouet d'Omphale. There is more of cleverness than of feeling or of grandeur in the treatment of the theme so as to suggest first "feminine allurement"; then the monstrous Titanic groan of the enslaved hero, and, last, the mocking laughter of Omphale. Music, like pictures, must be judged apart from titles. Any one can tack on to a work of art a lofty or a mean title. The enslavement of a prizefighter by a lady of no virtue would be as truly pictured by this music. It is perhaps impudent to prefer the heroic title when no particular pomp or stateliness has been attempted. This sort of thing is not possible in the more definite art of literature; it results in a genre which is called burlesque. If M. Saint-Saëns's Poème is not meant to be taken seriously, which is possible, we must call it successful, though perhaps too heavy in parts.

It is not quite forty years since Mr. A. H. Layard surprised the literary world by his account of a visit to the Chaldæan Christians of Kurdistan and the Yezidis or devil-worshippers, and by his inquiry into the manners and arts of the ancient Assyrians. Every intelligent person was expected to know something about winged bulls, Oriental despots in their chariots, and strings of helpless captives and slaves. Mr. Layard had started on his adventurous expedition in company with Mr. E. H. Mitford, whose Land March from England to Ceylon was reviewed in these pages in September 1884. It is clear to us from a comparison of the narratives of these two hardy pioneers that they were both, in their several ways, too self-reliant and determined to journey long in harmony together. But without speculating about their controversy on the choice of routes and places, we have no reason to regret that they parted company. Mr. Mitford from Isfahan went on to Khorassan and Kandahar, and finally was appointed to the Ceylon Civil Service. Mr. Layard paid two visits to the mountains of Luristan, made the acquaintance of the Great Elchi, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, explored the ruins of Nineveh, and finally represented our Government at Constantinople. To the severance of a travelling partnership we owe two good books of adventure. Mr. Mitford covered a larger area, and carried out his intention of getting to India. Mr. Layard visited a part of Persia thought inaccessible to any man, English or Persian, who had not an army at his back; and even when he goes over more familiar ground he has a good deal to tell us which is both striking and new. In his present work Sir H. Layard very wisely refrains from much antiquarian dissertation. He alludes constantly to ruins and sculptures over which Pundits may wrangle; blocks of stone, inscriptions rendered almost illegible by time and weather; the tombs of prophets and the palaces of kings. But he is mainly occupied with the living and not with the dead. We may pass lightly over his tour in Syria and Palestine. He tasted the water of pools near the Dead Sea, and found it noisome and bitter; explored Petra; was attacked by Bedouins, and pillaged by deserters; and very cleverly managed to elude the officials who, in dread of the plague, had established a sanitary cordon round the city of Damascus. But the stirring feature of his narrative dates from his arrival at Kirmanshah and Isfahan. Owing to the suspension of our diplomatic relations with the Shah, any wandering Englishman was at that time, and not without reason, an object of distrust and suspicion. Mr. Layard witnessed the wide-spread ruin caused by the rabble dignified by the title of the Shah's army. Like the locusts, the soldiers cleared the whole country on their march. Fruit-trees were cut for firewood; vines and standing corn trampled down; houses invaded, and bazaars looted. At length, after the usual evasions, delays, promises of safe-conduct and firmans very tardily carried out, the author was allowed to start for the Bakhtiyari tribes. The most important functionary in Persia at that time, after the monarch himself, appears to have been the Governor of Isfahan, the Mutamed Al-Doula, "the Trusted One of the State." This exalted individual, familiarly known as the Matamet, was a Georgian born of Christian parents, but purchased as a slave by some Mohammedan and made a eunuch. He was a ruler of the strong, cruel, and vigorous type. He protected the weak, made life and property fairly secure, and administered the bastinado unsparingly to high and low. While waiting on the Matamet Mr. Layard was introduced to a Bakhtiyari chief named Shafia Khan, and to Ali Naghi or Nukki Khan, own brother to Mohammed Taki Khan, who was the head of the largest division of the Bakhtiyaris. Over an excellent repast of stews, sweetmeats, and pilaos, flanked by the red wine of Shiraz, it was settled that the enterprising young Englishman, who was neither a spy nor a seeker of hidden treasure, should be allowed to visit the mighty mountain chief at his residence at Kara Tul. And so, after more delays and references to the Koran and to holy Mullas as to the day propitious for a start, Mr. Layard set out towards the end of September. Delay at Isfahan had enabled him, already to some extent familiar with Arabic, to make progress with the Persian language. From the specimens given the Bakhtiyari dialect seems to us an archaic form of Persian. Mr. Layard adopted the national costume, avoided all acts or sentiments which could excite religious prejudice, only recorded his notes or observations on the sly (just as M. Vambéry did during his visit to Bokhara), took but little money with him, coram latrone, listened to long stories from the Shah-Nameh and other poets, and in every way conformed to the proclivities and habits of the wild and uncivilized tribes to whom he had boldly trusted his life. The passes were steep and rugged; the nights cold; and, though much hospitality was afforded by divers petty chiefs on the way, at some resting-places there was nothing to eat, and thieves stole caps, quilts, and shoes during the night. Even the pipe of the leader, Shafia Khan, was not spared. At last the castle of Roderick Dhu was reached: for the author's graphic description irresistibly reminds us of Scott's Lochiels, Macgregors, Rodericks, and M'Ivors. Taki Khan was all that the ruler of a wild tribe ought to be; of ancient lineage, of tried courage, a splendid rider, a good sportsman, of proved skill in diplomacy and politics, and, what is more surprising, anxious to maintain peace amongst warlike and revengeful tribes, to open out mountain passes by roads, and to encourage trade with the low country. It may be doubted, however, whether some untoward dispute would not have brought Mr. Layard's visit to a premature or unhappy close had it not been for one fortunate occurrence. The chief had a son—a fine, handsome, high-spirited youth—who at that very time was dangerously ill of an intermittent fever. Mullas and physicians had been called in and had persisted in ordering a bath of melon juice and a drink of wine and water in which a text from the Koran had been washed. Mr. Layard suggested Dover's powders and quinine, and as every Frank was supposed to be a clever Hakim or doctor, the chief luckily preferred the Feringhi treatment. But the author anxiously watched the sufferer all night, as Wayland Smith, in Kenilworth, watched by the sick bed of Sussex, threw in quinine at the right moment, and saved the boy's life. From this time the gratitude of the chief and his principal wife, the Khanum Khatun Jan, knew no bounds. The physician and friend was admitted to the Anderun, or women's apartments, conversed with the ladies on familiar and respectful terms, and was actually invited to turn Mohammedan and take to wife a sister-in-law named Khanumi, as lively and intelligent as she was lovely in appearance. To prevent misapprehension, we must state that there is nothing in all this episode suggestive of the smallest impropriety or indelicacy. Ellen Douglas herself could not have behaved with greater purity or refinement than the Khanum, and Mr. Layard remained on a similar footing with the families of the other brothers who lived in the same mountain retreat, and who, like all independent mountaineers, were excessively sensitive about what concerned the female sex. The upshot of all this was that Mr. Layard obtained permission to visit ruins and tombs in the hills, and to take copies of inscriptions, though not always without interruption. Local potentates were not as enlightened as the great chief himself. Mr. Layard must, they said, know of hidden treasures and was bound to disclose them. His watch and compass were stolen. The so-called tomb of Daniel the Prophet turned out to be, not a monument of white marble, but a mean building of mud, such as is often raised over the body of some local saint. Still, the tradition is very ancient, and at Susan, or Shushan, were visible the remains of buildings of the Sassanian dynasty. That they should be known amongst the mountain tribes as the Musjid-i-Suleiman, or Mosque of Solomon, is, of course, quite natural. And it is equally in keeping that there should be two burial-places of the prophet, or rather of two prophets, the greater and the lesser Daniel. These excursions were varied by a lion hunt; but the picture of rough manners and generous hospitality was ended by the course adopted by the Shah and his chief adviser, the eunuch Matamet. This personage accused Mohammed Taki of rebellion against the Government, and refusal to pay tribute, and this led to negotiations and to a demand for hostages on the part of the Shah, coupled with an assurance of safe-conduct. Mohammed Taki's anticipations of treachery were well founded. The eunuch's pledges were about as much to be trusted as those of the Nana. Mohammed Taki gave up his son as a hostage, remained for some time in concealment with an Arab chief, and finally surrendered himself to the Persian authorities, by whom he was loaded with chains. It was decided by the brothers of the chief and by the elders of the Arab tribe, who seem to have been ashamed of their acquiescence in this treachery, that a night attack should be made on the Persian camp and the prisoners be rescued. The attack was nearly successful, but the end of the history is very sad. Mohammed Taki Khan lingered for five years and died in captivity. His wives and family were kept as hostages at Teheran, and the beautiful Khanumi lost all her good looks and died, owing to the brutality of a Persian official who insisted on her travelling when she was quite unfit to move. It seems to us clear from the whole of these episodes that British influence at the Court of Teheran was then at its lowest. Our disasters in Afghanistan had produced their due effect on the Oriental mind, and there was no one in Persia to exert that influence on the proper treatment of hostages and women that would certainly have been attempted at Constantinople.

Full of sorrow at the treatment experienced by his hosts, Mr. Layard could do nothing to aid them. He wisely gave up his attempt to reach India by Kandahar, and contented himself with visiting the country of the Hawiza Arabs and exploring the course of the Kerkhah, or Choaspes, "the drink of none but kings." He had to exchange the cap and dress of the Luris for the Arab head-dress and cloak, to endure frightful heat, to drink brackish water, and to run very serious risks. He seems to have had narrow escapes sufficient to satisfy the cravings of the most dauntless adventurer who ever joined a Kafila of pilgrims and trusted himself to the forbearance of wandering tribes. Knives were repeatedly drawn; spears were pointed at him; savage looks were soon exchanged for menaces, and menaces for blows; and he constantly suffered from starvation and fever, to which a less vigorous constitution must have succumbed. But there is no doubt that he saw both sides of the Oriental character, and obtained an insight into manners and customs inferior only to that acquired by Sir R. Burton or M. Vambéry. After his experience with the Hawiza Arabs, he managed to return to Khuzistan, and on this occasion secured the services of a faithful companion named Saleh. His Memoir on the province was long ago published by the Royal Geographical Society. This adventure was followed by an ascent of the river Karun on the steamer Assyria, commanded by Lieutenant Selby, of the old Indian navy. Here were experienced dangers of another kind. The vessel had to be forced by steam and dragged by a hawser through a very nasty series of cataracts and whirlpools, when the parting of a rope would have been followed by total shipwreck. More than once the steamer was stranded in the slack water, and once it was left high and dry at a distance from the main stream, owing to a sudden fall in the river. The crew had actually almost completed a trench by which the steamer, lightened of stores and machinery, could have been floated into the main stream, when a lucky fall of rain in the hills caused a rapid rise, and the party returned to Bagdad. Lieutenant Selby, by the way, though energetic and daring, seems to have been very wrong-headed. Several of the mishaps encountered in the exploration were due to his obstinacy, and he got into a quarrel with some nomad Arabs, who, not unreasonably, broke his head, and were plundered by the Pasha in retaliation when our Resident preferred the usual style of complaint.

The concluding chapters deal with matters of almost European interest, and the reader may be glad to look back and learn how Mr. Layard, having ridden with despatches from Bagdad to Mosul, a distance of 250 miles, in some fifty hours, and thence through Asia Minor to the Black Sea, was at first politely snubbed by an attaché at Constantinople; how this discourtesy was compensated by the stately kindness of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe; how the author was deputed to Bosnia and Servia, and there caught a glimpse of the great Bulgarian question, already gilding or darkening the political horizon; how Lord Aberdeen unfortunately took a different view from that taken by our Ambassador as to the popular rising in Servia; and how he was a second time duped by Russia in the claims put forward by the Shah, not only to the town of Mohamra and the left bank of the Shat-al-Arab, but also to territory on the east bank which obviously belonged to the Sultan; and how Mr. Layard himself was at length rewarded for all his discoveries, diplomatic negotiations, and rapid journeys on horseback, by the valuable appointment of "unpaid attaché" to the Embassy at the Porte. By these varied adventures he was enabled to lay in a large stock of political capital. From his general estimate of the characters of the various races with whom he was brought in contact we see no reason to dissent. That the Persians are first-rate story-tellers in every sense of the word; that the punishments inflicted by Pashas and Governors were barbarous and cruel; that it is good policy in such countries to travel either with an adequate escort or with nothing of value about you to tempt Bedouins and Iliyats to robbery and murder; and that a Greek Bishop may be more grasping than a Turkish official, is very likely true; and equally certain is it that the late Lord Somers was, whether in a Turkish Serai, a convent at Mount Athos, or an English country-house, one of the most charming of companions. Sir H. Layard, like many other public men, may have now and then uttered sentiments, notably when after the Mutiny he moralized over the well at Cawnpore, which his better judgment would now condemn. But he has discharged a difficult duty at an eventful time, with honour to himself and his country. He has now produced two delightful volumes, and we cannot do better than quote some spirited lines of a forgotten squib published, more than thirty years back, in the columns of Punch, when, as that periodical expressed it, the House of Commons indulged in the pastime of "baiting with war-dogs the Nineveh Bull":—

> So his Nineveh namesake, John Bull, for his aim's sake, > Excuses, if wrong in one instance he go;
> For he knows tho' Pam's thunder be hurled at the blunder,

THE Island is a rather clever and decidedly silly satire upon the civilized world. It takes the form of a story of an English gentleman—he happens to be a peer; but the circumstance is not material—who suddenly feels tired of life in London, and determines to travel for a change. He goes mooning round the world until he reaches Pitcairn Island, on which he is accidentally left stranded. He is found and introduced to the settlement by a lady named Victoria, the daughter of the Governor, who is the only magistrate or official personage in the community. The peer, who tells his story in the first person, does not reveal his name or his title. He and Victoria make love with considerable vigour and in a sufficiently commonplace fashion for some months. At the end of that time he learns from a "society newspaper" casually imported in an American ship that his mother has been made ill by his disappearance; so off he goes to relieve her anxiety. As he sails away he sees Victoria waving him adieu from a high rock, which makes him quite happy. Incidentally he gives humorous accounts of the manners and customs of Pitcairn, and reports of sermons preached by himself and Victoria to each other in the process of their flirtation. The latter are the substance of Mr. Whiteing's message to the world. The islanders are supposed to nourish immense reverence, founded on total ignorance, for civilized countries generally, and England in particular. The nameless peer endeavours in his discourses to open Victoria's eyes a little as to the existence of selfishness, industry, competition, capital and labour, wealth and poverty, and various sorts of more or less consequent vice and misery, none of which have any existence on the happy island. She explains to him, and sometimes he to her, that it could all be put right if people would only not think so much about themselves (which, of course, nobody at Pitcairn ever does).

"Don't you think," says Victoria, "it is just as disgusting to make as much as you honestly can as to eat as much as you honestly can? . . . All the harm in the world that I ever saw [the young lady has never seen any, so she saves herself by adding] or heard of came from greediness, gobbling. Give up, give up, give up. Oh, only that makes men different from pasturing brutes ! . . . That is why man is not the same as the pasturing brutes; because he can give up, because he can think of all, and himself as only one of them. He is real man when he is doing that, and real brute when he is doing the other thing." Mr. Whiteing ought to be persuaded of the futility of this creed by the fact that, in order to imagine its bald utterance by a human being, he has to invent an enthusiastically love-sick girl in an impossible community of two-legged rabbits. If he wants an antidote, let him find some one who was a guest at a certain dinner given not very long ago at Calcutta, and ask him to repeat the famous anecdote then related by an eminent English statesman concerning the cross-examination by a burglar of the policeman who had arrested him. There is a certain freshness about some of the satirical comments on English life put into the mouths of the reverent Pitcairners. This, for instance, concerning Parliament:—"Over a thousand people to make the laws; and at it day and night, too! The moment anything goes wrong anywhere, there they are, waiting on the premises, as you may say, to put it right. We've nothing like that here. Not that we want it, either; I only make the remark."

Lizzie Maxwell was the daughter of totally abstaining parents. In her inexperience she loved James Douglas, who "was fond of alcoholic drinks." Mr. Maxwell very properly refused to hear of such a miscreant as his son-in-law, so the young people ran away and were married. Douglas was a doctor, and if anybody lists to hear what becomes of doctors who think they can drink in moderation let him attend to the horrid sequel. At first James Douglas did not get drunk, but nevertheless he drank wine, "he scarcely ever refused it when offered in the houses which he visited," and that although an amiable (but garrulous) patient reminded him of the notorious fact that "a glass of sherry compels the heart to pump over an additional quantity of blood in the twenty-four hours of half a ton weight." The natural result was that one afternoon he came home drunk, entered the drawing-room where his wife and mother-in-law were bemoaning his licentious habits, picked up the baby, quite "in the way of friendship," and dropped it on the fender. It immediately died, and its mother, after fainting for a reasonable time, "took up the dead body," observing "Oh my precious, precious babe! My darling child! Wilt thou never smile and never prattle again? Oh, cruel, cruel man!" The grandmother, Mrs. Maxwell, was more coherent. She said, "Who could have thought that James would conduct himself so badly?" Next came a bill of sale, and the ill-conducted James fled across the Channel. Midway over "he was allured aloft by the smooth sea." While gazing at "the wimpling waves," apparently from the luxurious seclusion of the main truck, he was accosted by a fiend in the person of one of his ex-patients, who said "Follow me, sir, to the lower regions, and you shall be comforted with a drop of the finest old port that ever passed your lips." On reaching the French shore they continued their debauch until their very innkeeper appears to have been sympathetically affected, for he said "Vous êtes trop turbulent; il est tard; va à votre chambre à coucher." The end of it was that the ex-patient died of delirium tremens and the doctor beat a Frenchman at billiards, whereupon the latter said "Vous êtes un fou." The doctor hit him, they fought, and the doctor was shot dead. This was the result of so-called moderate drinking. When James Douglas was dead, Mrs. Maxwell had to break the news to her daughter and grandson. The latter was Walter Douglas, elder brother to the child who was killed on the fender. Very artfully, for many pages, did Mrs. Maxwell tell her daughter that she was a widow, and the latter shortly after observed to Walter "'but for you, Walter, I could wish for death itself.' 'Don't say that,' said Mrs. Maxwell, observing its effect upon the child. 'Perhaps I ought to tell you, Walter, that your papa has suffered a serious accident, and is dead. You must try, my boy, to take all the more care now of your dear mother.' This last sentence was well put.' Mrs. Maxwell, as we have seen, put everything well. James's career not being considered satisfactory, Walter was made to sign the pledge. Then he went to school; and this is the sort of boy he turned out. Mrs. Douglas was afraid that, "'in becoming a lawyer, you may have to live so much in hotels, and to associate with those who live a fast life.' 'Remember, mamma, that I have signed the pledge. You know how careful I am to keep good company, and how I refused to associate with Tom Jones [aberat omen] and William Bruce, because one is not honest, and the other swears. I cannot bear bad companions. To tell you a secret, mamma, I have had serious thoughts of becoming a thorough Christian.'" The short of it was that Walter became an articled clerk, and, while yet young, was called to the Bar, and went the Northern Circuit, where he instantly mopped up all the briefs, simply by force of character, for he was wildly ignorant of law, and played forensic antics, some of which only cruel want of space prevents us from reciting. So "in some years . . . he was one day delighted to find himself chosen a Queen's Counsel . . . Something of the sort had at times passed in hazy outline before his mind, but he had scarcely presumed to look at it." No doubt it was only in hazy outline that he had sent in his application for silk to the Chancellor. When moderate drinkers are made Queen's Counsel they mostly run some risk of a serious diminution of income. But the happy teetotaler immediately bought his mother a new and scrumptious house. Then he got into Parliament as an advocate of local option. Then it occurred to Providence that the model man must have a model wife. So one of his clients turned out to be a very rich lady. Wicked uncles sought to spoil her substance—she was an orphan—but Walter by his legal skill routed them, and, the fortune being safe, married the lady. She was not a common lady, such as a moderate drinker might marry. Besides being rich she was young, and also wonderfully beautiful. Moreover, she was remarkably accomplished. "The keys of the piano, from the lowest to the highest octave [think of that!] yielded as if by magic to her exquisite touch. Her voice, of more than average compass, did ample justice to the finest musical compositions. But even these mental attainments and talents must yield the palm of excellence to her moral qualities. Scrupulously chaste, wonderfully discreet both in action and utterance . . ." Is it necessary to add that no alcoholic liquors ever entered her stately mansion? They were married, and we leave Walter inducing a considerable brood of young children of both sexes to sign the pledge by telling them with a brutal simplicity of language very different from his wife's wonderful discretion of utterance, how their grandfather and his father was a drunkard, committed manslaughter, and got killed in a pothouse row.

One expects something very literary from the London Literary Society, but Vere Thornleigh's Inheritance has nothing in any way remarkable about it. It is a novel in general characteristics extremely like innumerable others, and differing from them chiefly in being a little above the average. There are two rather nice girls in it. One is called Mabel and the other Vere. The latter was brought up as a rustic maiden by a savage and mysterious aunt, and inherited piles of unsuspected gold accumulated in a cellar. Complications ensued about her marriage, and came all right in the end. The most original thing in the book is that the amiable gentleman who commits larceny to supply the place of a villain is never caught, but repents in time, and puts back the stolen documents where they might, and in fact are supposed to, have been lost. But for the larceny there would have been no complications and no story. The wooing of Mabel by a slightly cynical barrister of a sort fashionable in novels—a dotard of thirty-two—is rather well done; and the second couple, as is often the case, demand the reader's sympathy more effectively turn the first. As novels go, the book is quite worth reading.

Ixora: a Mystery should be perused either in some period of buoyant health, when the wits are spoiling for exercise, or at a season of feverish illness, when thought is a succession of nightmares. In the former case the intellect will be provided with hard work; in the latter an opportunity will be afforded for practically testing the doctrine Similia similibus curantur. It is difficult to try both plans, and we do not profess to have done it; but we are rather disposed to consider the latter the more hopeful method. The author somehow got mixed up with a collection of mad Jews. Some of them lived in Bristol slums on the ruins of castles. Some of them kept rag-shops in Trinidad. Some haunted desert islands in the Southern hemisphere, but of uncertain longitude. They could to a considerable extent appear and vanish at will, and it was their habit to commit to the author's keeping unintelligible (but very long) fragments of incoherent English verse or mutilated Spanish records, which he either copied in shorthand or laboriously deciphered at his leisure according to circumstances. From time to time they (the Jews, or some of them) died; but that made no difference to their erratic conduct, and may be left out of account. What their number was it is impossible to say. It is not certain that there was more than one; but there are strong reasons for supposing that there were at least two, there were probably as many as three, and it would be rash to say positively that there were not half a dozen. The substance of their story appears to have been that in 1680 a Spanish Jewess called Ixora was burnt for being a Jewess. She asked the Queen of Spain to let her off, and was refused. So she was burnt, and became a ghost, and went here and there for many years, not to say centuries, and haunted the Jews (or Jew) and made them (or him) exceedingly mad. They could not make out—nor can we—whether she ever became a Christian, and if so when, and whether that had anything and what to do with her uncomfortable restlessness. Also there was a "Voice" which unintelligibly tempted at least one of the Jews to do something or other, and there is an insoluble mystery about what it was and whether he did it. The verses composed by the afflicted Hebrews were sometimes after The Ancient Mariner, like this:—

From that high place old Ocean's face
Showed wondrous weird and bare,
Now grey and cold, now green and gold,
Now white in foamy glare;
Now red as blood when day was old
And the red sun was there, and sometimes after The Walrus and the Carpenter, like this:—

They whisper of the rack, the scourge,
The stake, and other things.

At last came a happy day when one of the Jews indubitably died, and the author came to the conclusion that he would never be able to find out anything more about the matter, and that if he had not solved the mystery of Ixora no one else would. And we do not think any one will.

LITERATURE OF BELGIUM AND THE NETHERLANDS.

AMONG historical works published in 1885–1887, and treating more especially of Belgian history, we must mention the publications of the Société des Bibliophiles Flamands of Ghent, such as Mr. Napoleon de Pauw's book, Voorgeboden (Ordonnancien) of Ghent, from 1337 to 1385 (1). Mr. V. Hermans, Keeper of the Archives at Malines, has published several interesting works, the results of his researches among historical documents. During the last few years the local Historical Societies of Liège, Luxembourg, Mons, and other towns have published a large number of Cartulaires of churches and convents in their several districts.

A work which we strongly recommend to our readers is the Bibliotheca Belgica (2), of which the seventy-eighth part has already appeared. This work is extremely valuable on account of new and interesting information which it gives on old and unknown works. It is edited by three gentlemen connected with the Public Library at Ghent—Mr. Van der Haeghen, Mr. Arnold, and Mr. Vanden Berghe.

Those who wish to study the history of Belgian towns cannot do better than to peruse Mr. Genard's book on Antwerp (3), which forms a pendant to Mr. Wanter's History of Brussels, to which we have referred in a previous article, and Mr. Gobert's history of the streets of Liège (4).

In the domain of light Dutch literature we find most of the foremost places taken by women. First comes Miss Betsy Perk, who has given us another romance of Russian life under the Empress Elizabeth (5). The plot is well conceived, but the book cannot be held up as a model either of style or of morality. Another novel by the same author, the plot of which is laid in the fifteenth century, deserves honourable mention (6).

Miss Catherine Alberdingk Thym comes to the fore with a very interesting novel, the plot of which turns on the escape from Siberia of a girl whose mother is a political prisoner (7). The only fault which we have to find with this charmingly written book is that some of the incidents depicted seem rather improbable, but nowadays this may be reckoned a merit by many critics. The novels of Baroness Stratenus (8), Miss van Harmm (9), and Miss Andriessen (10), please alike by their charming style and their good tone.

To those who prefer a novel that can be read a second, and even a third time with pleasure we unhesitatingly recommend Mrs. Zwaardemaker-Visscher's latest book (11), which describes the misfortunes of a poor but proud family of noble lineage. The evils and dangers of modern Socialism are depicted with a life-like realism that does the author credit.

Miss Louise Sloot—better known by her pseudonym "Melati van Java"—gives us a capital collection of short stories (12), as well as an extremely original novel (13). Miss Virginie Loveling's Sophie (14) strikes the reader throughout as a book written "with a purpose"—namely, to show the evil effects of priestly influence. The characters are, however, well drawn, and the book is, on the whole, well written.

Mr. Keller, one of the foremost Dutch authors of the æsthetic school, has published a novel (15), the chief merit of which lies in the skill with which he portrays the characters—true Dutchmen, patient and persevering almost to obstinacy.

Several authors have of late years tried to interest their readers in Dutch colonial affairs. Thus Mr. Nieuwland has given us a novel (16) the plot of which is laid in the Transvaal, a country with which the author seems well acquainted. The "Romance of Opium" (17), by Mr. T. H. Perelaer, formerly commander-in-chief of the Dutch army in the Indies, created no small stir in official circles, by reason of the vigorous attacks made therein on the Government officials in the East, who, while loaded with favours, allow the most flagrant abuses—especially the opium traffic—to flourish unchecked in the islands under their charge. Like most of its kind, the book is not altogether free from exaggeration; but it is well written, and contains much that is interesting. It may, in fact, be considered as a sequel to Mr. Douwes Dekker's celebrated Max Havelaar.

Mr. Alcock's historical romance, entitled Arthur Erskine (18), deals with the troublous times of John Knox, and shows that the author has carefully studied the history of that period.

In "Studies from the Nude" (19) Mr. Frans Netscher, while trying to imitate Zola, has succeeded in copying that author's vulgarity without possessing any of his ability.

We take it for granted that our readers are familiar with the present state of literature in the Flemish as distinct from the Walloon provinces of Belgium. The reaction in favour of Flemish is slowly but surely gaining ground in the former, although the great majority of the upper classes still regard French as their proper language, and consider Flemish fit only for servants and the lower classes generally. This deplorable state of affairs is in great measure due to the system of education prevalent in Belgium, all instruction being given in French, while the use of Flemish is strictly forbidden in many schools as being utterly unfit for good society. The inevitable consequence is that authors who wish to obtain a wide circulation for their books are obliged to write in French. Thus we find that Mr. Stecher, Professor of the University of Liège, has written his History of Flemish Literature in French. The book is worthy of a close perusal, the part treating of the drama in the middle ages being especially good. But happily there is a class of authors who, in spite of obstacles, fight manfully for their mother-tongue. Foremost among these is Mr. Julius Vuylsteke, who has recently published an excellent collection of Flemish poems. Under the title of Butterflies (20) Mr. de Mont gives us a collection of verses charming alike by the gracefulness and harmony of their rhythm and the ease and smoothness of the language. Some of them are not unworthy of comparison with the works of such poets as Rückert, Platen, and even Heine.

It will perhaps not be considered out of place here to make this distinction between Flemish and French novels of the present day; in spite of their realistic tendencies, the great majority of Flemish novels evince a respect for good morals which is altogether wanting in the pernicious French novels so widely read in the higher circles of Belgian society.

Mr. A. M. Verstraeten has brought out a largely annotated edition of two of the finest tragedies of the poet Vondel (1587–1679) (21), whose style has much in common with that of Milto .

Thanks to the speaking of Flemish having so long been left to the lower classes, the dialects of the various districts have remained altogether distinct, and several distinguished linguists are devoting their time to collecting local words and proverbs. The result is that of late years we have had to welcome several very useful Glossaries and Idiotica of the various dialects from the pens of Stallaert (22), De Bo (23), and others.

Returning to Holland, we find very little to notice in the way of recent literary works. In the line of scientific literature several original works have appeared; but for purely literary productions the Hollanders appear to be almost content with French translations of English and German works. Of the novels which have just appeared very few show any merit. We can only just mention Mr. Kaufmann's Adelheid (24) and Mr. de Bruin's At Last (25). There are a few historic studies worthy of notice—e.g. the Siege of Amsterdam by the Prussians in 1787 (26), by Mr. Vervat, the Siege of Ostend, by Mr. Sypenstein (27), and the first volume of a work by Captain de Bas on the late Prince Frederick (28), a very attractive and interesting contribution to contemporary history.

We must also name the works of Moorrees and Geesink. The former does homage to the Liberalism of the seventeenth century by a study on Coornhert (29), one of the greatest poets of that period; while Mr. Geesink, in his study on Calvinism at Rotterdam in the early part of the seventeenth century (30), writes for those who profess themselves "orthodox" followers of the old Orange party and believers in the principles of the Synod of Dordrecht (1618).

A great deal of interesting information is to be found in Mr. Bredius's book (31)—in German—on the Amsterdam Museum, and that of Mr. Kruseman on the history of publishing in Holland (32). Mr. Opzoomer, son of the celebrated philosopher of Utrecht, has published a new edition of the documents found in

Mr. te Winkel's History of Dutch Literature (34), the first volume of which has been published, is a reliable and interesting work.

We now come to M. Kurth's (Professor of the University of Liège) excellent and important work on the history of civilization (35). The author traces the germs of civilization in the development of Christian doctrine and Christian feeling since the time of the Apostles. He starts from the principle that the establishment of the Roman Empire was destined only to serve as a basis for Christian civilization; and, after giving a cursory review of the history of the various nations who opposed the onward march of the Romans, declares them to have been incapable of founding Christian society. Professor Kurth invests Constantine and Charlemagne with a grandeur and sublimity of character which savours somewhat of exaggeration; ambition is never given as the motive of their actions, all of which seem to have had for aim the spreading of the Gospel. On the other side he is too much influenced by the humourist's judgment of history during the last three and a half centuries to do justice to the character, customs, and civilization of the Thiois races; first the Goths. We have only learnt to know the history of the Ostrogoths and their King Theodoric from the adversaries of the national rising of the people and tribes which put an end to the Roman domination. That is the reason why we do not sufficiently estimate their morality, order, force, and courage. We let ourselves forget all that the priest Salvein of Marseilles has said in favour of the honour of the Aryan races, while comparing their perfect integrity to the degradation of the Romans. Theodoric's secretary has alone given us the opportunity of knowing the Teutonic or Thioise civilization of the sixth century; but Cassiodore is very little known, and remains alone in the field with his Correspondence, which was not intended for publication. It is, therefore, pardonable that the historians of to-day should still always show, in their classical estimations, the effects of the influence of the anti-national revolution, which overturned historical studies, with all the traditions of the Beaux Arts (except in England), of the centuries anterior to the sixteenth. This point would not have prevented M. Kurth from avowing his Catholic principles; his book is good, for in it truth is sought—and this truth is rendered in an elegant and unaffected style. Notwithstanding, therefore, some slight failings the work merits serious perusal.

We must name the numerous smaller collections of the works of the best Belgian poets. Geniuses are however rare, and gifted writers have almost invariably given us their lyric strains in a few simple verses. We would, however, draw the attention of our readers to the works of M. A. E. Hiel, Mlle. H. Swarth, S. Daems, Van Droogenbroeck, Claeys, and others, who are writers of merit and taste. Many of their works have been translated by the Germans. MM. Edmond de Geest, G. Segers, Cyril Buysse, &c., have published various novels in the popular style, bordering, it is true, on the realistic, but always within the bounds of morality. This moral tendency is not wanting either to our Flemish plays. Flemish dramatic authors possess, as a rule, much dramatic sentiment, but are frequently wanting in finesse in the conception and development of the passions. They appear, as it were, somewhat unformed, and are consequently led to portray extravagantly improbable situations, like the old playwriters, thus giving a strong moral savour to their writings rather than any artistic value. Amongst such men of talent we name MM. P. Kints, J. Hoste, H. Peters, Gittens, Aug. Hendricx, H. Badden, &c., who severally publish annually a drama or comedy. Some take the historical drama, but rarely succeed in portraying the grand personages of history in a manner devoid of exaggeration; it is always party spirit, dominant in Belgium since 1830, which shows itself even in works of this kind. The war cry of the Germans in the twelfth century, "Hi Welf! hi Waibling!" resounds continually in Belgium: "Hi Liberaal! hi Klerikaal!" tertium non datur, influencing universally the fine arts.

The study of history, nevertheless, is daily gaining ground. We have already cited more than once the works of our best writers. M. Charles Piot, general archivist of the kingdom, has just published a large new book of the Correspondance de Granvelle (36) (Vol. VI.) It includes the years 1576 and 1577. The letters number ninety-four. They throw a vivid light upon the events which took place in these provinces at that date. They confirm the opinion the editor had already given of the character of Philip II. and of that of his lieutenant, the Duke of Alba. We have already rendered full justice to this opinion in a preceding article. The perusal of the present volume makes more evident to us the reasons for Requesens's discouragement at having on one hand his vacillating master, and on the other the urgent political measures demanding execution. We see the Council of State powerless to enforce obedience, and doing nothing well; the Duke d'Aerschot passing his time in amusements; Berlaymont sleeping at the table; even the Count of Mansfeld lightly esteemed, because "il veult mectre son nas partout"; Viglius anxious to maintain his precedency; D'Assonville, who is distrusted on account of his frivolity; Roda looked upon as "une maulvaise et dangereuse pièce." Such are the portraits of the Councillors of State drawn by Morillon.

Then we see constantly pecuniary difficulties, want of money to pay the troops fittingly, and in consequence riot, assassination, and pillage are the order of the day. The priests and nobles feared the Spaniards, and distrusted the arrival of Don Juan. Then occurred the so-called "Peace of Ghent," a peace made with many mutual reserves. Granvelle persuaded the King to endeavour to regain his subjects' affections, but having small confidence in Don Juan's talents, he advised that the Duchess of Parma should again be sent as Regent to the Netherlands. Instead of which, however, Don Juan was despatched to negotiate the peace. The Prince of Orange regretted having signed the peace, for he had not believed Don Juan would have kept his promise of sending back the Spanish troops. He sought to turn public opinion against the new governor, negotiations became impossible, violence again prevailed, the arrival of Mathias of Austria and the Duke of Anjou furnished a pretext for undermining Don Juan's authority, until eventually he was declared an enemy to the country. Amongst the most remarkable events related in this volume of the Correspondance we note the offer of the sovereignty of a part of the Netherlands to Elizabeth, Queen of England, and later the appeal for help addressed to France. Such is a brief sketch of this fine volume.. The author has added a chronological index of the letters and also one of the contents and personages; we hope these will be augmented by the addition of a general index of contents and personages with the circumstances and dates in which the latter appeared. This appendix will give the author a fresh claim to our thanks.

We must glance at a new volume by Canon Namêche (Vol. XX. of the "National History" Series), just published (37). We have more than once spoken of the characteristics of this finished and well-written work. With respect to the author's appreciation of the facts narrated, he displays too much toleration for his party, and, while in no way unduly biassing the points at issue, is willing to yield credence to the words of other writers of the same opinions as himself. The volume bears as second title "Fifth Part —Spanish Period," and embraces from the year 1583 to the death of Philip II. in 1598. From this death follows a sketch of the character of the King of Spain. The author employs the words of M. de Gerlache, "the great national historian," who compares Philip to Charlemagne as defender of the Church and Popes. M. de Gerlache, author of a History of the Netherlands in several volumes, has written especially by way of retaliation on the prejudiced judgments of some ardent defenders of the Revolution in the sixteenth century. But M. de Gerlache (who died in 1871) had not at command the discoveries made since the publication of his work in 1843. He would be very surprised to read in the Granvelle Correspondence and that of the Popes Pius V., Sixte V., &c., with what intense personal ambition, which almost caused a rupture with the Pontifical throne, the King, inflexible on certain points and vacillating on others, rendered services to the Church. He employed Catholic principles in the advancement of his own ends and in the gratification of his domineering spirit. M. de Gerlache would be still more surprised to hear that Granvelle had advised the King with respect to the assassination of William of Orange, who, in spite of his patriotism in favour of his country, could not successfully ameliorate the position of affairs, which were rendered yet more complicated by the error of the King himself in treating the chief of the Revolutionists with such exceptional rigour. The Granvelle Correspondence will show us this more fully in succeeding volumes.

The monographies of towns serve to throw a strong light on the local events of the Revolution in the sixteenth century. They confirm in certain respects Granvelle's Correspondence and characterize the personages with whom he treated. This is why we mention with pleasure some works of this kind published before the appearance of M. Piot's last volume. We note particularly a carefully-written work on the maritime town of Dixmude, in West Flanders—author, M. R. Pieters (38)—and the monography of the parish of Ixelles, Bruxelles (39).

Of no less importance is the monography of the little town of Fontaine l'Evêque (40), on account of the abundant details given and the extreme care taken in the researches made.

We can add to these studies those made regularly in the archives of monasteries at Cysoing (41), Géronsart (42), and elsewhere, which contribute much to a just appreciation of the civilization of the middle ages. Then a small work upon the monuments of Bruges (43); but all these are surpassed by that of M. Génard, already alluded to by us, of which new editions have just been published—Anvers à travers les âges

With respect to the monuments of Bruges, the work of the English archæologist Mr. James Weale, Bruges et ses environs (44), has not been surpassed.

The city of Antwerp has been also described by the pens of the two custodians of the Plantin Museum, in which are to be seen the ancient souvenirs, library, work-rooms, offices, furniture, pictures, stereotype-plates, type, &c., of the old and celebrated printing press of that name.

M. Max Rooses, the chief custodian, has published the Printer's Correspondence (45), which enables us to cast a glance on the religious and political intrigues of the factions of the sixteenth century. M. Rosseels, the under-custodian, publishes illustrations of the work-rooms and house itself (46). Yet a word remains to be said respecting various publications containing the history of the fine arts both in Holland and in Belgium. We perused with pleasure the study of the Mons in Hainault (47), by the archivist M. Th. Léopold de Villers. M. A. Schaepkens has published splendid illustrations of Liège (48). We may also name the work of M. Dewaele upon Ancient Architecture (49), and that of MM. Arendzen and Van Someren, who treat of Modern Art (50) in a superbly illustrated volume.

We must also name a solid work on Greek epigraphy published by Ch. Leemans of Leide (51). Lastly, Canon Reusens has issued a second illustrated edition of the "Elements of Christian Archæology" (52); and M. Guiffrey in France has given an illustrated edition of his remarkable work on tapestry (53), which contains the history of the workrooms of Ghent, Alost, and Bruxelles, with good index, &c. As to bibliography, the merit of the work of M. van der Haeghen, librarian of the University of Ghent, and his collaborateurs in publishing the Lipsienne bibliography (54) must be recognized. These volumes form part of the collection "Bibliotheca Belgica" which we have already named to our readers. The series of the works of Juste Lipse will be completed in three volumes. We take this occasion of recommending the "Dictionary of Belgian Authors since 1830" (55). As a useful aid in indicating the progress of literary affairs down to the year 1880, some numbers of this will continue to be issued.

NEWBURY is a little place. Mr. Money's volume is very big. Such are the first ideas suggested by the disproportion evident between book and borough, a disproportion which becomes less glaring when we find out how much Mr. Money has done to connect the history of Newbury with that of the whole country, and particularly to elucidate fully the circumstances connected with the battles which are the chief title of the town to fame. But Mr. Money begins at the very beginning, and devotes his first chapter to "The Roman and English settlement on the river Kennet." There is every reason to believe that the Roman station on the Ermin Street, mentioned as Spinæ in the Antonine Itinerary, may be identified with Speen, which is close to Newbury. A rare example of the survival of a Latin name is afforded by the mention of "Spene," in a charter of 821, printed in the Codex Diplomaticus. In a note on page 7, Mr. Money says that it is given as "Spinæ" in a charter of the tenth century; but we have failed to verify this statement by any of the documents he quotes or cites. There are various forms of the name, which is given as Spone in Domesday. The Saxons, as usual, abandoned the Roman site. "They neither took possession of the towns, nor did they give themselves the trouble to destroy them." Newbury was built, not for defensive, but commercial purposes, its situation being close to the Kennet. Contrary to the usage in other places, "the New-Bourg," as Mr. Money calls it, stood in more than one manor, and is thus, it may be, omitted from the Domesday Survey; though Mr. Money, in a very careful, but much too protracted, discussion of the evidence, identifies a great part of the modern town with the manor of "Ulvritone," held in 1086 by Ernulf of Hesding. There were fifty-one houses in Ulvritone, too large a number for an ordinary country manor, so that without going further into Mr. Money's arguments we may accept his conclusion, the more so as we find Ernulf giving the church of Newbury to the Norman Abbey of St. Peter of Preaux; and in a document preserved in the archives of the department of the Eure, in France, of a date probably about a year before the Domesday Survey, Mr. Money has found "Newberi" mentioned by name as having belonged to Ernulf.

Many readers will turn from these archaic passages to the later history of Newbury. Mr. Money keeps the territorial and manorial part of his narrative quite apart from what he puts under the heading of "Incidents connected with Newbury." After having belonged, among others, to Cecily, Duchess of York, the mother of Edward IV., to Queen Jane, the mother of Edward VI., to Queen Elizabeth, and to Anne, the Queen of James I., Newbury obtained a charter at last from Charles II. and became a municipal town. Meanwhile, the two battles had brought Newbury into prominence. The first, the indecisive but bloody struggle between King Charles and the Earl of Essex, is the most famous, because Lucius Cary, Lord Falkland, was among the slain. It was fought on September 20, 1643. In the second battle, on Sunday, October 27, 1644, the Earl of Manchester commanded the Parliamentary forces, having the advantage of Cromwell's assistance. Charles retreated during the night; but it would seem that each party thought itself beaten; and the charges Cromwell subsequently brought against Manchester show how bitterly he regretted the mistake on his side. Another, but much smaller, battle was fought in Newbury in 1706 between a mob and some recruiting officers. A sergeant was killed, and a great many people were wounded. At that time, and long afterwards, the position of Newbury on the high road from London and Reading to almost everywhere west and south gave it an importance which it has long survived. William III., Queen Anne, the Culloden Duke of Cumberland, and many other historical characters passed through the town, or resided in its neighbourhood, or paid it a visit in state. But Mr. Money's prolix notes embrace every kind of subject; we read of the systematic public flogging of women; of "cock-throwing" on Shrove Tuesday; of the establishment of a ducking-stool; of the conviction of a coiner; of the starting of a Flying Coach, which, in 1752, performed th journey to London in twelve hours. "The change effected in Newbury by the introduction of railroads was remarkable, and it has not yet recovered the loss of so important an interest," says Mr. Money. But there is a railway to it now; and, though the old cloth factories have disappeared, the town has a large trade in malt and corn, and wool is also a local staple. A monument to Lord Falkland and those slain with him in the first battle of Newbury was unveiled by Lord Carnarvon in 1878. More than a hundred pages towards the end of the book describe the church of St. Nicholas and the church records; and this inexhaustible and portly volume concludes at p. 595, at the end of an excellent index. We cannot help thinking that, by taking a little more time over his task, Mr. Money could have put all that is worth having of his book into about three hundred pages.

LAST year was a year of retrospects, among which the glorification of a free press and cheap literature was inevitable. Seasonable enough in the circumstances, this was only the resumption of old and oft-heard pæans, a praise of progress quite as likely to satiate the ear as to stimulate reverence for our wondrous mother-age. Cheap music, however, may be said to have long awaited the historian. Every one knows that we have cheap music, and every one knows that at a not far distant period we had it not. But how we have come to possess it until, as every town and village in the kingdom proclaims, it possesses us, in a sense that holds good of no other civilizing force in the community, is by no means so evident. It is probable there are not many musical people outside the profession, to say nothing of those who should be directly interested, who could give an explicit account of the growth of cheap music since 1837. There was excellent reason, therefore, why the Jubilee year should not pass without the publication of A Short History of Cheap Music. This is a clear, concise, and instructive sketch of the subject, and at the same time an accurate general survey of the history of music in England during the last five-and-seventy years. The opening chapter is headed by the Shakspearian motto, "When there was no music," and, though there never was a time when music was not—for no one can indicate the prehistoric period when men did not make music—the quotation is a figure of speech correctly applied to the first five-and-twenty years of this record. The retrospect begins with the year 1811, when the price of musical publications was prohibitive, except to the few choral associations of the day, or a limited number of wealthy amateurs. It was at this date that Vincent Novello became his own publisher by issuing his "Collection of Sacred Music" in two folio volumes, no publisher being willing to undertake the risk of an undertaking for which there was then little or no demand. This collection was used by the choir of the chapel of the Portuguese Embassy in South Street, Park Lane, where Vincent Novello officiated as organist. This publication, the first of a valuable series, was issued with full accompaniments for the organ, in the place of the figured bass then used; and we are told that the innovation was viewed with disfavour by the organists of the day who loved the mystery of their craft. Even more revolutionary was the appearance of the well-known edition of "Purcell's Sacred Music," commenced by Vincent Novello in 1828, and completed in 1832 by his son Alfred, who had begun publishing in 1829. This was the first publication of the Novellos edited for the service of the Church of England, and the only important series of the kind issued since the "Cathedral Service" of Boyce (1778), of Arnold (1790), and Page's Harmonia Sacra (1800). The older members of church choirs strongly objected, it appears, to the separate vocal parts issued by Alfred Novello, preferring to sing from incomplete MS. copies or from the old printed scores of Boyce, Arnold, and others. These perilous innovations were soon obscured by more enterprising achievements. In 1836 Alfred Novello purchased the English copyright of Mendelssohn's oratorio, St. Paul, and issued the pianoforte score in two parts at sixteen shillings each, and the vocal parts at five shillings each. The growth of our Musical Festivals to their present importance is to be dated from this event.

Cheap music is, of course, a term of relative significance. Vincent Novello's edition of the Masses of Mozart and Haydn was considered cheap in 1825. These varied in price from two shillings to nine and sixpence. There was cheap music when Her Majesty ascended the throne, though it differed from the cheap music of to-day as this differs from that of 1861, when Mr. Henry Littleton, after twenty years' connexion with Alfred Novello, became a partner in the firm. Sir George Grove, in the preface to this short history, recollects his expenditure of the first guinea he had given to him on a pianoforte score of the Messiah. This was in 1837. The book can now be bought for a shilling, and a pocket edition of St. Paul can be had for the same sum. In 1846 the Messiah was advertised for publication in twelve monthly numbers at one shilling, vocal score and separate organ or piano accompaniments, "the cheapest musical publication ever offered to the public." These examples suffice to show the progress of cheapness. The gradual abolition of fiscal restrictions stimulated the spread of cheap music, equally with cheap literature. But there are points of dissimilarity between the growth of the former and the vast and sudden increase of newspapers and cheap books that succeeded the removal of the paper duty and allied taxes. The field was free to the world of newspaper proprietors and book publishers, while the earlier enterprise of the Novellos made it possible for them to carry on the campaign with such vigour that competition pursued them in vain, like panting time in the adage. Sir George Grove is undoubtedly correct when he observes that individual sagacity and enterprise would have been unavailing without improved machinery and free industrial action; but the foresight that anticipates changed conditions is always a chief element of success. There is an aspect of the law of demand not generally recognized by orthodox economists. By wise production which may appear premature, but is really opportune, a demand is created. Years before the hour was fully ripe Alfred Novello was an active experimentalist in popularizing music. It is true you may over-produce and be crippled; but it is just as true that the fear of over-production, because the direction to be taken is new, has prevented timid men from reaping a pretty harvest. Among the curious items of information relating to the past history of music and music-publishing collected in this book of the chronicles of the house of Novello, there is nothing more suggestive than the story of their early struggles with fine old prejudices—printers' trades-unionism, Excise duties, and other obstacles to free music, in which, by the way, they were not without supporters. The book is prettily got up, and contains portraits of Vincent and Alfred Novello and Mr. Littleton, etched by Mr. H. R. Robertson.

THIS is the first instalment of what has every prospect of being the noblest illustrated work on Classical Archæology which has yet been produced. Among all living men there is probably no one who is more capable of doing justice to this magnificent subject than is Professor Brunn, the world-famed author of the Künstler-Geschichte, and countless monographs on classical art of all kinds. The scheme of this colossal work is a very ambitious one; it is to consist of no less than eighty fascicules, each containing five large autotype plates of selected examples of Greek and Roman sculpture, all executed from new negatives taken specially for the work, and printed by means of the best gelatine process in permanent pigment. Each part is to cost a pound; but as the whole issue will not be completed for six or seven years, the total cost of 80*l*. will be distributed from month to month throughout this period. If we consider the size and beauty of the plates (judging from Part I.) the work will not really be a too costly one, especially as it will include the very important text which Professor Brunn is now writing to illustrate the selected examples.

The fact is that the time has now come when a really valuable and monumental work on classical sculpture ought to be produced. The important discoveries of the last twenty years at Olympia, Epidauros, Troy, Mycenæ, Tiryns, Pergamus, Assus, and Ionia generally, Panticapæum, Cyprus, and other Greek islands, together with many other Greek sites, have been for the most part described and illustrated in papers scattered throughout an immense number of learned periodicals or in costly separate monographs. What we want now is a general review of the whole of this immense field of discovery, a collation of results, and a deductive lesson treated from a really comprehensive point of view; something, in fact, on a much larger scale and more satisfactory in treatment than such works, useful as they are in their way, as Mr. A. S. Murray's learned History of Greek Sculpture and Mrs. Mitchell's pleasant and well-illustrated handbook on the plastic arts of Greece and Rome.

It is difficult for us now to realize what a very recent thing the knowledge of Greek sculpture really is. It seems hardly credible that at the beginning of the present century the antiquaries of England in the main decided that the Parthenon sculpture which Lord Elgin was offering to the nation for less than the cost of its carriage was a work of the second century A.D., and that Phidias's marvellous pediment group contained as its principal figures portraits of Hadrian and his wife Sabina. It was not, in fact, till nearly the middle of the nineteenth century that the artistic and antiquarian world generally realized that such statues as the Venus de' Medici, the Apollo Belvidere, the Laocoon, and other world-famous works were not the crown and flower of Greek art, but the production (fine as they are) of a period of very distinct decadence, far below the much nobler period of Pericles, when Athens was at the height of her glory.

The five plates which Professor Brunn gives us in his first part embrace widely different dates and schools—from the very early and highly hieratic Apollo of Tenea, in which the sculptor, though working in marble, is still hampered by his respect for the primitive log-cut xoana of bygone centuries—down to the sleeping Barberini Faun, in which the utmost realism is expressed in every curve of the soft fleshy modelling, and most strikingly in the way in which the swollen veins of the hanging hand are indicated in an almost painfully truthful way.

Other plates, representing not marble but bronze sculpture, show the delicate capabilities of the phototype process to suggest the special textures of these different surfaces.

One very valuable addition in Professor Brunn's plates is the introduction of a mathematical scale under each statue—an important point, very frequently overlooked in such illustrations. We are glad to welcome the beginning of this much-needed work, and every student of classical archæology will rejoice that it has been undertaken by such a master of the subject as is Professor Heinrich Brunn, and so skilful a producer of autotype as Herr Friedrich Bruckmann of Munich.

SIR E. SULLIVAN ON THE TURF.*

SIR EDWARD SULLIVAN has recently republished, in the form of a pamphlet, entitled Ascot v. Monaco, some letters which, we believe, were originally addressed to the Morning Post on the subject of Turf abuses and iniquities. He appears thus to intimate that his utterances have not attracted sufficient attention and to invite further criticism. There is no particular reason why he should be disappointed in either particular. He is sure to be read, for he is always worth reading; and, if he is not reviewed, it will be because racing-men are as a rule too indifferent to the opinions of those whom, rightly or wrongly, they classify as outsiders. Furthermore, it must be admitted that much of Sir Edward's diatribe lies beyond possibility of dispute by any reasonable being. That ready-money gambling, if gamble we must, is infinitely preferable to the credit system; that playing against a bank where the dice are not loaded, the cards unmarked, the roulette-board unprovided with a secret spring, and where the croupiers, if not innately honest, are so watched that practical fair dealing becomes an efficient substitute for moral rectitude, is a more sensible proceeding than backing selling-platers and jockeys' mounts, are amongst the things which any fellow can understand, and, understanding, is forced to admit their truth. Again, we shall all agree that nothing can be more absurd than inveighing against opium-smoking in China or the tables at Monaco, if we wink at or uphold spirit-drinking and betting in England; and, if the "goodies" against whom Sir Edward urges his favourite parable of optical surgery do really take this very one-sided view of our own and our neighbours' methods of dabbling in play and poison, then are the "goodies" unutterably silly. But Sir Edward has been so long the Cassandra of the Morning Post, has so drugged himself with his own pessimism, that he can see no good in anything (except Protection). Once embarked on his career of invective, he tries to prove too much, and, straining after effect, falls into absurdity. For instance, everybody knows that ladies who frequent racecourses nowadays bet. Whether they pay or in what way is a secret between them and their commissioners; but which of us who "follow racing" can remember seeing "a female masher, flushed, excited, and unfeminine, exchanging bets with the howling demons of the Ring"? Yet such a sight would appear to be perfectly familiar to Sir Edward, whose detestation of Turf surroundings would, one might think, have limited his opportunities of observation. Again, when he is talking of cruelty (for it seems that some one has been complaining of the way in which horses are treated in Italy) he says:—"It is very shocking to hear the whacks resounding from the sides of the 'morti cavalli,' horses bought off the knacker's yard, in the shafts of the overloaded Neapolitan cabs; but it is a hundred times more shocking to hear the crack, crack, crack of the cruel cutting whip on the delicate flanks of the noble, generous, sensitive creatures, with coats of satin and skins as delicate as a woman's, as their riders urge them to superhuman efforts." Now this is sheer nonsense, and bad morality to boot; for, if a horse is really tortured so as to get the last ounce out of him, either between the shafts or under saddle, the cruelty in the one case is not a hundred times more shocking than in the other—it is just exactly the same, neither more nor less; but we totally deny that the suffering inflicted is the same, or even comparable in degree; for, not to mention the spirit of emulation—a strong passion in the thoroughbred, and one which, for the moment, probably renders him almost insensible to pain—let any one contrast the appearance of a Neapolitan cab-horse at the end of his journey with that of a racer after any struggle, however prolonged and severe, and there can be no doubt in whose favour, as far as outward and visible symptoms go, the verdict would be given. Is Sir Edward by chance a follower of Pythagoras? and, if so, into which of the two bodies would he himself prefer transmigration? In the next paragraph he—a man who professes to write about racing—asks almost childish questions. "What," he says, "is the plain English of such everyday sporting expressions as that 'the horse was ridden with the greatest determination,' 'was ridden right out,' &c?" and then he proceeds to answer according to his own ideas. "What does it mean but that a strong man with sharp spurs and a cutting whip used all his strength, and his cunning, and his cruelty to urge some poor beast to impossible efforts?" Pace Sir Edward, "it" does not necessarily, or even according to "its" habitual interpretation, mean these things. Riding a horse with the greatest determination means that the jockey was resolved not to be shut out or disappointed, and, catching hold of his horse, shoved him vigorously home through his field. Strength and cunning are doubtless displayed on such occasions; cruelty, as we hope and believe, is rarely practised. "Ridden right out" is the usual form of expressing the writer's opinion that there was no intention of concealing the horse's form by pulling him back into the ruck when he could easily have been second or third, while "fading away to nothing" simply means that the animal thus spoken of could not go the pace or stay the distance, and so dropped rapidly astern; certainly not, as Sir Edward would have us believe, that "the poor tortured beast got faint and could struggle on no further." We are far from saying that the whip is not often needlessly applied, for it unquestionably loses more races than it wins; but we do most emphatically protest against such words as "torture" and "cruelty" being used at random. When the formidable crack, crack, crack is heard at the finish, the older jockeys are mostly hitting their boots, while the younger ones are neither strong enough, nor sufficiently master of the weapon, to inflict much pain. Let those who doubt go and examine the horses' flanks as they return to the paddocks, and see how many show marks of the whip on their satin coats. Spurs, we admit, make rather more show, though without any real injury. Sir Edward Sullivan was formerly very fond of hunting. Did he never give his mount a taste of the prickers when within three strides of a brook or bullfinch? and would he not have been highly indignant at being denounced as a torturer for so doing? "When you come to Jordan, you must gaff him, and give him the office," said the coper to Lord Wilton; and, though that refined peer avowed himself ignorant of the meaning of the phrase, he was fully alive to the necessity of the practice on occasion. From the forcible remarks on plunging with which Sir Edward concludes his first epistle he will find none but fools to dissent.

"Ascot v. Monaco" is followed by two letters under the title of "Noblesse Oblige," the first of which has for its motive the warning off of Lord Ailesbury. That a peer of the realm should have received the extreme sentence of racing law will, Sir Edward hopes, have the same beneficial result for the Turf that Sydney Smith was wont to say would accrue to railway travelling from the killing of a director. The simile has been worn somewhat threadbare; still 'twill serve, Sir, 'twill serve; only why are we to be solemnly warned against "pretending that this wretched scapegoat carries on his head all the sins of the Turf"? Who ever said or imagined that he did? and does Sir Edward suppose, as he would almost lead us to believe, that he alone amongst men of good birth sees with shame and sorrow this lowering of the pride of caste? But there is no pleasing him. He complains that amongst racing men "roguery is dismissed with a smile, rascality with a shrug"; but when roguery and rascality are summoned before the Stewards of the Jockey Club and dismissed with the heaviest sentence which it is in the power of that tribunal to inflict, we are told that the upholders of morality are humbugs, and the delinquents scapegoats—such at least we conclude to be the meaning of the following sentences:—"A peer of the realm has pulled his horses and Turf morality is scandalized! But what is Turf morality? It is difficult to define; its value is very local. A tells his jockey to 'pull' his horse; B tells his jockey his horse is 'not meant.' A is warned off every racecourse in the country, whilst B is not even censured. But what is the difference?" Well, indeed, may Sir Edward ask; and when he goes on to say that he is told that "you must be on the Turf to understand the immense difference between 'pulling' and not 'being meant,'" we can only reply that you may be on the Turf a very long time without discovering that there is any difference at all, as an owner or jockey would find to his cost if, when haled before the Stewards, he endeavoured to screen himself with such shadowy, or rather shady, distinctions.

Letter No. 2 of the "Noblesse Oblige" couple commences with a fairly ironical recantation of previous error after the perusal of some answers which appeared in the daily papers to Sir Edward's above-noticed onslaughts on turfites. General Owen Williams was, if we rightly remember, the leading counsel for the defence, and replied temperately enough to the main charges, though, as we are unfortunately not able to refer at the moment to the General's letter, we must perforce forbear from any attempt at quotation. Sir Edward will pardon us for wishing that he had stuck throughout the chapter to the sarcastic vein, wherein, notwithstanding the recurrence of the irrepressible mote and beam, he is always especially happy; but he soon wearies of it, and lapses into more matter-of-fact lamentation, one of his sorrows being that, though "it is a sight for gods and men to see a Bendigo, Bend Or, or Dutch Oven, yet how often do we see them?" Well, not quite so often as we could wish perhaps, yet may he rest assured that the owners of such celebrities are pretty certain to pull them out as often as condition and engagements permit. He could hardly expect them to be put into overnight handicaps; and so long as he continues to frequent Ascot, he may confidently reckon upon seeing there the pick of the equine basket. Then he boldly asserts that "the Turf is the very grave of horses," and here we must take leave at once to join issue with him. The Turf is not the grave but the cradle of horses, as the foreign buyers abundantly testify, and if we choose to eat our cake in the shape of francs or Friedrichs-d'or, instead of keeping it in the national cupboard, we deserve to be lectured for our folly from a totally different standpoint. No man is more capable of doing this than Sir Edward Sullivan, but the subject is too large to be dealt with here.

Once again is the case of Ascot v. Monaco—part heard—called in court, and betting contrasted most unfavourably with Sir Edward's favourite game of rouge et noir. Who wishes to quarrel with his taste? Yet he seems to imply that the British turfite is shocked, and holds up his hands in horror at any form of gambling save that which has the horse for its instrument, and that an Englishman at the Monte Carlo tables is as unfamiliar a spectacle as would be an alligator in Ranksborough gorse. It is not quite easy to reconcile the writer's statement that, "When I talk about the demoralizing effects of racing I am not thinking of the Jockey Club or the upper ten thousand at all; I am thinking of the other end of the stick altogether," with his pathetic expression of sorrow over the ruin of "scores of nice, honest, generous, high-class gentlemen" with whom he had lived on friendly and affectionate terms—even without this assurance we should doubt his having rubbed his shoulders much against the other end of the stick.

The fourth letter which concludes this homily series is headed "The Turf," though "Advice to the Jockey Club" would have perhaps been a better title for an admonishment to that body herein symbolized as "The Tit-willows," who have now offended Sir Edward by their want of unanimity as to the proper method of dealing with a celebrated case which is or soon will be sub judice, and into the merits of which it is, therefore, impossible to enter.

His charge of want of unanimity Sir Edward can hardly pretend to substantiate; for, if we may judge by a very full report of the proceedings in Tit-willow conclave, the little birds, though they may not during argument have all chirped on the same note did nevertheless ultimately arrive at a unanimous decision, and one, moreover, which has met with public approval so general that it also may be called unanimous. Few, if any, will be the dissentients from the pamphleteer's invective against jockeys betting; he will find on investigation that the Tit-willows are tolerably unanimous in their agreement as to the magnitude of the evil, and the difficulty of suppressing it. Nor will any one gainsay his statement that "you can no more make a jockey incorruptible than you can a policeman or a member of Parliament"; at the same time he should remember that, in our present state of civilization, the jockey, the policeman, and the M.P. are apparently necessary—nuisances, if he likes so to think—but still necessary. The instance quoted of a late member of the Jockey Club who had his horse's hocks "bespattered with dung and water" before a race in order to drive him back in the market, thus vouched for, must be accepted as true. The best and worst that can be said of it is—that it was a dirty trick.

Happily however for its friends, the diseases of the body politic of the Turf are not, in Sir Edward's opinion, quite incurable; the physician's diagnosis is appalling, but he has a remedy—heroic, he calls it; his readers can give it what name they please. The patient is to cure himself by a happy thought—i.e. the Jockey Club, after shortly giving their reasons for so momentous a decision, are to say:—"We will, therefore, agree among ourselves that we will never bet more than 100*l.* on a race"!! This magic formula will make all things well; for we have it on Sir Edward's authority that "The hand of Circe could never have changed men into swine with greater celerity than such a resolution would turn black sheep into white ones." It is true that his next sentence is, "What nonsense!" and perhaps he will have more disciples as commentator than as apostle.

BLAMELESS HYPERBOREANS.*

FEW people can be better acquainted with the Eskimo than Dr. Rink. He has been Royal Inspector of South Greenland, and his Tales and Traditions of the Eskimo (Blackwood, 1875) should be familiar to all students of backward races. The new publication of Dr. Rink* is a translation from the Danish, and in places the version is a little obscure. It consists of two parts—the second a study, with a glossary, of the Eskimo language; the former an account of their manners and customs, with an attempt to discover their original seat and the lines of their migration.

The Eskimo are an aquatic people. They are seldom found except on the sea-coast or beside rivers. Concerning the Eskimo there is a prevalent belief that they are Communists, having neither chiefs nor separate property. This opinion is not absolutely correct. It appears, however, that of all people whom we know they most nearly approach the Aristotelian ideal of property made, practically, common by good will (φιλότης). Some Eskimo hold slaves, and in Dr. Rink's earlier book we read that on a death the eldest son inherited the boat and tent, "with the duties incumbent on the provider." Three kinds of communities exist:—The family; the house-mates, three or four families dwelling together in a house built by joint labour, and common property; place-mates, dwellers in the same hamlet. It is so interesting to see how the universal problems of society, property, and poverty are tackled by the uncivilized races, that we should devote some attention to the Eskimo manner of life. They are anything but wealthy, and, in fishing at least, they are very laborious. Comforts are distributed with great equality, and the question arises, how is this managed? The answer will be, that where communities are small, where the bond of kinship is very strong, where public opinion is orderly and omnipotent, and based on powerful sanctions of religion or superstition, there a state of society resembling Communism may flourish. There will be something like equality, and there will be no triumphs of art or of skill or of literature. We shall find a people comparatively happy, and nearly destitute of history; a people which, if destroyed by pestilence or cataclysm, would leave scarcely more monuments than the pre-glacial races. Whether this is, or is not, a more desirable condition of affairs than "the triumphs of civilization" need not be discussed. But, as far as the history of the race has been read, no other conditions of society are, or at least have yet been found, favourable to the equality and absence of extreme poverty which is one of our contemporary ideals.

We shall take from Dr. Rink's earlier work a survey of the laws affecting property. All the inhabitants of a winter station receive some share of the seals captured. Any one might fish, and use the weirs made by others. House-mates, but not place-mates, were fed by the families best off for food at the moment. "Virtually the surplus of any individual or community was made over to those who had less." But the property essential to each individual was secured to him by a kind of supernatural sanction, resembling the tabu. Apparently a man with, say, three coats was not supposed to have this protection extended to the third coat. If we suppose these rules suddenly brought into European civilization, it is plain that extensive idleness would be the first result. Those who had nothing would use up the property of those who had something—while it lasted. Among the Eskimo the community checked this, partly by exposing the idler to satirical songs at the meetings of place-mates. In places where, as in Danish West Greenland, European influence has been felt, the old communism flourishes, but the old customary obligations to work have weakened, and "the natural consequence has been impoverishment." Capital punishment is inflicted by the decision of the community on witches, and on individuals obviously dangerous to the public. Though the Eskimo are generally regarded as chiefless, Dr. Rink, in his new book, says that each house or station has its chief or patriarch. A punishment as severe as turning a man out of the house in midwinter has been noticed. There is another authority—the Angakok—a kind of Brehon, or authorized wizard and judge.

All this condition of society rests on the extreme dependence of man on man in these very small and isolated communities. To be turned out of them would be nearly equivalent to death, or, at least, to the condition of the Weendigo, the lonely ogre of Labrador. Moreover, while the development and improvement of boats and harpoons is noticed as you pass from the Western to the Eastern tribes, "the contrary may be said so far as regards social organization." The conditions for accumulating individual property are more favourable in the West, but there it is checked by a habit of making profuse gifts. A well-to-do Western Eskimo is like a rich Athenian of old. The gifts of the former answer to the "liturgies" of the latter. Position and influence are acquired by this gift-giving, and, when position is once firmly secured, we may doubt how long the giving will last. There is arising something like the system of Rank which prevails among the Indians further south. The keeping of slaves, "of all habits the one apparently most at variance with Eskimo social life," is developed. Among the Ahts, a neighbouring Indian people, "the person who gives away most property receives the greatest praise, and in time acquires the highest rank," not hereditary, "obtainable by such means." In fact, this generosity resembles that of a person engaged in "nursing a constituency."

Such is the communism of the Eskimo. The generous readiness to give is noticed among other races, such as the Samoans—where nobody used to grudge what was necessary to a person of his own kindred—and among the American Red Men, where Tanner actually saw it die out under European influence. These are the virtues of races not pressed by any competition, but either occupying huge tracts of empty country, or keeping down population by systematic infanticide. The problem of modern society is to secure the results of the virtues of savages in conditions entirely different, so different that, in place of the isolated hamlet, we have great nations frantically competing with other crowded nations, their neighbours in a little world. All this naturally suggests the conclusions of Anarchism—namely, that it is desirable to make a clean sweep of everything and of almost everybody, and to start fresh in an affectionate and guileless savagery. Short of this rather truculent method, it is not very easy to see how the conditions in which the only known kind of successful communism exists can be secured. Nor could the process be triumphant in one country alone, for that would be annexed by a powerful individualistic neighbour long before it reached the happy state of these blameless hyperboreans, the Eskimo. Indeed, the same objection meets the less ferocious theories of industrial Socialism. Unless all peoples, or most, take to that plan simultaneously, the Socialistic countries will not be able to compete with their selfish rivals.

As to the origin of the Eskimo, Dr. Rink supposes that they originally dwelt in the interior of Alaska, wandered to the river mouths, spread north along Behring Strait, and "hived off" colonies to the opposite shore, to the Mackenzie River, to Labrador and Greenland. They must have moved, as they move now, in very small bands, as the region could not support larger numbers; for agriculture is not and cannot possibly be the chief industry of the Eskimo. This theory is supported by evidence as to the improved development of dress and weapons along the route. Could it not be argued that the route was in the opposite direction, and that dress and implements degenerated under new conditions?

As to religion and folklore, Dr. Rink has not very much to say in this book. Masks are used as in Greece and Mexico at the religious festivals for "devil-scaring or devil-squaring," as some one has defined the purposes of savage religion. The myths are just like those of other peoples. In place of a mangled Osiris, Purusha, or Omorca, or Ymir, out of whose fragments things were made, in Chaldæa, Egypt, India, or Scandinavia, we have a mangled woman, Arnaguagsak. She was sailing with her father in a kayak and was upset. With great presence of mind her father chopped off her fingers and hands when she clung to the boat, and these became seals and whales. Like Ino, she is now a sea-goddess.

In Eskimo Märchen exist "the elements of folklore," scattered incidents and characters, and situations. "They are combined in various ways, and such compilations can be taken out of one story and inserted in another." This is true of the popular tales of every people. "Finally, these elements or parts are filled out and cemented by what tends to form a new story." A communistic people do not object to plagiarism in romance. The only account of the folklore and mythology of the Western tribes is in the American Naturalist (July 1886), by Mr. Murdoch. The tribes descend from a dog. The swan maiden myth, found by Castren among the Samoyeds, was discovered in Greenland by Egede. It is practically universal, though in Shetland and Ashanti we have a seal or a fish-maiden in place of a swan-maiden. The Eskimo know the Symplegades, "cliffs able to clasp them."

As to language, Dr. Rink's book will be interesting to philologists. Eskimo is so "polysynthetic" that "one word is able to express a whole sentence, including subordinate sentences." This "exhibits acute and logical thought." Here is a specimen:—uvtivoq = "The hairy side of the skin is getting loose." Nothing can be more polysynthetic.

It will be seen that the history and manners of the Eskimo deserve more attention than they commonly receive. Dr. Rink leaves one question almost untouched—Have the Eskimo been in any way affected by contact, in the middle ages, with the Norsemen? Their lamps are said to have been borrowed from the Norse; but nothing else shows that they ever were in contact with the Vikings.

NOVELS.*

WITHOUT being able to lay claim to any very startling originality, Molly's Story is a distinctly readable and interesting book. It is written in the form of an autobiography, or, as Mr. Merryfield calls it, "A Family History as related by a Faithful Servant." The faithful servant in question is one "Molly Russell," who describes graphically and at some length the various vicissitudes of the Blackburn family, to whose service she has devoted her life. One cannot help wishing that these vicissitudes were not of such a uniformly disastrous character; for indeed, as the story stands, "Misfortunes of a Family" would be a far more appropriate title than "A Family History." Here is a novel after Mr. Ruskin's own heart. Molly's Story does not culminate in a wedding and leave to conjecture the subsequent doings of the happy pair—the reader is given a most comprehensive insight into the married life of three generations of the same family, though, alas! they are anything but happy pairs. Mr. Merryfield stands godfather to one of the chief characters in his book, and has made a most judicious selection. Squire Merryfield is a thorough type of a genial, honest, fox-hunting country gentleman. By the way, did the Nimrods of the time hunt with a pack of dogs? In the amusing account of the run in which Molly involuntarily wins the brush the huntsman tells her that "the dogs will kill directly." It would be interesting to know what kind of dogs our grandfathers used for the noble sport. The story of so long a life as that of Molly naturally embraces a large number of important historical events; but the rapidity with which she skips from one to another without any mention of the intervening years is at times rather startling. However, these are unimportant details. Molly's Story is decidedly interesting, and much better written than the majority of three-volume novels.

There is ample material for a most interesting and powerful story in The Woman He Loved; the plot is excellent, and the incidents well worked in; but there the merits of the novel end. Anything more ridiculously stilted and unnatural than the language used cannot well be imagined—even the habitués of the gilded saloons of a transpontine melodrama do not give vent to their feelings in so high-flown a manner as do the characters in this book, who are obviously intended to represent the conventional occupants of a matter-of-fact world. Some of the sentences are so spun out that the mystified reader has to hark back more than once to their commencement before he can disentangle the skein of ideas in which, at every word, he becomes more and more involved. The following laconic phrase will serve as an example of the author's verbosity:—

> No, had he borne the uneffaceable stamp which marks the man who has seen much, and the soft, gentle edges of whose nature have been gradually rounded off by close and changeful contact with life's human stream—a contact, moreover, from which it is impossible to escape without contamination; for, though there may be the good, there certainly is the bad, and faith and trust in the mass of surging, wrestling mortals is not to be brought about by a thorough knowledge of them—he would have evinced nothing more than a listless, well-bred curiosity, prompted probably by the desire to know whether this were not a new snare flung across his path, like the old ones so terribly fraught with evil, when he had believed them good and pure; so cruelly unworthy when he had placed unhesitatingly his love and honour in their hands; only to have it ruthlessly flung back upon him.

The characters in this novel are quite on a par with the language. Gerard Clarencourt, the hero, is a precocious, pompous young pedant, who richly deserves all the misfortunes he brings upon himself by his blind infatuation for a heartless, scheming woman nearly old enough to be his mother. He talks in a patronizing and superior manner to a girl who is far and away too good for him, if only his smug self-satisfaction would let him recognize the fact. This girl, Lilian Fabyn, is the only person of any importance to the story for whom one can feel the least sympathy or respect. Her untimely death is not as lamentable as it otherwise would be, inasmuch as it releases her from wasting her love on so worthless an object as Gerard. Were it not for the trashy style in which it is written, The Woman He Loved would be an interesting book. As it is, one can only regret that an excellent story such as this should be so severely handicapped by unskilful treatment.

It is, indeed, refreshing to read a novel in which everything is not made subservient to a mere stringing together of more or less exciting incidents, to the utter exclusion of all that can appeal to the intellect. The author of A Voice in the Wilderness has skilfully avoided this far too common fault, and produced a work that is a perfect gem in many respects. In novels of the stamp before referred to, a most cursory reading will enable us to gather all that is necessary for their appreciation—if we are more conscientious and plod steadily through from cover to cover, with what is our mistaken zeal rewarded?—padding. So long as strong meat is provided for the public palate in the shape of a few thrilling episodes, the author appears to feel that he has performed his part of the contract, and that the sauce with which that meat is served is an unimportant detail. There is no padding in A Voice in the Wilderness; it would be hard to find a single unnecessary word in all the three volumes, more especially in the dialogue, which is concise and peculiarly happy in idea and expression. Some of the passages are most amusing and well worth lingering over, particularly Mrs. Wentworth's accounts of the various exploits of her children. The characters of these children are admirably drawn; they are original in everything, and their logic is irresistible. Under ordinary circumstances one would think no punishment bad enough for a girl who breaks two of her brother's front teeth with a ginger-beer bottle because she thinks he is drinking more than his fair share. When we hear Diana's naïve defence of her conduct we cannot help seeing the matter from her point of view, and feeling that she, after all, is the aggrieved party:—"She said that Wilfrid was taking shameful advantage of her, for the bottle being stone she was entirely dependent on his sense of honour." Could one wish for a more satisfactory explanation from a child of twelve? The reason she gives for her affection for young Sherlock is also delicious:—"She says his mind is such a perfect blank, and that a perfect blank is a great relief to an overwrought brain." Antoinette herself, the central figure of the story, is a study; she seems to have the gift of expressing herself on any subject in such a manner as to throw an entirely new light on even the most commonplace topics, and force her hearers to view them from her own highly original standpoint. Her conversation teems with analogies, mostly new, and always appropriate. But, though her every word and action bear all the impress of a cultivated mind, yet she is never the least priggish, but a thoroughly human and lovable girl. All the other characters are natural and unexaggerated. A Voice in the Wilderness is a book that will bear reading more than once, if only for its clever dialogue.

GAME, SHORE, AND WATER BIRDS OF INDIA.*

THE author's object in compiling this work was—he tells us in the preface to the first edition—"to remove, if possible, the difficulty that exists in tracing birds to their proper names." This object he may be fairly held to have achieved. He gives in each instance the scientific name of the species, with its derivation (from the list of the British Ornithologists Union); then, where possible, the provincial synonyms, followed by length, weight, and a description of plumage which seldom extends beyond three lines. We venture to believe this book would have been more useful to those for whom it was written if something had been added to these definitions. The book, as it seems to us, has suffered partly from undue curtailment, partly from undue detail. The author, with a view no doubt to thoroughness, has—following Jerdon's example (Birds of India, 1862–3)—taken us through many tribes and genera of the orders of birds with which he deals which are quite unrepresented in India. For the scientific ornithologist this scheme is superfluous, for the average Indian sportsman or observer it is beyond the mark; he would have been content to have heard less of birds who do not inhabit India, if he might have heard more of birds that do. To give one instance. We could have dispensed with ostriches, rheas, emus, and cassowaries; but should like to have been told more about the crab-plover. Here, besides a description of plumage, we get this laconic dismissal:—"Genus Dromas. Feet much webbed. Found in India—a remarkable genus." The genus, which contains but one species, is remarkable in more ways than one. It is conformable, in entirety, to no one type, and has been consequently in a normal condition of "moving on." Cuvier put it with the Ibises, Blyth with the Terns, Gray with the Stilts, while Jerdon regarded it as an aberrant form of Stone Plover; its nesting-places, too, were until comparatively recently but little known. But the author might have told us something of all this.

The woodcuts are clever, but not always accurate—e.g. that of the Stone Curlew, whose bill belongs to some one else, and whose skull is wrongly shaped. Colonel Le Messurier has entered this bird by a specific name that seems to show that he is favourable to the "making of species." In these days of many names the sound scientific maxim "Collate resemblances, keep clear of differences," touches us all nearly. "Crepitans"—Temminck's specific name for this bird—may not have been well chosen, but at least it has been accepted long, and it is a pity to emphasize what is at best a climatic difference by another name.

Finally, "Let the shoemaker stick to his last." Colonel Le Messurier opens his book with a dissertation upon the exo-skeleton of birds in general. To do this is to begin at the wrong end of a wide subject, which should be approached quite differently, and knows no royal road. Nor is such a treatise at all necessary to the proper understanding of the book, for the descriptive nomenclature is popular rather than scientific. "Back," "bill," "legs," "feet" are terms that every one understands; and "primaries," "secondaries," "tail-coverts," every "birdy" schoolboy knows. It is a good, honest book, which well fulfils its avowed purpose; then why go and spoil it by a smattering of things beyond?

The key to the system is quite first-rate in its simplicity and comprehensiveness. It is because we think this book so useful that we have ventured to suggest some alterations which, in our opinion, would make it even more so. It has already gone through three editions; if in the next the author would add something on immature plumage, on nesting, and on habits generally, the book would be doubled in value.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

ALTHOUGH Count d'Haussonville's essays on Mérimée and on the English diplomatist who is best known as having given Frederick II. in his old days divers very good Rolands for the royal Olivers (1) have nothing particular to do with one another, they are quite welcome in a handy volume together. The latter and shorter piece requires no particular notice, though it is sympathetic and intelligent. The two hundred pages of the first contain an excellent apology for a writer whom political and miscellaneous causes combined have caused to be, as a rule, rated further below his true value in his own country than any other of the really great writers of this century. It is enriched with many of Mérimée's letters to Mrs. Senior and others, all of which are as charming reading as those to the Inconnue—the first Inconnue—and to Panizzi. M. d'Haussonville admits and deplores the one really great fault of Mérimée—a fault shown more in conversation than in writing—that is to say, his indulgence, not merely without regard to the feelings of his company, but often in direct disregard of those feelings, in a crude eighteenth-century impiety which was as offensive to good manners as to orthodoxy. But he protests, as all good judges of human nature who know the facts must protest, against the uncritical habit of taking the fanfaronnade of cynicism for cynicism itself. In his brief remarks on Mérimée's literary work we think that he restricts the range of his admiration rather too much, though the admiration itself is certainly not too high.

M. Stofflet (2) has had the idea (pretty, i'faith, la!) of writing a book about the principal persons who have illustrated in French history the pretty name of Margaret. Even Marguerite de Bourgogne gets a place, despite her evil repute; and the third of the triad of Valois Marguerites does not frighten M. Stofflet, though he "slides," as his countrymen would say, over her, and does not even mention the celebrated petticoat of pockets with a dead lover's heart in each, which the Margot of Margots wore in her fantastic, discrowned, disbeautied, but still amiable, old age. Perhaps so discreet a chronicler throws away some of his chances of popularity, but he is hardly to be blamed for that.

In this age of publication of "documents," it was quite right that the hitherto unpublished Life of Beaumarchais (3) by his friend Gudin, which even biographers have hitherto been content to take on trust from the extracts of M. de Lomenie, should see the light as a whole. It could not have found a more competent editor than the joint editor of Diderot and the editor of Grimm. We may, perhaps, be able to take further notice of the bearing of these memoirs on one of the most curious and debated of life-histories.

A good deal has been written at sundry times and in divers manners on the curious, and sometimes disgusting, subdivisions of Russian nonconformity—a trait in which the Russian people, or peoples, stand distinguished from all other Continental folk—Roman, Orthodox Greek, and even to some extent Protestant. In England and in Russia only can the Dissenter be said to be an institution. He has, as regards Russia, generally been written about for foreigners by foreigners, a defect from which M. Tsakni's book is free (4).

Books on the Egyptian events of the last six years have usually had the defect of being written either by Englishmen or by Frenchmen, and thus of being almost certainly committed to a side. M. Scotidis (5), who was Greek Vice-Consul in Egypt at the time, has written a short history of the Arabist insurrection, which is free from this defect. Although anxious for the retention of the Egyptian question as a strictly international and not merely an Anglo-Turkish one, he is perfectly fair, and, indeed, decidedly favourable to England, while he is most certainly not favourable, though quite fair, to Mr. Blunt's equally unfortunate and unheroic protégé.

"Topchi's" (6) little book is a curious one, smacking more of the last century than of the present. It consists of notes by a not unknown Swede, who desires apparently to retain his incognito, of visits to most European capitals during the last eight years—notes diplomatic, political, personal, and miscellaneous. It will be found in parts worth turning over by those who are or would like to be well informed of Continental affairs and persons.

We may mention briefly a useful Map of the quarters of the French army for 1888 (Paris: Le Soudier), a new issue of M. Oger's school edition of Le philosophe sans le savoir (Paris and London: Hachette), an admirable little collection of last-century Motifs décoratifs, from A. de St. Aubin, in the sixpenny series of the Bibliothèque d'éducation artistique (Paris: Librairie de l'Art), and a useful little Précis de pétrographie (Paris: Rothschild). In two recent periodicals there are articles worth noting, the conclusion of the account of the French mission with Charles Edward in the last quarterly Annales des sciences politiques, and a paper by M. Glinel in the February Livre on Arvers, the famous "Mon âme a son secret" sonneteer.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THERE are books whose very subject conveys an assurance of good reading. Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's Life and Times of John Wilkes (Ward & Downey) is an example of this literature of fair promise. No richer or more suggestive theme could engage the practised writer. Entertaining and readable these volumes could not fail to be, and without doubt they will be read, and are, with certain deductions, worth the reading. The story of Wilkes's extraordinary career is a melodramatic farce of the most alluring kind. The romance of it is now a little blurred, perhaps, while its phases of fateful irony that once seemed almost tragedy are less moving than they once were. It is impossible to make a hero of Wilkes, and Mr. Fitzgerald shuns the attempt wisely. He is more engaged with the portraiture of Wilkes as the fortunate adventurer; and this, indeed, is the more attractive aspect of the demagogue's career. In the huge farce played for the benefit of John Wilkes by friends and enemies alike, the grave constitutional issues raised were rather accidents than original elements of the plot. It mattered not who was in power—Grenville, the first Rockingham Ministry, Lord Grafton (his old crony), or Lord North—the Government and House of Commons played into the hands of Wilkes. No doubt there was luck on his side, as Mr. Fitzgerald shows; but superior wit and impudence were also his. Dealing with tricksters and their tools—the Fitzherberts and Macleanes—Wilkes showed himself the finer trickster. And so it was in every development of the game. Mr. Fitzgerald's work shows plenty of research, and is, as we said, readable. But it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that it might have been far more readable and a good deal more entertaining. It is not a model narrative. It shows a strange neglect of those minor matters connected with method that make a book readable. Something of its lack of cohesion is attributable to haste. There is repetition in places where even recapitulation was to be deprecated. Thus Carlyle's reminiscence of Commodore Wilkes and the Trent is repeated, and a portion of Wilkes's correspondence that should have found a place in the first volume is dealt with in the penultimate chapter of the second. This is ingenuously accounted for by the plea that the correspondence had not been seen when the previous matter was in type. We find "Lord Littleton" on one page, and in the index, which is very incomplete, "Greville" appears for Grenville. Of Wilkes's attacks on Johnson Mr. Fitzgerald observes, "No wonder the lexicographer always spoke of Jack Wilkes with horror and dislike"—which, of course, it is easy to show by the immortal pages of Boswell, cited afterwards by Mr. Fitzgerald, is far indeed from being the truth. It is impossible to agree with Mr. Fitzgerald that Samuel Martin's reference to Wilkes in the House of Commons, which led to the duel, proves the unfairness of Macaulay's charge against the latter that he deliberately picked a quarrel with Martin. The scurrilous attacks on Martin in the North Briton amply justified Martin's speech and Macaulay's view of the matter.

It seems superfluous to commend at this date that invaluable compendium of statistics the Statesman's Year Book, edited by Mr. J. Scott Keltie (Macmillan & Co.) This admirable handbook—now in its twenty-fifth year—is in method of arrangement and tabulation the ideal book for reference. What is to be sought is to be found with the minimum expenditure of time. That the vast body of information it contains is corrected to the last available date we have tested with complete satisfaction, and there is probably no fairer test than to seek among the obscurer items referring to the less known countries of the globe.

The Official Year Book of the Church of England for 1888 (S. P. C. K.) is another vast compilation of statistics and general information, illustrating the progress of Church work and extension during the past year. The volume is extremely interesting reading as an historical record, not less than an instructive manual for reference. Any one of its numerous sections abounds in convincing proofs of the Church's activity, and it would be not a little embarrassing to decide in which direction progress is most manifested.

Law's Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (Griffith, Farran, & Co.) is one of a class of books that might find more favour with the projectors of the "Ancient and Modern Library of Theological Literature." These reprints have hitherto included works already available, with one or two exceptions, to every buyer of cheap literature. The editor places Law's work second in influence only to the Pilgrim's Progress, though Baxter's Call to the Unconverted and Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion must be considered close competitors with it in popularity. Like Law's book, the last-mentioned work earned the praise of Johnson, though it is by no means so notable and did not herald a new religious movement.

The special aim of Mr. J. Talboys Wheeler's College History of India (Macmillan & Co.) is admirably realized. It retains all those characteristics of the author's Shorter History of India that are of value to the young student, and gives requisite prominence to the historical relations of India and Europe, from the earliest period to the present year. The key maps are clearly printed, every page has its date-heading, and a marginal index runs through the book.

Mr. George H. Blagrove has written a technical handbook—Marble Decoration (Crosby Lockwood & Son)—which has its aspects of interest to artistic readers generally, besides being an excellent manual for students. It treats of ancient and modern applications of marble in decorative art, illustrated by diagrams, and comprises a useful terminology of British and foreign marbles. The practical exposition in the opening chapters is just what students require, being lucid and compact in statement.

A "Quekett Club-Man" issues a pleasant little essay for the young amateur astronomer, My Telescope (Roper & Drowley), which is altogether as brightly written and as prettily illustrated as its companion, My Microscope. No one in possession of his first telescope, even if it be not a four-inch refractor, such as figures in the frontispiece, could desire a better introduction to the heavens.

CHURCH of ENGLAND CENTRAL SOCIETY for PROVIDING HOMES for WAIFS and STRAYS.
OFFICES: 32 CHARING CROSS, S.W.

The object of this Society is to rescue from vicious surroundings the Orphans and Destitute Children met with in every parish, and especially in large towns.

The Committee make a point of not accepting any case which could more properly be dealt with by the Legislature, such as the Poor Law and School Boards. They are also most careful to avoid relieving unworthy parents of their responsibility, and therefore invariably give the preference to children who have neither parents nor relations able to provide for them.

Our great need is additional support to the General Fund, which supports the homes and the boarded-out children.

Prospectuses, and collecting cards and boxes, will be gladly supplied by the Hon. Secretary, Mr. E. DE M. RUDOLPH, 32 Charing Cross, S.W., who will thankfully receive contributions; or they may be paid to the account of the Society at Messrs. DIMSDALE & CO.'S, 50 Cornhill, E.C.

Forms of application for the admission of children can be had from the HON. SECRETARY.

"A LETTER was received from Mr. H. S. Parker, acknowledging the receipt of the samples of tea. He had lettered the samples, and sent them to Messrs. Hawes and Hertz, who had kindly tested them. The report of the testing was then opened, and it was found that the sample marked G, at 1s. 8d. per lb., was the 'best value at the price.' The Rev. S. B. Burnaby then asked for the name of the firm tendering sample G.—The Chairman: 'Messrs. Barber & Co., of Regent Circus.' The result was considered to be extremely satisfactory, as the sample supplied by Messrs. Barber was taken from the stock already supplied by them."—The Metropolitan, April 3.

2½ lbs. Samples sent free per Parcels Post for 4s. 3d., 4½ lbs. for 7s. 6d., 6 lbs. for 10s., 8½ lbs. for 14s., 10½ lbs. for 16s. 6d., to any post town in the United Kingdom and Channel Islands. Postal orders from 1s. 6d. to 10s. 6d. may be had at all Post-Offices for 1d.

The ISLAND: an Adventure of a Person of Quality. A Novel. By RICHARD WHITEING. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"The author's style has an elegance which gives the best effect to the vigour of his thought. Such good work is rare as modern satire goes. The book, though grimly humorous on occasion, has the strength which comes of earnestness and a touch of the indignation which drove the Roman poet to make verses. It is a powerful book, and should be widely read."—Scotsman.

3 vols. medium 8vo. with Illustrations, £5 5s.

A DICTIONARY of the BIBLE. Its Antiquities,

Biography, Geography, and Natural History. By VARIOUS WRITERS. Edited by WM. SMITH, D.C.L. and LL.D.

The object of this Work is to elucidate the Antiquities, Biography, Geography, and Natural History of the Bible, and to present, in a compact form, the researches of the most eminent divines and scholars.

"By such a work as this, a knowledge of the Bible is brought within easy reach of all commonly well-educated persons, and every man of intelligence may become his own commentator."—Times.

"Dr. Wm. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible could not fail to take a very high place in English literature; for no similar work in our own or in any other language is for a moment to be compared with it."—Quarterly Review.

2 vols. medium 8vo. with Illustrations, £3 13s. 6d.

A DICTIONARY of CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES.

The History, Institutions, and Antiquities of the Christian Church during the first Eight Centuries. By VARIOUS WRITERS. Edited by WM. SMITH, D.C.L. and LL.D., and SAMUEL CHEETHAM, D.D., Archdeacon of Rochester.

This work is intended to furnish a complete account of the Institutions, Art, Social Life, Writings, and Controversies of the Christian Church from the time of the Apostles to the age of Charlemagne. It commences at the period at which the "Dictionary of the Bible" leaves off, and forms a continuation of it; it ceases at the age of Charlemagne, and thus stops short of what are commonly called the Middle Ages.

"We welcome with genuine pleasure this long expected and long desired work. Our first few glances at the articles surprised us into the confession that the thoroughness and completeness of its execution have exceeded our highest expectations. It distances all its compeers in its own line, whether German, French, or English."—English Churchman.

A DICTIONARY of CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY,

LITERATURE, SECTS, and DOCTRINES, during the FIRST EIGHT CENTURIES. By VARIOUS WRITERS. Edited by WM. SMITH, D.C.L. and LL.D., and Prebendary WACE, D.D., Principal of King's College, London.

This work is designed to give a comprehensive account of the Personal, the Literary, the Dogmatic, and the Ecclesiastical Life of the Church during the first eight centuries of Christianity; and in combination with the "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," it will afford, it is believed, the most complete collection of materials for the Church History of that period which has yet been published, either in England or abroad.

The Editors, on the completion of the work, desire to record their grateful thanks to the contributors, and more especially to the Bishop of Chester and to Dr. Salmon, for the kindness with which they have continued to read through the proofs to the very last, and to assist the Editors with their learned counsel. A special acknowledgment is also due to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, notwithstanding his arduous responsibilities, has found time to complete, even to the smallest name, his treatment of the persons connected with St. Cyprian.

"It is a great credit to English scholarship and English theology to have produced a work like this full of the results of original and laborious study, which people on different sides of disputed questions, and differing in view possibly from the writers of the articles, may consult with so much confidence that they will find sound and valuable information. The editors may with justice put forward the claim that they have made accessible to all educated persons a great mass of information hitherto only the privilege of students with the command of a large library."—Times.

THE DEATH OF THE GERMAN EMPEROR.

THE death of the German EMPEROR has not produced a less profound effect because it had been foreseen to be close at hand. The great age and infirmities of the EMPEROR made it certain that his life could not be much prolonged, and when it was known that the CROWN PRINCE had been summoned from San Remo, it was manifest that the end could not be far off. Only extreme need could justify a step which might prove fatal to the heir of the dying Sovereign. It is unfortunate, to use no stronger word, that the vulgar enterprise, or even only the vulgar haste, of some Berlin newspapers should have caused a premature publication of a report of the EMPEROR'S death. At such a moment we could well have dispensed with a reminder of the existence of impudent speculators in false news. But this is the only jarring note in a pathetic and tragic situation. The Imperial family and the whole German nation have suffered their loss with dignity in the main, and are preparing for coming difficulties with firmness.

The political consequences of the EMPEROR'S death can as yet be only very partially estimated. It may be that they will prove less considerable than is sometimes supposed. The EMPEROR contributed his share to the work of completing the greatness of the House of HOHENZOLLERN by the unification of Germany, mainly by giving a steady support to the commanding statesman who survives him, and who in his turn may leave his policy to be continued by the statesmen he has trained. The next occupant of the German and Prussian thrones will not be compelled to choose his Minister on his own initiative, and to support him against popular opinion. But the character of the EMPEROR'S rule, whether as Regent and King of Prussia or as Sovereign of United Germany, is not doubtful. He was the most successful winner of territory even his wonderful family has produced—more successful even than FREDERICK the GREAT; for he has not been compelled to fight a war reducing his hereditary dominions to the verge of ruin in order to keep hold of his conquests. The Emperor WILLIAM was not, like his most able ancestor, his own Prime Minister and his own General, though he was always the actual and very capable chief of the army. But what he did not do himself he made it possible for others to do. He chose both the Minister and the General who have wrought the unity of Germany. He supported them when he had selected them, and, if he could not have framed their plans himself, he could understand them when framed, and give his royal authority to carry them out, in spite of popular clamour and opposition in his own household. The royal authority of the Emperor WILLIAM was no figure of speech. It is a formidable contradiction to much popular theorizing of the times that this ruler, who died in the fulness of glory and success, amid the unfeigned affection and regret of a great nation, many of them not his born subjects, was no popularity-seeking king. He believed, and asserted, that he held his crown by a Divine right higher than the consent of his people, and that he held it with the obligation imposed on him by GOD to rule them for their good, and not merely according to their wish. During years he governed in defiance of the desires of their recognized spokesmen. He won, and won by a vigorous use of the royal authority; and he lived to see that his subjects had learned to understand that he was in the right. Apart from his services to Germany, and in his later years to the cause of universal peace, he has set a great example to all rulers and statesmen who may have to contend with an unwise popular clamour. The future of the German Empire may not be quite secure; but, whatever may happen, the reign of the EMPEROR has brought this much about—that France and Germany can never again stand to one another as they stood during two centuries before. In his time, and very largely by his efforts, it has happened that a German host, led by native chiefs and carrying out a native policy, encountered France single-handed, crushed her armies with paralysing rapidity, tore away her fortresses and territory, reduced her capital to surrender, and raised its leader on the shield as the ruler of United Germany in the Palace of the Kings of France. That all which was done in, and in consequence of, that great war was wisely done is at least doubtful. Mistakes were made, and will have to be atoned for; but essentially the conquerors gained their object. French interference in, and supremacy over, Germany can never be again what they have been. The memory of the war will remain as a patriotic encouragement to Germans, a lesson of what courage and unity will do for them. To France it will always be a warning. Events on this scale cannot happen, even if they have no conspicuous material results in the shape of increase of territory, without profoundly modifying the relations of the combatants. The modification in this case, burdensome as some of its consequences may have been, was favourable to the security and flattering to the pride of Germany. The millions of Germans who waited for reports from the side of the EMPEROR'S death-bed knew that he had in no formal sense gained that security and dignity for them. They lament him, not only for his amiable qualities, but as the sovereign who made vigorous government possible and led them to victory.

SULTAN AND PRINCE.

THE fatal illness of the German EMPEROR has in the last days of the present week transferred the chief personal interest of foreign politics from Sofia to Berlin. But the last step in the Bulgarian difficulty has rather gained than lost in real importance by the increased probability of a change in German policy. All European languages enrich themselves from time to time with new expressions, and it is possible that the Turkish term for a Ministerial Minute, which may have struck a good many readers for the first time on Wednesday morning last, may have the fortune to rank among these. For Mazbata, though it may be only a general term in its own language, supplies, in this particular application of it, a diplomatic want—the want of a term for something between a warning and a statement of fact. The tenor and the form of the document in which the Porte has stirred itself to meet the wishes of Russia and denounce the audacious Prince FERDINAND are both sufficiently curious. It is a statement almost as startling and mysterious in its combination of vagueness and precision as those made by Mr. F.'s Aunt, or, to adopt a more dignified comparison, as the bodiless voices which DANTE heard about the Mount of Purgatory. The Porte remarks, with unimpeachable veracity, but hardly with much novelty, that the election of the PRINCE has not received the proper sanction. Therefore, it continues, with overpowering logic, his presence not being legal is illegal, and not being in accordance with treaties is contrary to them. The guileless reader might then expect some threat, advice, direction, or positive expression of some kind or other. Not at all. "The Sublime Porte hereby gives notice of this to the "President of the Council of Ministers." And so the Mazbata ends as it began in the grave and dignified assertion of verities, after the fashion of M. DE LA PALISSE.

The ludicrous side of this matter naturally strikes first, but it must be a shallow observer who is not struck by any-

[illegible]a is undoubtedly the chief capital on the C[illegible]what is called seeing ghosts by daylight; but [illegible]truth as well as discomfort in the observation of a Vienna correspondent that it is quite in the Russian manner to gain advantages which seem merely advantages of form, but which afterwards turn out to have a solid kernel. The step, moreover, however suddenly it has been taken and however much it may wear the appearance of a mere repetition of the declaration of last August, has not been made till after an active interchange of opinions with all the Powers and, it is believed, after some considerable diplomatic conversation between the Powers themselves. It is true that its practical effect, unless it is followed up by something different, is almost nothing. It has been interpreted in some quarters as practically authorizing on the part of the Suzerain rebellion against Prince FERDINAND'S Government; but it is difficult to understand how any one conversant with international and general law can thus construe it. If the Government of Bulgaria were autocratic, and its acts were the direct acts of the PRINCE and the PRINCE only, there might be some colour for the suggestion. But Prince FERDINAND is a strictly constitutional ruler, acting through his Ministers, who are responsible for every act of his Government, and these Ministers, it will be observed, are expressly recognized in this very utterance of the Porte which is officially addressed to their President. The SULTAN, thus, even if he may be supposed to address between the lines to the individual Bulgarian a permission to rebel against the PRINCE, adds not merely between, but in the lines, a permission to the President of the Council of Ministers to shoot that Bulgarian. This is not a very tempting prospect to insurgents. Further, in the absence of any head or tail to this remarkable document, the body is absolutely harmless. The SULTAN pronounces Prince FERDINAND'S presence irregular, but he does not tell the President of the Council of Ministers to send him away. He even admits (which will scarcely please Russia) that the PRINCE, though not confirmed, is "elected," that he is what some persons would call a Prince-designate, though he stands where he ought not. Now the thoroughgoing Russian contention is that the absence of confirmation is only the last of the fatal flaws in the commission, and that the election was as invalid as the resolve to take the reins without waiting for confirmation. Except, therefore, any gratification which may be derived from the solemn reaffirming of what nobody denies, it is hard to see what benefit Russia reaps from the complaisance of His Imperial Majesty in ratifying by an Iradé what his Ministers had concluded in a Mazbata.

The truth is that the prospects and decision of the whole Bulgarian imbroglio depend in the main on certain things which are in all probability known to no one but Prince BISMARCK. Indeed, though the PRINCE, unlike Captain EDWARD WAVERLEY, is famous for knowing his own mind, it would not be very wonderful if they were not fully and certainly known even to him. There are two explanations, each obvious and probable in itself, of his recent conduct and language towards Russia, of which conduct and language the still more recent behaviour both of Russia and of the Porte are simple consequences. The one is that he is really, owing either to his own wishes or somebody else's, anxious to help the CZAR. The other is that he is much more anxious to engage the CZAR in various entanglements which, without rendering ac[illegible]l war more likely, may hamper and distract Russia. It would be very far from wonderful if both of these motives worked together. But it is really important to know which is the uppermost. If the PRINCE simply wants to further the designs of Russia, it is very bad for Prince FERDINAND, bad for Bulgaria, and by no means well for the chances of European peace. If he merely wishes to help the CZAR into trouble, it is not very bad for Prince FERDINAND, not bad at all for Bulgaria, and very good for European peace, at any rate for the present. And, if Prince BISMARCK is still, what a good judge long before 1870 pronounced him to be, "the only statesman in Europe," the latter, and not the former, must certainly be his principal object, if not his only purpose. For to play directly for the restoration of Russian influence in the Balkan peninsula would be to undo the whole of the work of the last twelve years.

It appears to be anticipated in some quarters that Prince FERDINAND will either at once, or speedily, fly before the mysterious voice which has been uttered against him by the Porte. It has been sufficiently shown here that there is no reason why he should do this, so far as that voice itself is concerned. If the Bulgarian people are tired of him, they can, inasmuch as their election has not been confirmed, revoke it, and elect somebody else, and Prince FERDINAND neither could nor would resist their will, of which he is the creature. He does not appear to be in all respects the man for Bulgaria; and, apart from the sympathy which must always exist for a man who not only occupies a very difficult position fairly well, but occupies it in spite of the flagrantly unjust force and fraud of a superior Power, he does not appear to have created any particular liking for himself either at home or abroad. It has been again and again pointed out that his personal claims have very little to do with the matter. Only the mysterious attraction of crowns can account for any one caring to be Prince of Bulgaria, and the individuality of the person who does so care is a matter of the smallest possible importance to Europe. What is of importance is that the free election of the Bulgarians should be respected, that the province should be decently governed, that the illegitimate preponderance of a single foreign Power should be guarded against, and that the formalities of the Treaty of Berlin should be observed. Prince FERDINAND fulfils three of these conditions; he does not, though by no fault of his own, fulfil the fourth. If he can be got to fulfil it—which seems impossible—so much the better; but if not Europe has to see that in the getting this formal requirement fulfilled the other and far more important ones are not broken. Russia purposes to break at least two of them, and Prince BISMARCK ostentatiously cries "Hear, hear!" It is the business of the rest of Europe to see that they are not broken.

GENERAL GORDON'S LETTERS TO HIS SISTER.

IN the preface to her selection from her brother's letters to herself Miss GORDON expresses some doubt whether too many books have not already been written about him. She excuses her own by saying that "little is really under-"stood about his religious life, which these letters are "especially chosen to make intelligible to all." Miss GORDON has unquestionably no desire to underrate the generally respectable and always well-intentioned writing done before now on her brother's character and his deeds. Still, in one way her doubt is only too well justifiable. Without offence to any man, it may be said that no biography of GORDON has yet appeared worthy of him—no work ranking with BOSWELL'S, or LOCKHART'S, or SOUTHEY'S—such as we could wish to have for his sake and for the sake of literature. We shall not ask for something akin to JOHNSON'S Savage or CARLYLE'S Sterling, for that would imply a relation between biographer and hero which could not have existed in this case. Best of all possible biographers of GORDON would be another "Loyal Ser-"viteur." The commander of the ever-victorious army and the defender of Khartoum was a more considerable man than BAYARD—or at least he played a greater part. His mark is made on the history of two continents; and, as one who has the best of all rights to speak in England's name has said, in words printed in this book, his death has left a "stain" upon England. But, though surer of memory than the French gentleman, who will be immortal because he inspired in a follower gifted with the power of literary expression a pathetic personal devotion, GORDON had this among other things in common with him. It was mainly by the beauty of his personal character that he influenced the world, and that can never be fully realized by those who did not know him, unless they are helped by the intuition of a great poet or the evidence of a properly endowed friend and follower. Out of what has been written, however, some picture of GORDON may be formed by the reader who brings even moderate faculty to his reading, and happily the hero has spoken much himself. This volume will always be one of the most valuable parts of the evidence for his life; for it is not a book about GORDON, but a book by him. It does not give, nor, we imagine, would Miss GORDON claim that it gives, all the man; but it does show what lay nearest his heart, and was always consciously and unconsciously the great motive power of his life—his intense religious feeling. The selection from his letters has been made with manifest judgment and with all due consideration for individuals. There are traces that tact was needed at times; for GORDON belonged to the race of religious men especially admired by CARLYLE—the prophets who have a laugh in them, and laughter is especially painful to a certain stamp of persons of whom he met his full share.

It would have been easy in making a selection from his letters to have produced a book which should tend to edification, in the true sense of the word, no doubt, but to that alone. Such a collection might have taken its place by the side of the Imitatio. In March 1884, when the enemy were closing in round him, he wrote to thank his sister for sending a copy of THOMAS À KEMPIS, and here is a sentence, written long before, which might almost stand on its pages. "You must be more or less in the desert, to use the scales "of the Sanctuary, to see and weigh the true value of things "and sayings." À KEMPIS would have said wholly in the desert, but GORDON was a man of religion, much more after the heart of OLIVER CROMWELL than according to the rules of the author of the Imitatio. He was also speaking from his heart when he wrote, "I fear settling on my lees, I fear "waxing fat, I fear my GOD, and this fear at times makes "me deeply sad." Just above he had expressed his ardent wish to be employed in some way or another, and thus be more free from temptation. Though like some other soldiers, and famous ones, too, like Sir CHARLES NAPIER and General LEE, he had a theoretical horror of war, nature had made him a fighter. Considerations of an obvious nature make it far from easy to speak of so sacred a thing as the religious life of any man in the market-place. Much in this volume is rather to be read and thought of than talked about, except in fit place and season. Miss GORDON has enabled all who are capable of doing it to understand her brother's religious life, though we should think that none will realize it now who have not done so already. Probably the most competent will be the last to assert that they have understood fully the innermost heart of another and an extraordinary man. At other times there would have been no hesitation in ticketing him with an epithet. The eighteenth century would have called him an enthusiast, and the later seventeenth a fanatic. Nor would GORDON have refused to accept the name. He took himself not with any air of assertion, but quite as a matter of course, when he wished to define his position as compared with that of the ordinary men of the world. But, fanatic though he might be, GORDON was no bigot. There was no trace in him of the bonne ligne droite de férocité sotte. He did not love nor belong to "the class who are bigots, whether it be on the "churchyard or temperance, or any such question, who do "not consider the other side," as he describes them himself. From that corruption of the religious life he was preserved by his wonderful gift of humour, which made him watch and report with sympathy every phase of life that came in his way, from the bite of the mosquito down to the doings of Egyptian pashas. Not for religion's sake even would he abstain from seeing and laughing at the ridiculous side of things. He quoted his very Bible in irony. When two good little boys were let loose on him "to say their prayers," and "read out "in a loud voice the Fifty-ninth Psalm, both pronouncing "each syllable at the same time," he adds, "Look at "verses 6, 7, and 9." They were certainly painfully appropriate. "And at evening let them return, and let them "make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city." His humour could be grim enough, as when he purposely kept his garrisons in the Soudan small because nothing but terror would keep his rascally Egyptian soldiers from going to sleep at their posts. What reader not a fit object for the ridicule himself but will sympathize with this wish. "I would have given 500*l*. to have had the "Anti-Slavery Society in Dara during the three days of "doubt whether the slave-dealers would fight or not;—on "the one side, a bad fort, a cowed garrison, and not one "who did not tremble; on the other, a strong, determined "set of men, accustomed to war, good shots, with two "field-pieces. Then I would have liked to hear what the "Anti-Slavery Society would say." So should we.

Miss GORDON'S volume of letters shows what, indeed, was known already, that, if her brother was the man of religion, he was also the man of honour—a combination which has been at times considered as hardly possible by the latter, and occasionally proved to be difficult by the former, of these types. It is not the smallest proof of the Khedive ISMAIL'S cleverness that when he wished to drag GORDON back to uncongenial and nearly hopeless work, he appealed to the plighted word of an English gentleman. Substantially, the same appeal was made by the General's countrymen at a later day. What HER MAJESTY—to the natural wrath of some persons, but with the entire approval of every one of her subjects competent to have an opinion—calls "the stain "left upon England for your dear Brother's cruel, though "heroic, fate" is dark, because when his native Government called on him as the KHEDIVE had done, it used him for base purposes, and failed him at his need, as the KHEDIVE did not do. Admiration for GORDON'S personal character, for his courage, his faculty, and his devotion, is perfectly compatible with a doubt whether he was fitted by nature to serve a Government which, as he rather naïvely put it in his youth, may be guessed to live on expedients. His own belief that all great things are done by individual adventurers, as he once put it, his habit of judging all things by the standard of the fanatic (we use the word in his own sense), made him unapt to be the servant of a very mundane and hand-to-mouth administration. But then he should not have been used, thrust into danger, left without support, denied the freedom of action which was his only chance of salvation in the absence of material resources, and so betrayed to his death in order that a Ministry might tide over an evil day. The stain of that will not be wiped off, not for all the impudent anger of those who helped to put it there, when they are reminded of their handiwork.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

IN the race for the prize of destroying the institutions of the country, Mr. LABOUCHERE has, by a not inappropriate stroke of fortune, obtained a preliminary success. He will have the opportunity of convincing those who are already pledged to the same doctrine that the existence of the House of Lords is both intrinsically anomalous and injurious to the welfare of the country. He also thinks fit to enunciate the abstract proposition that legislators ought not to be selected by the accident of hereditary succession. He will probably find many supporters on the issue of the expediency of inherited privileges and functions. The assailants of the House of Lords contend that the descent of the peerage from father to son is an exception to the ordinary practice of society, yet many commercial and professional occupations are transmitted according to the same rule. Tailors and shoemakers, solicitors, officers in the army and navy, often continue the same trades and professions for several generations. There are notoriously banks and breweries in London which have belonged to the same families for one or two centuries. It is true that the hereditary character of the House of Lords was never deliberately designed; but the results of historical causes are always natural and frequently convenient. It would be useless to argue the question with Mr. LABOUCHERE; but the constitution of the House of Lords has sometimes of late been unfavourably criticized by more unprejudiced opponents. Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH declared himself in a late speech at Bristol in favour of some undefined change; and less prominent members of the Conservative party prefer to surrender some of the defences of the House of Lords in the hope of saving the rest. Amongst others, Mr. CURZON, a rising member of the House of Commons and heir to a peerage, has published in the National Review the first part of an ingenious essay on the reform, as it is called, of the House of Lords. It is not his fault that he discerns the inconvenience of the present system more clearly than the mode of providing a remedy. Probably in the next instalment of his essay he will attempt to supply the deficiency. Like many of his predecessors, he believes that a liberal introduction of life peers would add to the efficiency and authority of the Upper House. He is perhaps not aware that the right of the Crown to create life peers was recognized in the case of Lord WENSLEYDALE, although the Law Lords, with the solitary exception of Lord CRANWORTH, unanimously denied the right of such a dignitary to sit or vote. No judicial decision has been more clearly accordant with constitutional doctrine; but the judgment of course rested on precedent and legal analogy, and it had nothing to do with the expediency of creating life peers. Some peers have probably feared that the hereditary character of their order would be endangered by the admission of life members, nor is the apprehension wholly unfounded; but the main reason of the discontinuance during a quarter of a century of agitation on the subject is that the measure is not practically required. A more modest estimate of the external requirements of a member of the House of Lords has enabled many political and official veterans of moderate fortune to accept hereditary peerages. Some eminent public servants who would have readily accepted such an honour have been excluded from the House of Lords, not for want of means, but because they belonged to the wrong party. The addition of all those who could prefer a legitimate claim to promotion would not change the temper or materially alter the character of the House. A suggestion which has been made that Chairmen of the new County Boards should become eligible for peerages, or should be admitted as ex officio members, is, to say the least, wholly premature. It is not at all certain that the functionaries who are to be created by the Local Government Bill will, either in capacity or in social station, exceed or attain the level of the disestablished Chairmen of Quarter Sessions. With or without them, life peerages will not materially increase the popular estimation of the House.

It would be difficult in the present state of opinion in England to constitute a Senate or Second Chamber which would be divided by the same party lines with the House of Commons. The creation of a hundred life peers, the election of the whole body by almost any constituency which could be drawn from the present House of Lords, or even from the nation at large, would not remove the antagonism between a comparatively select body and the nominees of household or of universal suffrage. Mr. Gladstone's peers are in the first or second generation almost all Conservatives. An Assembly elected under the franchise which was established for the House of Commons by the first Reform Bill would probably now be denounced by extreme Liberals as exclusive. The difficulty of providing a substitute for the House of Lords is curiously illustrated by the fantastic proposals which have been attributed to Lord Dunraven. Under his supposed scheme the House was by some undefined process to be largely reduced in number, or rather, a smaller body of an entirely different character was to be substituted in its place. The members were to be nominated in equal proportions by four patrons or constituencies, themselves whimsically selected. The existing peers, the new County Boards, the Crown, and the Prince of Wales were each to appoint one-fourth of the whole number, apparently without the provision of any special qualification. It would appear that the House of Lords was to be kept alive for the sole purpose of discharging its elective duties. The Prince of Wales was for the first time in English history invested with political power, though no provision was made for his possible non-existence. There was no Prince of Wales in the two reigns before the present, and a similar vacancy would occur if a future Sovereign had no male issue. On the other hand, if the proposed Constitution had been then in force, George III. and his eldest son would each have been represented by one-fourth of the House of Lords, while another fourth would have been appointed by an irresponsible aristocracy, and the remainder under a process of indirect or secondary election. Criticism would be wasted on such a scheme, if it had proceeded from any acknowledged author. Lord Dunraven, who naturally disavowed a measure which, as he said, would have qualified him for a lunatic asylum, is not wholly exempt from responsibility for the follies of the actual projector. After withdrawing a previous proposal for the reorganization of the House of Lords, he had announced the intention of substituting some alternative plan which he had apparently not found time to complete. The volunteer who has undertaken to interpret his intentions has provided him with a reductio ad absurdum. Lord Dunraven was either unable or unwilling to explain whether the apocryphal version of his plan included any fragment of the authentic design. He may be acquitted of complicity in the proposed transfer to the Prince of Wales of a prerogative of the Crown, but he probably wishes to reduce the number of peers by some arbitrary method of elimination. The difficulties with which the anonymous projector has come into collision stand in the way of all his competitors.

The enemies of the House of Lords feel or affect deep indignation at the number of peers, at other times unfamiliar with the precincts of the House, who are collected on great occasions to vote in support of the leaders of their party. It may be admitted that the share of the Scotch and Irish peers in such proceedings is a scandal which ought to be abated. The Duke of Wellington, Lord Derby, and Lord Salisbury have in succession nominated the representative peers of Scotland and Ireland, and they have consequently been able to count on their votes. The majority of peers of the United Kingdom may be almost as implicitly trusted by their leader for the time being. The interests of the Conservative party were better consulted in days when Liberal Ministers and leaders of Opposition were not uniformly defeated in the House of Lords. A perpendicular cleavage of opinion is safer and sounder than the horizontal stratification which more and more prevails. The walking voters, as silent members of the Roman Senate were called, produce an irritating effect on their defeated adversaries by the display of their numerical strength; but no process of selection or purification which could be devised would now reverse the actual balance of parties. The statesmen of the House of Lords, if they were left alone by their humbler colleagues, would arrive at the conclusions which the Conservative leaders impose on their adherents. If Lord Dunraven can suggest any plan for disfranchising the less active section of the peerage, the advantages of such a scheme will not be proportionate to the gravity of the constitutional principles which will be involved.

The silent members of the House of Lords, whatever may be thought of their political aptitude, still retain considerable importance. Almost every peer is a principal person in his own neighbourhood for purposes both of society and of business. The direct and indirect power which he exercises, whether or not it is allowed to be advantageous, is indisputably real. The rank may, according to the democratic poet, be but the guinea stamp, but it ensures the currency of the coin. Wise legislators concern themselves, not with the moral merits of institutions, but with the forces which they find in operation. The collective influence of the members of the House of Lords is greater than their corporate authority. The deference which is paid to rank, though it may be denounced as servility, is, as long as it exists, one of the facts which must be taken into consideration by statesmen. As a Second Chamber the House of Lords is more efficient than any other body of the same kind, with the exception of the Senate of the United States. Those who wish, like Mr. Labouchere, for its destruction have an intelligible object before them. It would be interesting to learn whether professed reformers of the House of Lords wish to increase or to diminish its influence on legislation and policy. The House of Commons is not disposed to abdicate its supreme control over public affairs; yet any measure which would add to the powers of the House of Lords must tend to divide the authority which now belongs to the more popular Assembly.

MRS. PROCTER.

MRS. PROCTER'S death last Monday must in one sense have been a relief to her friends. For many weeks her condition had been hopeless, and she paid in her lingering end what Charles Lamb somewhere call the penalty of a good constitution. In some other respects the circumstances of her old age were extremely fortunate. She had, indeed, survived not only her husband, who lived to be an octogenarian, but almost all her children and every one of her early friends. She did not, however, fulfil the words of that "awful curse" which so deeply impressed Macaulay in the Latin inscription—Ultimus suorum moriatur. Her last years were cheered by the constant presence of a granddaughter, who succeeded to the place of her daughter, the late Miss Edith Procter. Of company she had as much as she could have wanted, and until her health suddenly gave way she wanted all she could get. Lady Kew herself, whom Mrs. Procter did not otherwise resemble, was not a more indefatigable diner-out and attendant at evening parties. It is probable that Mrs. Procter would have agreed with the sentiment of the famous sermon in which Sterne boldly denied the truth of his text, and asserted by implication that to go to the house of feasting was better than to go to the house of mourning. It is certain that she had a profound contempt for the apophthegm of Sir George Lewis, that life would be tolerable but for its pleasures. Johnson's criticism upon Garrick's line was entirely in her vein. "May I smile with the simple and "feed with the poor," wrote the great actor. "Let me," said the great man of the world, "smile with the wise, and "feed with the rich." Not that Mrs. Procter cared for inordinate luxury, still less for vulgar display. It was intellectual society which she enjoyed, and to which she contributed at least as much as she derived from it. Perhaps her social success was in some degree due to the fact that she had no special accomplishments and no particular hobbies. She was not an author, or a musician, or an artist, or a woman of science; but, if the Scotticism may be pardoned, just a talker. Her keen native shrewdness and homely Yorkshire sense had of course been cultivated and overlaid by more than half a century's acquaintance with the best intellects of the time. But the original qualities were always there, and her contempt for humbug or affectation was proof against many thousands of London dinners. The plain virtues of honesty and benevolence, especially if combined with a certain superficial hardness, were the qualities which she most appreciated, and which suited her best.

Mrs. PROCTER, as is well known, was the daughter of the third Mrs. BASIL MONTAGU by her first husband, Mr. SKEPPER, and the wife of Mr. BRYAN WALLER PROCTER, better known as BARRY CORNWALL. Her precise age, which had been a subject of some speculation, was disclosed, along with her second name of BENSON, which she never used, in the first column of Wednesday's Times. She died at eighty-seven. At eighty-six she was not, except chronologically, an old woman. Her step was active, her eyesight was apparently undimmed, her memory was perfect, and her hair retained its original colour. She remembered the Jubilee of 1809 when she witnessed the Jubilee of 1887. "I live," said Lord BEACONSFIELD with dignified pathos, in his retirement at Hughenden, "I live in the recollections of the past." Mrs. PROCTER enjoyed the present too keenly to be thrown back upon anything else. But her stock of reminiscences was boundless, and to hear her draw upon them was like reading the autobiography of the nineteenth century. It seems, indeed, as if a whole host of literary celebrities, from KEATS to Lord HOUGHTON, had died again with her. While she was alive they could always be called up with a vivid distinctness worthy of that wonderful poem, "How it Strikes "a Contemporary." The graphic simplicity with which Mrs. PROCTER told her stories was beyond all praise. "I "can always find a word," said Fox; "PITT can always "find the word." It is not too much to say of Mrs. PROCTER that she could always find the word. Her crisp, sharp sentences were a rebuke to the mumbled sins against sense and grammar which too often pass muster for English conversation. She was wont to say that her daughter ADELAIDE, chiefly known to the public as a writer of sentimental verse, was the brightest and most humorous companion she had ever known. Her own sense of humour was exquisite, and she could impart to it that subdued tone of melancholy without which the deepest humour loses half its charm. Not that that was by any means her ordinary style. She loved to tell, with infinite drollery, how she once implored a very eminent friend not to keep her a moment in suspense, but to tell her immediately what the doctor had said of his case. "He says," replied the great man, with profound gravity, "that I have "two fatal diseases." "What are they?" she gasped, in despair. "Gluttony and drunkenness," was the answer, delivered with the same imperturbable solemnity as before. Perhaps a personal reminiscence of Mrs. PROCTER's ordinary manner of speech may be pardoned on this occasion. A very humble Londoner and his wife were introduced by her to a distinguished novelist who has the happiness of living in the country. After duly presenting him to the lady, Mrs. PROCTER turned round, and, with a wave of her hand and the characteristic twinkle of her eye, remarked, "In London "we do not think much of husbands, but this is Mr. "BROWN." Mrs. PROCTER might have repeated with absolute sincerity the touching lines of LANDOR. She warmed both hands before the fire of life, and when it sank she was ready to depart.

THE MANUFACTURE OF NEWS.

THE short conversation in the House of Lords last Tuesday between Lord FITZGERALD and Lord DUNRAVEN was not only amusing in itself, but also highly instructive in its lessons. The general public may not perhaps be aware that there is an active competition among rival agencies in the manufacture of what is facetiously called intelligence. By manufacture we must not be understood to mean fabrication; for, no doubt, the conductors of this form of enterprise are perfectly honest, and sometimes supply the daily papers with important facts accurately stated. It is, however, the case with this as with other forms of industry—that demand creates supply. If ascertained truth falls short, unfounded gossip must take its place. While Parliament is sitting something must every day be "rumoured in "Ministerial circles," or "alleged in well-informed quarters," or—most mysterious of all—"believed by the heads of de-"partments," not, as a rule, the most credulous of men. Occasionally the maker of paragraphs has to confess that, after all, he is not omniscient. A meeting of the Judges was held the other day, and the country was duly apprised of the occurrence, with the pathetic addition, "As the pro-"ceedings were private, little is known of what transpired." This is a pearl of great price; and long, long may it be before our friend the descriptive reporter discovers that a thing cannot transpire without becoming known. On Friday in last week there was sent out from a Press agency a paragraph headed "Lord DUNRAVEN'S House of Lords "Reform Bill," which was received into the hospitable columns of at least one morning journal. The announcements contained in it, if we may accept the authority of Lord FITZGERALD, "attracted a great deal of attention." They even "startled, perhaps he should rather say "astounded," that eminent lawyer himself, who seems to retain remarkably fresh emotions after more than a quarter of a century's experience on the Irish Bench. So Lord FITZGERALD gravely asked whether Lord DUNRAVEN really intended to do all the wonderful things attributed to him; and Lord DUNRAVEN, with a pleased alacrity which in cynical minds may excite unworthy suspicions, replied, at some length, that he did not. There is a class of public men whose names figure in the newspapers with extraordinary frequency in proportion to their actual achievements. We do not profess to understand the phenomenon, which no one could explain better than Lord DUNRAVEN, unless it be Baron HENRY DE WORMS. "There is no truth "in the report that CRUMMLES is a Prussian. He was born "at Bath," &c., &c. "We are authorized to deny the "rumour that the Under Secretary of State for the "Colonies will be at once raised to the peerage, and pro-"vided with a seat in the Cabinet. The rumour in ques-"tion is entirely premature," and so forth. DICKENS was a great man. If he did not care much for party politics, he thoroughly understood the mind of a politician.

But we must return to "Lord DUNRAVEN's Bill," which may possibly have been drafted by a wicked wag. That the measure would propose to "limit the number of Peers," thereby curtailing the Royal Prerogative without the tedious preliminary of a message from the QUEEN, is a trifle hardly worth mentioning except by a constitutional pedant. The new House of Lords would be chosen partly by the old House, partly by the Crown, partly by the PRINCE OF WALES, and partly by the "new County Boards." It is impossible to refrain from a passing desire to see this delightful body in full session, and to observe the delicate shades of demeanour by which the County Board peers would be distinguished from the selections of HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS. But let us proceed. "The Law Lords to sit by virtue of their "office," which we were under the impression they did already, at least if by "Law Lords" are meant Lords of Appeal in Ordinary. The Bishops are not mentioned, but would doubtless be at once nominated by somebody. "The "measure will also provide that members of the Upper "House guilty of misconduct shall be dealt with by a "properly constituted tribunal, that the sons of life peers "shall not enjoy courtesy titles, that Cabinet Ministers "may speak in either House, and that peers not elected "to the Upper Chamber may be eligible for election to the "House of Commons." "Eligible for election" is a beautiful phrase, meaning, as it must, so much more than merely "eligible," and illustrating as it does the chaste style of the newsmongers. But what we like best in this collection of bold felicities is the provision that "Members of the Upper "House guilty of misconduct shall be dealt with by a pro-"perly constituted tribunal." The pseudo-DUNRAVEN, as we may be permitted, after an ancient analogy, to call this amateur legislator, is not easily satisfied. If a peer cheats at cards, he can be expelled from his club. If he commits a misdemeanour, he can be summarily convicted by a magistrate, or tried before a judge and jury, as the case may be. If he goes a step further, and perpetrates a felony, his own order may inflict upon him the same punishment awarded by another Court in similar circumstances to a commoner. The poor life peers must excite universal commiseration. Why should they be invidiously pointed at in this way? There are only four of them. They have no courtesy titles to bestow upon their sons, who are not even entitled to the prefix of "Honourable." "Courtesy titles" are not legal at all, but depend entirely upon the grace and favour of the Crown. Fancy legislating to deprive four men of a privilege which is not recognized by law, and which they do not enjoy even by custom! If the gentlemen who favour us with items of verbiage miscalled news were compelled to pass a simple and easy examination in the rudiments of political knowledge, much waste of printer's ink might be avoided.

THE DEFENCE OF THE COUNTRY.

A TRIFLING outlay of money, and a little industry in the use of the scissors on the newspapers of the last ten days, will supply any man inclined to the study with a considerable mass of material for criticism of our naval and military position. Whether it will prove instructive or only confusing may be a question, but there is no doubt as to its bulk and variety. There is the Memorandum of the War Office showing the wisdom of the department, and the thoroughness of its scheme of work. As a commentary and perhaps corrective of this document there are the proceedings in Committee of Supply on Monday and Thursday. Then we have the Report of the Committee on the fortification of ports and coaling-stations as edited for family reading. Then there is Mr. MARRIOTT'S Report on the supply of ordnance stores. With this the student should read the news from Devonport, given under the heading "A Dock-"yard Scandal" in the daily press. It will lead him on from the army to the navy, which he will find commented on at large in Lord GEORGE HAMILTON'S Memorandum. Having got so far he will discover that, like the wanderer in the pathless expanse of Afric's sandy desert, he has wandered back to whence he did begin. This Memorandum, like its sister of the army, shows what an improvement there has been of late, and how we now possess an Admiralty which does more work, and does it quicker, better, and cheaper, than any firm hitherto engaged in the trade. The navy, it says, is not only big but growing, and if it is not also a-blowing, the Admiralty can blow for it. In due course will come further proceedings in Committee of Supply, and they will serve to illustrate the Memorandum. A man has only to fall to.

It would be interesting and even useful to set it all by way of examination paper to a body of candidates for Parliament or the Bar, and require them to say whether it shows that the defence of the country is adequately provided for, and then give their reasons for their opinion. The answers of the Parliamentary candidates would probably be largely dictated by considerations of time and place; but the others, who would of course be youths of sagacity and judicial mind, as becomes future members of the wisest, most virtuous, and most modest of professions, would have a reply ready. They would answer after due reading of the paper that a little more precision in the use of terms was desirable before any opinion could be formed; that it would be well to define "an adequate defence" before deciding whether this or that is adequate, and, finally, that the greater part of what the soldiers, sailors, and politicians said was not evidence. The Memorandums seem clear enough, no doubt; but then they are, after all, partisan statements, and need the support of proof themselves. The proceedings in Committee are bewildering. When they are compared with the official statements, it is difficult to believe that the parties are talking about the same things. Happily it is not necessary to go into all the details copiously quoted on both sides; for the naval and military gentlemen are at least trying to secure something which will be evidence, and that is the one really useful part of the whole discussion. In spite of a great many wanderings to right and left, and much quotation of facts which are not particularly to the point, they have in the main combined to work together for one definite object. Captain COLOMB, Sir W. BARTTELOT, Sir H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN, and Sir E. HAMLEY have all in one way or another insisted that Government should make an effort to decide for once and for all what navy, army, and stores we do need. Mr. HANBURY has a motion to the same effect standing over. More or less explicitly they all ask for the appointment of the Commission of Inquiry recommended by Sir JAMES STEPHEN and his colleagues. The unanimity of experts and the support it is receiving are naturally annoying to Ministers—which is perfectly natural. To be sure, the spectacle of Mr. BRODRICK and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE calling piteously on the economists for help is ridiculous enough. Oh for an hour of Mr. ILLINGWORTH! is not the cry we should select ourselves for the Conservative Admiralty and War Office speakers; but they are Ministerials, and the wine they drink is made of grapes—of Lord NORTHBROOK'S grapes. They will change their tone when it is clear that the experts are supported by public opinion. At present the great object is to secure that support. It is also, perhaps, natural, and is certainly silly, in some portions of the press to cry out against the general demand for more money on the part of sailors and soldiers. If the money is needed, it ought to be provided. If it is not needed, then the needlessness of the demand is susceptible of proof. But neither this nor anything else can be proved without examination of the evidence. The mere facts that professional men are well-nigh unanimous in the belief that our defences are dangerously weak, and that large support is given to them from outside, supply reason enough for calling for an inquiry. The Memorandums of the War Office and Admiralty can be cited on the same side. Mr. STANHOPE makes a merit—and rightly—of his scheme of defence. Lord GEORGE HAMILTON is pardonably proud of what he can claim to have done to improve the administration of the Admiralty and to strengthen the navy. But, even if they are allowed all the credit they claim, they have still confessed that the departments of which they are the heads have hitherto failed to discharge their duty. It does not lie in the mouths of detected and confessed bunglers (a little strength of language may be pardoned when it is necessary to penetrate exceptionally tough obstacles) to demand entire confidence. We have a right to insist that they should at least give evidence that the trust is deserved, which they can only do by showing that they do at last realize what the defence of the country means. No doubt this can be done without the appointment of another Royal Commission. A clear statement on the part of the Ministry, so worded and so supported by evidence as to carry conviction, would do as well, or even far better, because the object would be gained more quickly and at less cost. In the absence of this, however, let us have the other means. We want the miracle, and are completely indifferent how it comes.

The answer of the Ministry has been given as yet in the complaints of Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and Mr. BRODRICK, and the stolid official platitudes of Mr. SMITH. That money may be called for by a Commission, that its appointment would divide responsibility and display our weakness to the world, are the commonplaces which supply the stuff of what they call their arguments. The first, which will always secure a certain degree of support from the small change of Mr. COBDEN and the pushing free-lance, is nonsense, unless it is to be taken for granted that risk of disaster, and perhaps ruin, is a less evil than the spending of money in necessary defensive works. Division of responsibility is bad, but it is not worse than dependence on the wisdom of administrators who do not inspire confidence. Besides, there is no need to divide responsibility. The Commission would devise a scheme which the Admiralty and War Office would have the entire responsibility of applying or rejecting for cause shown. As for the "display "of our weakness" argument, the use of it by a Minister or even private member should entail an instant birching, to be administered by the Speaker at the bar of the House. The enemy knows our weakness very well, and on the day on which we know it we shall have some chance of beginning to become strong. Moreover, if we are weak, whose fault is it? and is the policy of the ostrich the wisest to follow under the circumstances? These are questions which the Admiralty and War Office may profitably perpend. A Parliamentary Committee to inquire into the organization of the naval and military forces is not what is wanted. The need at present is the formation of some definite estimate of the amount of material resources, and the number of ships and men required to defend the country. We shall not be an inch nearer knowing that after the Committee has inquired, as fifty others have done, into organization. What the organization is to do, and what it is to do it with, are the essential things to be learnt. They, however, are to be pushed aside, and, subject to some further shuffling of the cards, the fighting power of the country will continue to be governed with one thought for efficiency and two for the temporary interests of the Ministry. It is an appropriate enough ending for the confused talk on the Estimates. After the encounter of tough Parliamentary Greeks, after Mr. STANHOPE'S japes at Lord RANDOLPH, and Lord RANDOLPH'S attempt to fascinate the military men by insisting on an increase of the army, and also win the love of the so-called economists by calling for a reduction of the Estimates, this was the lame and impotent conclusion which was to be expected. We shall get no better till Ministers are made to understand that it is not their interest to neglect the defence of the country.

LORD HARTINGTON AT IPSWICH.

LORD HARTINGTON'S address to the Liberal Unionists of Ipswich is, if we mistake not, his first political utterance since the commencement of the Session. He took no part in the debate on the Address, and though, as we now learn, the discussion of Sir CHARLES RUSSELL'S motion and Mr. BRADLAUGH'S amendment found in him a formidably critical listener, it did not move him to break silence. There was, of course, no reason why it should. The course of the last-mentioned debate and the analysis of the succeeding division sufficed to show clearly enough what were the general views of Lord HARTINGTON'S party on this subject. A few of its weaker members seized one of those opportunities of compromise dear to the weak, and, after voting against Mr. BRADLAUGH'S amendment, followed Sir CHARLES RUSSELL into the lobby. But every considerable group of politicians is certain to contain its proportion of men who, hesitating to join in an open attack on the constituted guardians of order, will yet lend themselves to attempts to undermine its fundamental principle. The ability and the common sense of the party expressed themselves with sufficient plainness through the mouths of Sir HENRY JAMES and Mr. COLLINGS, and no declaration from its leader was required. Lord HARTINGTON, however, has attentively studied the attitude of the Gladstonian party on the subject—emphasized, as it was, by Mr. GLADSTONE'S own significant abstention from taking part in the debate—and he has taken early occasion to give the public his impressions thereon. The ingeniously disingenuous character of the line which they have taken could not be more effectively exposed than it was in Lord HARTINGTON'S strictly matter-of-fact and unrhetorical account of it. Without giving their open sanction to the disorderly and riotous proceedings which accompanied the London demonstrations, they have unmistakably revealed their desire to apply in the metropolis, so far as they dared, the methods on which they rely in Ireland. It is quite true, as Lord HARTINGTON remarked, "that in the main "resolution proposed by the Opposition they committed "themselves to nothing; they do not express any opinion "on the action of the Government; and they have not "ventured to censure the conduct of the Government in "repressing these disorderly assemblies." Nevertheless, they supported an amendment which they did not themselves think it expedient to bring forward—an amendment which was in the nature of a censure on the action of the police, "who acted under the orders of that Government "whose conduct these same men had not ventured to impeach"—and so, though they did not commit themselves here, as in Ireland, to the support, in so many words, of the disturbers of law and order, yet, so far as their votes of last week went, "they have done what they could to weaken "the arm of the law and the authority of the Government." That is a perfectly true and impartial account of the matter, and it will be for the public to judge of tactics which are as mean as they are mischievous, and not more recklessly hostile to the public welfare than contemptibly wanting in the courage of their immorality.

Equally telling was Lord HARTINGTON'S review of the relations of the Gladstonians with the Plan of Campaign. Noting their leader's recent correction of his language on the subject, and observing with characteristically dry humour that Mr. GLADSTONE'S reported employment of the word "assert," instead of the word "deny," had not struck his adherents as "making any material difference to the effect "of his argument," Lord HARTINGTON went on to point out what is too often overlooked—that Mr. GLADSTONE'S hinted palliation, Jesuitical as it is, of the Plan of Campaign is based on the pretence that he has only its technical illegality to excuse, instead of having to justify its offences against "the fundamental principles of honesty "and uprightness." On this point, however, much as it may need to be enforced and reinforced for the instruction of popular audiences, we need not here dwell. It is more to our immediate purpose to follow Lord HARTINGTON into his survey of the situation in Ireland and in Parliament, and the conclusions which he has formed as to the position occupied by the Government and the Unionist party after the conflict of the winter. He certainly is not an observer who can be accused of taking too optimistic a view of circumstances or prospects anywhere, and his complete satisfaction, therefore, with the present state of matters is all the more reassuring. As he truly and shrewdly says, the success of the Government in rebutting the charges made against them with respect to the administration of the Crimes Act is a success which gains immensely in significance from the manifest and manifold disadvantages under which it has been achieved. Nothing is easier than the attack, especially to assailants as little scrupulous as Mr. BALFOUR'S; nothing is more difficult than the defence. By the exercise of due industry in Ireland it is possible for a Parnellite to arm himself almost daily with an indefinite number of plausible cases of grievance and hardship. It is, on the other hand, impossible for any man or men who represent the Government in Ireland to be supplied on the spot with a complete answer to every case which may be alleged against the administration of the law. The traducer of the authorities has generally twenty-four hours during which his slander must necessarily remain unrefuted. He gains that point which CLOUGH perceived to be of so much more importance than the mere bearing false witness. "The lie has time on its own wings to fly," and it is much to be feared that those who note its flight too often fail to remark the shot that brings it down. Of those, for instance, who heard it triumphantly asserted from the Irish benches that Mrs. CONNELL, the boycotted old dame of eighty, was in reality a "robust and active "woman of fifty," how many are aware that there is official evidence in existence of her son being fifty-two? Comparatively few, we are afraid; yet this is only one among many illustrations of the unfair advantage which the attack enjoys over the defence, and with all these things against them it is much to be able to boast, as Lord HARTINGTON well says the Government are entitled to do, that "not a single instance has yet been alleged which "affords proof of any substantial injustice having been in"flicted under the operation of the Crimes Act."

The endeavour, in short, to prove that the Act has been oppressively administered has failed as conspicuously as the attempt to show last year that its enactment was in itself a measure of oppression. This, in fact, is the third unsuccessful agitation in which the Gladstonians have engaged in connexion with the matter. They threatened, and tried, to "raise the country" against the Crimes Act while it was before the House. They declared their intention of stumping England and Scotland to denounce it and its authors, after it was passed, but before it had come into active operation. And now, again, they have formally arraigned the administration of it, with all the wealth of invective at their command and all the unscrupulousness of assertion that distinguishes them. "The country, however, has not been "roused to indignation; the country has not been con"vinced that there is any oppressive intention in the Act or "any oppressive operation of it; and the country believes "rightly that the Act has only been passed and is only "being administered for the repression of evil infinitely "more serious, for the suppression of tyranny infinitely "more oppressive, than any which, in the wildest moments "of exaggeration, can be attributed to the officers of the "law in the execution and administration of the Act." And what is more—though Lord HARTINGTON has spared the feelings of the discomfited Gladstonians so far as to leave the fact unnoticed—they have themselves become at last conscious of the position in which they stand. They have struggled long and hard against the conviction, but at length it has been brought home to them. They know now that all that talk about "sweeping the country," with which they have allowed their ears to be amused by some of their more feather-headed counsellors, is grossly ridiculous; and the last two elections have probably taught them that the pseudo-science on which all these follies of prophecy have been based is about as much worth the attention of rational politicians as Esoteric Buddhism. The elections which deceived them were the first which had occurred for some time, and with their heads full of their own vacation rhetoric, their exultation deserved to be described, after the strange title of one of COLERIDGE'S short poems, as "Something "Childish, but Very Natural." They have now, however, put away childish things; and though evidently a little "down on their luck," they show a commendable disposition to face the uphill work before them like men. It only remains for Unionists to make the hill so steep for them that they will at last see the advisability of going round by another road.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S DESPATCH.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S despatch to Lord SALISBURY was a seasonable commentary on Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR'S latest speech. The coarse expression of political spite serves as a contrast to a plain and unimpassioned narrative of a successful negotiation. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S acknowledgment of the friendly courtesies with which he has been received confirms the reports which have been hitherto published on the subject. The only pretext for Mr. O'CONNOR'S vulgar invective was the assumption that the Government had selected a diplomatic representative whose efficiency might be impaired by personal prejudice against a supporter of the Irish Union. It would not have been surprising if some American Nationalists had taken the opportunity to offer affronts to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and his employers; but it may be inferred from their inaction that they thought it inexpedient to defy public opinion. American statesmen, even when they have been accustomed to court the Irish vote, decline any public recognition of the claim of foreigners to direct their political conduct. Mr. GLADSTONE, in his latest contribution to the literature of the Home Rule controversy, suggests as a reason for concession the resentment which Americans may be supposed to feel in consequence of the exclusive interest which Irish electors take in the affairs of the country from which they derive their origin. In the present instance there has apparently been no attempt to interfere. According to Mr. O'CONNOR, the negotiation ought to have failed; but up to the present time it has been successful. The Senate, even if it refuses to ratify the treaty, will not allege the wrongs of Ireland as the reason of its dissent. If Republican politicians disapprove of the treaty on the ground of its provisions, their motives are perhaps not wholly unconnected with calculations of the strength of the Irish vote; but there is no reason to believe that the opposition is in any degree directed against Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. GLADSTONE admitted both that the despatch of a special mission to Washington was opportune and that the envoy was judiciously chosen. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN probably shares the admiration of American institutions and of the national character which is generally entertained by politicians of advanced Liberal opinions. He was consequently able to repeat polite commonplaces without ceasing to be sincere.

The formal conciseness of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S official report was expanded into an argumentative vindication of the treaty in his speech to the Canadian Club of Philadelphia. His apology is addressed to Americans and Canadians; for he was entitled to assume that all serious English politicians would heartily welcome even a provisional settlement of an ancient and dangerous dispute. It was not worth while to anticipate or to refute the objections of Mr. LABOUCHERE and Mr. O'CONNOR. Although it is not universally true that a judgment must be just because it dissatisfies both the contending litigants, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN was fully justified in quoting the censure of the treaty which had been simultaneously pronounced by an American and a Canadian newspaper. He had received on the same day a copy of an important newspaper, published in Canada, which denounced the agreement "as an abject betrayal of all the "rights of Canada," and an article "in an influential "organ published in New York, which declared that the "humiliation of the United States was now complete, and "that there had been a cowardly betrayal and a cowardly "abandonment of all the claims and contentions of this "country." Mr. CHAMBERLAIN added the ironical remark that "the two journals are consistent with one another "because they are organs of the Oppositions to the respective "Governments which are answerable for the treaty." It might perhaps have been prudent to abstain from a comment which seems to commit powerful parties to the policy which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN earnestly deprecates. There is undoubtedly some force in the unanimous condemnation by two parties, on opposite grounds, of a treaty which is avowedly a compromise. Zealous party politicians fasten upon the concessions which have been made on their own side, and undervalue the price which has been paid for the surrender of a portion of their claims. In one sense the Canadian Government may have made the greater sacrifice, because, as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN justly contends, the language of the existing treaty favours their contention. According to a wider view of expediency, the Canadians had a strong interest in yielding to their powerful neighbour all the conveniences and facilities which could be reasonably demanded. The technical right by which Canadian cruisers have seized American fishing smacks is a damnosa hereditas or burdensome possession. It is certain that the habitual enforcement of the right would lead to quarrels in which the owners of the disputed fisheries would not be always in the right. Fishermen and sailors are likely to take a liberal view of their own rights, and to enforce or resist with excessive vigour unpalatable measures in which they are directly interested. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN is entitled to declare that "everything which the courtesy of "nations or the convenience of fishermen can require has "been and will be freely accorded by the Canadian Govern-"ment." He had already said that "Canada had a legal "right to refuse the greater majority of the concessions "which have been made in this treaty."

The disputants, who are accused in the same words of the crime of betrayal, are perfectly satisfied with an arrangement of which both of them seem at first to have despaired. The agreement between the English and American Commissioners supplies positive evidence of the wisdom of the compromise at which they have arrived. The PRESIDENT and the SECRETARY of STATE, whose opinion would command great weight even if it were not strengthened by their high official position, entirely concur in Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S estimate of the results which have been attained. Neither Mr. CLEVELAND nor Mr. BAYARD agrees with "an eminent politician" who told Mr. CHAMBERLAIN that the fishery question was so paltry a matter that it was a question which politicians would think it safe to play with. The PRESIDENT has already urged upon the Senate the propriety of ratifying the treaty. The SECRETARY of STATE showed his cordial appreciation of the proposed settlement by writing a letter, to be read at the dinner at Philadelphia, in the same spirit in which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed the meeting. He said that the "work of your distinguished guests was one of high honour "and usefulness, well deserving grateful recognition at the "hands of all who have at heart the happiness and welfare "of Canada and the United States." In another sentence, which was virtually addressed to his own countrymen, Mr. BAYARD expressed an earnest hope "that the blindness of "partisanship or the influence of local selfishness or igno-"rance may not be suffered to deprive the two countries of "the great benefits" of the treaty. He would confirm Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S explanation of the modus vivendi, as it is called, by which the Commissioners have endeavoured to provide for possible or probable delay in the ratification. The main provision of the scheme which is appended as a supplement to the draft of the treaty is that, while it lasts, American fishermen may obtain all the facilities which they require on payment of a licence duty. The amount as well as the nature of the proposed tax is loudly denounced by the opponents of the treaty. As Mr. CHAMBERLAIN reminds them, the contract will in every case be voluntary, and, consequently, fishermen who object to the licence duty may escape the burden by dispensing with the benefit. They have of late repudiated any desire to fish in the territorial waters of Canada. They might have obtained the privilege if they had been willing to pay a reasonable price, but they are now taken at their word. The right of shipping crews, of buying bait, and generally of obtaining in Canadian ports facilities for the prosecution of their industry will be conceded at any time on their compliance with certain conditions. If Congress hereafter thinks fit to abolish the import duty on Canadian fish, American fishing vessels will be at once entitled under the provisions of the treaty to the privileges which are in the meantime withheld or suspended. There is no probability of such a result, except as part of a general policy of Free-trade. The New England fishermen will resist to the utmost of their power the competition of foreigners in American markets. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, notwithstanding the diplomatic aptitude which he has lately displayed, sometimes relapses into the attitude of a Parliamentary debater. In his Philadelphia speech he could not deny himself the pleasure of hinting that Congress ought to allow to American consumers the benefit of buying fish at the natural price. If any nation likes to be taxed, it is not the business of foreigners to object. There is little use in proclaiming sound doctrine out of season; nor is the political climate of Pennsylvania favourable to the cultivation of sound economy.

The time which has been selected for the negotiation involved some disadvantage. The Presidential election will take place during the current year, and the contest—or, as it is called, the campaign—will begin almost immediately. Candidates and political managers will be tempted to regard the treaty with reference to its probable effect on the election. The Irish vote will have considerable influence, and the Protectionist vote will be adverse to ratification. The forces of the two great parties are approximately equal. The actual PRESIDENT and the House of Representatives are Democratic, and the Senate has a small Republican majority. The Irish voters have in former times been closely allied with the Democrats; but the Republicans, especially if they are represented by Mr. BLAINE, will probably appeal to popular prejudice against a policy which is friendly to England. There is a Protectionist wing of the Democratic party under the leadership of Mr. RANDALL, and it is not certain whether the party will be unanimous in the re-nomination of the PRESIDENT. Unfortunately the immediate decision rests with the Senate, and the necessary majority of two-thirds will only be secured if the interests of parties are left out of consideration. The modus vivendi which has been devised to meet the contingency of a rejection of the treaty will itself require the sanction of the Senate. On the whole, the balance of probability is against ratification; but it is not to be assumed, even if the whole negotiation proves to be abortive, that it could have been prudently postponed. It is a great advantage to have the cordial support of the PRESIDENT and the SECRETARY of STATE, whose successors may perhaps favour an opposite policy. Even if the ratification is now refused, the probability of a future settlement on the same basis has been greatly increased. It is not altogether impossible that there may be a Republican secession such as that which procured the election of a Democratic President in 1884. The pretence that the American Commissioners have betrayed the interests of their country is too flagrantly absurd to exercise any influence on opinion, though it may serve the purposes of a faction. If Mr. CLEVELAND is nominated and elected, any delay of ratification will probably be corrected before the expiration of his second term of office. A Republican President, on the other hand, would, if the appointment of Commissioners had been postponed, have refused to propose or favour a compromise. The English Government was, therefore, well advised in taking the earliest opportunity of attempting to effect a settlement of the dispute. The selection of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN as the principal negotiator has been amply justified.

GLADSTONIAN DEPRESSION.

CHRISTIANITY, chivalry, common sense, and the pagan, but still powerful, dread of NEMESIS, are four things which do not invariably, or perhaps often, agree in their dictates; but they all counsel abstention from exulting in the misfortunes of others. It is, therefore, for historical and argumentative purposes only that we refer to the deep and lasting depression which the Deptford election, and the elections which preceded it, have evidently caused in Separatist minds. That depression is observable in all sorts of places and in all sorts of manners. It cannot, perhaps, be wholly charged with the tameness shown by the Opposition in the close of the Trafalgar Square debate of last week, though the incredible imprudence with which Gladstonians announced beforehand that Deptford was to be made a test whether the order-loving citizens of London loved order enough to uphold Sir CHARLES WARREN or not is not to be forgotten. But it shows clearly in Mr. GLADSTONE'S half-melancholy reply to the singularly undistinguished one and a quarter per cent. of the English clergy who have been got together to send him a Home Rule address. It appears, perhaps, in the singularly incautious admission of a Gladstonian newspaper that Lord JOHN MANNERS (whose elevation in rank will not, it is to be hoped, deprive the Tory party of the services of one whom the late Lord HOUGHTON, no sentimental judge, called the most stainless politician of our time) is incapable of touching such pitch as "Parnellism and Crime." Alas! there was a colleague of Lord JOHN'S in the representation of Newark, more years ago than many of us have seen, who has touched the pitch of Parnellism and Crime without the commas and in too real a sense. It may be seen also in innumerable small matters of silence as well as of speech during the last ten days.

But nowhere was it seen more clearly than in the much-talked-of banquet which last Saturday celebrated the foundation of an Oxford Home Rule League, where not quite the promised five hundred, but scarcely two-fifths of that number, assembled; where the wise men came, if not from the East, yet from the North, in the person of Sir [illegible]; where statesmanship was represented by Lord RIPON, and eloquence less equivocally by Sir CHARLES RUSSELL. The Chairman of that occasion was, fortunately for Home Rule, Professor FREEMAN, and Professor FREEMAN, as his worst enemies admit, has never yet feared the face of man or fortune. So he proposed the toast of the QUEEN, which "Home Rulers gave more heartily and "more truly than any other class of the people." The unkind Gladstonian print from which we take this quotation supplies no amplification of the Professor's remarks, which, as they stand thus, are a little enigmatical, and must remind Oxford readers of a story familiar to them. Home Rulers, it would seem, give the toast of the QUEEN "in the "best sense of the term," and what that means each hearer or reader may be left to discover. But Mr. FREEMAN probably, and indeed, from other accounts, certainly, referred to the fact that Home Rulers would leave the person of the Sovereign as the sole nexus between the parts of the Sovereign's dominions. The Chairman, however, if he said things debatable, seems at any rate to have said nothing silly, which cannot be said of Lord RIPON. The death of Lord WOLVERTON and the simple frankness of Gladstonian laments on that occasion are surely recent enough to have prevented Lord RIPON from talking about the influence of wealth at elections as exerted against what he is pleased to term Liberalism. Nor, we think, would Mr. FREEMAN in Lord RIPON'S case have ventured the statement that PITT'S Union was dead and gone. It is a mercy that there was no irreverent Tory undergraduate in the gallery to call out "Who killed Cock Robin?" for the veracious spirit of the original rhyme would surely have forced even Lord RIPON to answer "I and my little party." But there was no such audacious intruder, and Lord RIPON came safely to the end of his oration. It must have seemed tame to the hearers in any case; tamest when Sir CHARLES RUSSELL got up and informed them that the present Irish movement has surpassed in "crimelessness and bloodlessness" any popular movement in the history of the world. Sir CHARLES is a lawyer as well as a politician. In the latter capacity he may count the blood of landlords and landgrabbers as not blood at all; but in the former he should at least be aware that crime is not a matter for individual freaks of definition. By the assertions, over and over again repeated, of Mr. GLADSTONE, of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, and of every one of Sir CHARLES'S present leaders, except Mr. JOHN MORLEY, the present Irish movement was begun in crime and carried on in crime till at least a few months ago; and it is hardly necessary to say that the testimony of history—a better witness than either Mr. GLADSTONE or Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT—confirms them here, and does not stop where they stopped. But it is perhaps absurd to treat seriously so wild a statement as this. It was made, no doubt, after dinner and to an uncritical audience; but it would hardly have been made if the uncomfortable writing of Deptford on the wall had not made this experienced advocate feel the necessity of administering a very strong stimulant indeed to his hearers. When an ex Law Officer of the Crown vouches for the crimelessness of conspiracy and the bloodlessness of murder, who shall gainsay him, at least in the house of his friends?

There are few better evidences of the loss of political morale than the recklessness, or rather let us say the calculated desperation, of such protesting too much. Providence, it is true, has prepared what may, and probably will, be taken as an occasion of forgetting, or pretending to forget, Deptford in a forthcoming election. There should be, unless there is great mismanagement somewhere, no difficulty in holding Melton or Chichester, but an equally safe Gladstonian seat is vacant at Gower by the death of Mr. YEO. It is to be hoped that the seat will be fought; but a Tory victory would be at least improbable, and some salve should thus be forthcoming for Gladstonian wounds. Such an election, however, has no real weight, and may almost be neglected, just as, of course, the others mentioned above may be neglected likewise, unless in either case there is a remarkable change in the balance of the voting. If the fury of the weather returns, a fresh batch of vacancies may occur, but hardly one of greater importance than that decided during the last month. The lesson of that batch is quite unmistakable. So far, allowing for the invariable tendency of bye-elections to go against the Government in power, and even without full allowance for this, the Home Rule attack has made no sensible advance, and the Unionist defences have suffered not even a perceptible breach. The victory of Doncaster, however, ought to stir Unionists up to much greater efforts in preparing for conflict in the remoter and more benighted parts of the Kingdom where Mr. GLADSTONE'S name is still a sufficient, though the only, conjuring wand on the Home Rule side. The immense Irish vote in some of the large towns of the North is, of course, a very great difficulty, but it ought not to be insuperable, and the Gladstonianism of Scotland will certainly yield to treatment of the right kind in time. The change of it into a "Scotch party," which the Gladstonian leaders evidently half desire and half fear, will be far more fatal to its own side than to Unionism. The curious debate on Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL'S motion on Tuesday night shows this very curiously, at the same time that it shows the nervous desire of Mr. GLADSTONE and others not to offend Scotch Home Rulers. In this very debate, however, Mr. FINLAY struck the right note, and it is not rash to hope that the echo of his words may spread in Scotland.

GRASS.

IT has been said that one great source of loss to the farmer is the common error that any so-called artificial manure will serve his purpose, provided it is cheap and has a nasty smell. We are inclined to think that he often loses still more by acting as if any herbage that grows of its own accord were grass. When an agriculturist allows land to "go to grass"—almost as it likes—i.e. to become a nursery for every pestilent weed of the neighbourhood, and then "artificials" it, without regard to either seed or soil, with the least expensive compound calling itself manure on which he can lay his hands, he has reached the very acme of bad farming. This, of course, is an extreme case; but something more or less approaching to it is far from rare. When the Agricultural Returns were published in the early part of the winter, it was stated that a large quantity of unlet arable land, in certain districts, had been allowed to fall out of cultivation and to become covered with any grasses that grow spontaneously. Land of this kind, which had formerly been worth from 20*s.* to 40*s.* an acre, was now let at from 3*s.* to 4*s.* an acre. The Commissioners owned themselves puzzled in many cases as to whether such land should be put down as fallow or permanent pasture, and in a large number of instances it was eventually returned as the latter. When cheap and adulterated artificial manures are thrown on "permanent pasture" of this nature, with a view to giving it what farmers term "heart," much such a state of things is arrived at as that which we have stigmatized as the summit of bad farming. If needy landlords must allow unlet arable land to go out of cultivation, they would do well to make up their minds at once, and sow it with the coarser permanent grasses and clovers, which could be had at something like 6*s.* per acre, or about half the cost of high-class seeding. There would then at least be nutritious grasses, of a kind, for a new tenant to pasture his stock upon, and the comparatively trifling outlay would be well repaid. There can be no doubt, too, that, even if the land is likely to be broken up again, it is better that in the meantime it should be growing grass than weeds. A single field, on which thistles, docks, dandelions, and rubbishing weeds of other kinds are seeding, is not only a waste to its owner, but a nuisance to the surrounding neighbourhood.

Where land is regularly and systematically laid down in either temporary or permanent pasture, farmers too often sow it with seeds which they have themselves gathered from the bottoms of their own lofts. Such seeds usually cover the land with grass very quickly, for the simple reason that the farmer sows with a liberal hand that which costs him nothing; but it is rare to find an old pasture free from weeds, and the seeds from the hayloft will probably contain those of a number of undesirable herbs. When a new pasture is to be made at all, it is well worth the expense of starting it with the most carefully selected seeds, and even then it is almost impossible to be certain that a few weeds will not be sown among them. On the other hand, if the seeds in the loft are from a heavy crop of hay that was of first-rate quality and grown on the farm, we should infinitely rather see them used as the foundation of a new pasture than that the farmer should go, as many do, to a village grocer or chemist and buy any seed-mixture that may happen to be lying in his shop. The loft-seeds, under the conditions which we have required, at least suit the soil and the climate, whereas those in the shop may or may not; and although, as we have already said, well-chosen seeds from a trustworthy seedsman would be the best of all, those from the hayloft are presumed to be tolerably clean, whereas those in the "mixture" may very possibly be adulterated with the seeds of Yorkshire Fog, lavender grass, wild pansy, poppy, chickweed, moon daisy, and—worst of all to the dairyman—seeds affected by ergot. There can, however, be no difficulty whatever in finding good seeds in these days. The names of several firms whose care in seed-growing and seed-selection is beyond suspicion will at once occur to the minds of most people, nor are they likely to be forgotten, considering the pertinacity with which they scatter their catalogues and other advertisements throughout the country. A farmer cannot be too careful in choosing his seedsmen; but, when once he has chosen them, he should consult them as he would his doctor or his lawyer, telling them all about his climate, the nature of the soil he is going to sow on, and whether he wishes to make a permanent pasture, or to lay down grass in a rotation of crops, adding in the latter case whether it is to be a one year's lay, a two years' lay, or a three or four years' lay. This is a very different system from going to the grocer and simply asking for "grass seeds," and one that is likely to be followed by very different results.

There is another matter in connexion with grass in which many farmers make mistakes. When their old pastures deteriorate, as they often will, until they do not produce half their due amount of fodder, their tenants are apt either to leave them alone altogether, and call them "cold, bad, overrented fields," or else to forget that for renovating worn-out pastures very special seeds are required, and that their selection should depend, to a great extent, upon the cause of the deterioration of the special field that is under treatment. Infinite, again, as is the value of farmyard manure, it does not always follow that what farmers call "a mucking" is the precise remedy required. Strongly as we have urged that unlet land should be merely sown with the seeds of coarse but nutritious grasses rather than that it should be left to "grass itself," too great stress cannot be laid upon the importance of careful preparation of land for pasture. There are few greater fallacies than to suppose that when land has become too poor to grow turnips or grain it will answer to lay it down in grass, "just to give it a rest." To yield rich pasturage land ought to be in a very fertile condition, well drained, and very clean. It has been stated that there are nearly, if not quite, a million more acres under permanent pasture in Great Britain now than there were five or six years ago. Some of it is excellent, but it would not be too much to say that a good deal of it is execrable. What would be the extra amount of stock that might be reared on this same pasturage if the land which has been allowed to "go to grass" as it pleased within the last few years had been but half laid down as it ought to have been? Yet the facilities of obtaining good seed, and clean seed, and the best varieties of seed, have never been so great, while the whole system of laying down land in grass is better understood than ever.

SOME LETTERS.

TO remind people of what they have said on former occasions is held by some severe critics of the minor morals to be rude, and it certainly is unkind. But it may surely be permitted to suggest to certain Gladstonians that it is a remarkable error on their part to abuse Mr. Bright. We do not agree with Mr. Bright any more than we ever did agree with him in any of the very numerous points on which we have differed for thirty years and more. Mr. Bright, as far as we know, does not agree with us on any one of those points any more than he ever did. He has published this week a letter on war, with which we disagree just as heartily and completely as we can. We retract nothing that we have ever said of Mr. Bright. But, not being entirely blind, we happen to see that Mr. Bright, unlike Mr. Gladstone, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, and the rest of the ragged regiment, is exactly where he was thirty months, as well as thirty years, ago; and that in that particular point of his position we agree with him as we agreed. Persons of intelligence on the other side ("Gens de bien! Dieu vous saulve, et guard. Où estez vous? Je ne vous peuz veoir," as that ribald Master Francis has it) might surely remember, first, that they have for many years been impressing on their own antagonists that it is useless, and indeed fatal, to abuse Mr. Gladstone; and, secondly, that it is a little awkward to abuse Mr. Bright for simply declining to move from the very position which for years they have been holding themselves, and applauding in others. Two letters of Mr. Bright's bearing on the Unionist-Separatist debate have been published this week, and both of these seem to have annoyed Separatists very much indeed. The first was addressed to a Rochdale Unionist, who (he must have been a foolish person) was disturbed by the assertion of some paid or unpaid lecturer to the effect that "Liberal-Unionists had abandoned the traditions of their party." Now several unkind things have been said of Mr. Bright lately by his party. But no one, except some Irish yahoos not worth taking account of, has disputed that he is very well up indeed in the traditions of his party. Some ribald ones say that he knows the traditions better than the actual facts; but that accusation, it is clear, does not tell here. The question is of the traditions. Ecco the great traditionary:—"How strangely your lecturer and his chairman and the speakers at the meeting are able to forget what happened only two years ago. Mr. Gladstone changed his views on the Irish question and they changed with him. If he had continued to hold his former opinion, I doubt not they would have still adhered to him and to his former policy, and they would have supported his coercion policy as it was supported by the Liberal party in the years 1881 and 1882. Surely the Liberals who follow Mr. Gladstone might be a little more tolerant of those who cannot change their [illegible] garments so readily as they have done. It is more easy to follow a leader asking no questions, however dark the road; but it were but decent to allow to others the right to doubt and to stand firmly by their own principles and policy. Mr. Gladstone's friends do not know what is his scheme for the future. The old scheme was destroyed by a vote of Parliament, confirmed by a vote of the constituencies, and there is nothing now in its place; and what is curious and amusing is that none of his friends dare ask him anything of the future. They are afraid of inviting him into a trap. He has led them into a trap, and they are very angry that the Unionists will not join them there." We said just now that it was wrong of Gladstonians to abuse Mr. Bright; but we retract. They would be more or less than human if they did not. For sheer cruelty, for brutal statement of fact, this letter will take rank with anything in political history. Mr. Gladstone did change his views; even Mr. John Morley will not deny that. The demand for tolerance of the "quick change" is surely reasonable; even Mr. Campbell-Bannerman cannot deny that. The old scheme was destroyed; even Sir George Trevelyan, who presented himself as a candidate on this distinct understanding, cannot deny that. Mr. Gladstone's friends do not know what is his scheme for the future; Sir William Harcourt, who will deny almost anything, cannot deny that. And so each chamber of the Brightian revolver sends a bullet home. Poor things! It is no wonder that they squirm.

But this wicked Mr. Bright (with whose letter on war we heartily, as we have said, disagree) had not done with the squirmers. He writ yet a verbosa et grandis epistola to the Unionist meeting in silly Suffolk, where Lord Hartington (that bad man!) was to be the chief speaker, and a wicked Duke was to preside. And the letter to the people of Ipswich was even worse than the letter to the people of Rochdale. Here it is:—

Dear Sir,—I am glad to see that you are about to hold a great and, I hope, a successful Unionist meeting. I wish I could send you a few words of encouragement that might be worthy to be read at the meeting. Has it occurred to you and your friends that Mr. Gladstone's supporters rarely discuss his Bills or the great question which has for a time ruined the Liberal party? They do not defend his Bills. Nobody who is familiar with their details is able or willing to do that. They prefer to attack the Government and to denounce Mr. Balfour, and to spread abroad extravagant falsehoods as to the objects of the Crimes Act, and as to the barbarous manner in which it is enforced. They have got sympathy for mayors of Irish cities, for editors of disloyal newspapers, for priests who forget that their true mission is one of peace and not of violence, and for Englishmen, county gentlemen and others, who show their patriotism by aiding the revolutionary movement in Ireland; but they say almost nothing on behalf of the humbler class of men who find themselves in prison for offences to which they have been incited by these gentlemen disturbers of the peace. As to the severity of punishments inflicted, let us compare them with some cases nearer home. Two or three weeks ago I noted two cases in London police-courts. A young woman, a domestic servant, was convicted of having stolen one penny on two occasions—twopence in all. She was sentenced by the magistrate to six weeks' imprisonment. Another case was that of a woman who had taken a small sum for pretending to tell the fortune of a servant girl. The exact sum I do not remember—perhaps a shilling or half a crown. She was sent to prison for twelve weeks, with hard labour. Now, consider the guilt of these women, and compare it with the hundred-fold guilt of the men whose writings and speeches have caused the terrors of boycotting, mutilation of cattle, the outrages and murders which have disgraced Ireland and shocked mankind during the last seven years! I suppose there are few men in Ireland who have had a severer sentence under the Crimes Act than this poor fortune-teller in London; but great party leaders write and speak violently on Irish sufferers, and ask British constituencies to change a Government in order to put an end to cruelties so barbarous as those to which, they say, Mr. Balfour gives his sanction. Surely in all our modern history there is no instance of a humiliation so great as that to which the bulk of the Liberal party has been reduced by its blind following of a leader who, towards the close of a great career, has committed himself to a grievous error and, as I hope and believe, to a policy to which his country will never consent! Perhaps you will excuse me for the rather long letter I have written.—Yours very truly, John Bright.

For our parts, we shall excuse this rather long letter. But so hideously and intolerably annoyed were the Gladstonians by it that the chief Gladstonian newspaper actually omitted all the passage which explains what Mr. Bright meant by "humbler class of men," and then, on the strength of the omission, charged him with not considering Patrick Corcoran and the other printers and news-sellers. Ah! why, good gentlemen, confess the weakness of your case in this way? How much simpler to have omitted the whole letter, and thus escaped this little humiliating confrontation with the facts! If the good gentlemen had only quoted Mr. Bright's letter instead of garbling it, it would have been seen that there is nothing in it at all bearing on Patrick Corcoran, but on the boycotters and cattle-maimers, and the rest of them. Still there is much excuse for the good gentlemen, inasmuch as they must have been terribly annoyed by Mr. Bright's letter. For "Confound it, you know!" (as somebody says) "it's true!" They don't "defend his Bills." They do "attack Mr. Balfour" in exactly the language—"skunks" and all—which used to be used a year or two ago against Sir George Trevelyan. They do "get sympathy [Heaven save the mark!] for mayors of Irish cities, for editors of disloyal newspapers, for priests who forget that their mission is one of peace and not of violence, for Englishmen, county gentlemen and others who show their patriotism by aiding the revolutionary movement in Ireland." Pereant qui contra nos nostra dixerint! What an objectionable creature is this Mr. Bright! Again, we retract all that we have said against his abusers. It is quite intolerable that a Liberal of absolutely unblemished Liberalism should tell Liberals their fact in this way.

Trying, however, as this must be for Gladstonians, it might be less trying if the other person would hold his tongue. But the other won't. A more miserable maunder than the letter to the Dean of Winchester which appeared in last Monday's papers never issued even from Mr. Gladstone's mouth or pen. Let us pass the beginning and end of the letter, ample scope though they give; let us take its middle. Mr. Gladstone having inspected the least distinguished list that could even by a fantastic chance be got out of the great roll of Anglican churchmanship, adds this, according to his curious habit:—"Other names are known to me of distinguished men who, without concurring in every phrase of this letter, agree heartily in its cardinal proposition; or who, having no scruples as to any of its expressions, have shrunk from exposing themselves and their families, or the work they have in hand, to the consequences of a public declaration of this kind; consequences known to me in more than one painful instance." Ah, really! And it is Mr. Gladstone—a man who, to do him justice, knows most phases of civil (except Irish) and ecclesiastical history—who thinks that this state of things bodes victory. Was the Creed of Nicæa forced upon the Christian world by "distinguished men who, without concurring in every phrase of it, agreed heartily in" something which every one may fix for himself? Did Athanasius "shrink from exposing himself and his family, and the work that he had in hand," to the uncomfortable blackballings of the Arian? Were the famous "company of poor men" (we don't admire them much, but we salute them as the kind of enemy we respect), who, with Cromwell at their head, forced for a time, at any rate, their will on the aristocracy and the democracy of England alike, this kind of folk? "No; by Allah!" as Mahomet said, in a not wholly diverse case. Nor was any party that won, or that deserved to win, in any crisis of the world constructed after this fashion. To Mr. Gladstone, by all means, let the persons who "agree heartily without concurring," the persons who, "having no scruples, shrink," flock, and rally. Let him take them all, and make his best of them. If any is fearful and fainthearted, let him promptly go and join the Separatists. Good journey and good riddance is all that any Unionist of brains will have to say. But if there be anybody who has the courage of his opinions, and the sense of the greatness of England, and the determination to stick by principle, whatever a party leader may say, then let him follow the Unionist banner. If he must have a leader and is a Tory, he cannot go very wrong with Lord Salisbury; if he is in the same case and is a Whig, it is not likely that Lord Hartington will lead him far astray; if he is a Radical, he may reflect that there are worse Radicals than Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Bright. At any rate, he will not be following a leader to holy principles which that leader himself held no later than the year 1885, and which he has betrayed, as he betrayed Toryism, as he betrayed the Church of Ireland, as he betrayed Gordon, as he has betrayed everything and everybody that ever trusted in him.

TOOLE'S THEATRE.

A LIST of the various callings which Mr. Toole has adopted on the stage would be of an amazingly exhaustive character if it could be drawn up. He has worn the purple and the rags of the street boy, he has been seen in uniform of all descriptions, there is scarcely a profession he has not essayed, and he would have to search diligently in the Post Office Directory to find a trade he has not practised. The task of discovering new characters for him becomes harder as time goes on, and it was a good idea on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Merivale to make him a Don. There is ample scope for Mr. Toole's humour and eccentricities; how ludicrous is the Dean's mock dignity and his distress under the highly compromising perplexities which overwhelm him, those who are familiar with the famous comedian's method—and who is not?—may readily imagine. A brilliant improbability distinguishes the play. The Dean's nephew, named, like himself, Horace Josiah Milliken, has married Dora Sparkle, a ward in Chancery, and it is made to appear that the contemner of the Chancellor's jurisdiction is the Dean himself. This is a peculiarly heinous crime in the eyes of Mrs. Coventry Sparkle, whom Mr. Milliken wants to marry, and in the eyes of his late housekeeper, Mrs. Kimbo, now landlady of the "Bull and Mitre" inn, who wants to marry Mr. Milliken; and these two ladies make the Dean's life an affliction to him. Dora, it should be remarked, declares that she has married the elder Milliken; her reason for the deception being that she has learnt what penalties may overtake the husband of a ward in Chancery. Mr. Milliken's troubles culminate when a couple of officials appear in Camford to arrest him. It is odd to notice how much comedy arises from the exhibition of mental distress—at times, of course, when the audience is aware that the distress arises from a misapprehension. Here we find Mr. Milliken forced at last to resort to the desperate expedient of escaping from the window of his own room in college, only, however, to find his captors waiting for him below. Disaster can go no further, and so all comes right; a way out of the difficulty being found by Mrs. Sparkle's declaration that her niece was not made a ward until after what is now ascertained to have been the date of her marriage. On the stage this suffices to control the officers, who go away without arresting anybody.

Mr. Toole receives excellent support from his company. Miss Marie Linden's performance of Dora, who visits her undergraduate husband's rooms disguised in cap and gown, is at once bright and sympathetic. The vein of humour, of the possession of which she has given so many proofs, is skilfully drawn upon, and the humour is fresh and genuine. Miss Kate Phillips is well suited with the part of Mrs. Coventry Sparkle, and her flirtations with the Dean are highly diverting. Miss Emily Thorne is admirably fitted as Mrs. Kimbo. Mr. Billington gives an apt companion picture to Mr. Toole's; and Mr. Shelton is a diverting gyp. Mr. E. W. Gardiner and Mr. Lowne play well as undergraduates. The dialogue contains many excellent things.

A DAY WITH THE CALPE HUNT.

IT is half-past nine o'clock on a breezy February morning at Gibraltar, and the crowds in the Waterport Street part and close again as riders pass, singly or in groups, towards the North Front. We have men in pink with the Hunt button or in tweed jackets; men in snowy leathers or drab breeches and gaiters; men in lustrous black tops or brown field boots. Ladies, too, are fairly numerous, though few of them mean hunting, as the meet is at the Long Stables, fourteen miles away, and the double ride is hard work. We have now reached the Casemate Square, where knots of soldiers in fatigue dress look on us sympathetically. We proceed through the Land Port Gate to the causeway, which lies between Gibraltar Bay and the great north-western shoulder of the Rock. To the left curves the shore, on the right frown the Galleries whence speak at need the oracles of war. Next comes the Bayside Gate, then the huts on the North Front, and, lastly, the line of British sentry-boxes that fringe the neutral ground. In front looms his Catholic Majesty's good town of Linea de la Concepcion, home of all filth and beggary, through which lies our road to the pure air and firm sands of the bay.

Away to the west a small cavalcade is following the shore by a short and privileged route. We ride along the sides of stony streets with a foul and central gutter, splash through pools of stagnant water, pick our way between boats, nets, dead dogs, and live cripples, and are now fairly cantering on the beach. A lovely stretch of sand, thirty feet wide, curves away crescent-like to the west. The Governor is a quarter of a mile ahead of us, and, much further in the distance, we see the huntsman and whips, a plump of scarlet coats, with a tide of erect tails eddying about their horses' heels. We pass from the skirts of Linea to Orange Grove, a village of the whited-sepulchre class. Our company on the beach varies every minute. There are strings of donkeys laden with slabs of cork; cabs with leather curtains, and full insides; women grasping their last purchase at Gibraltar or Algeciras; men with red handkerchiefs wound turban-wise round their hats; lines of fishermen hauling in their nets, and carabineer sentries whom boredom has marked for its own. Here a mounted officer, cloaked to the eyes, blows an inexpensive cloud. There one of the jeunesse dorée of Algeciras or Linea beams on us from a hired hack. A wonderful being is this youth. Perched on a motley heap of pads and rugs, his feet buried in green shovel stirrups, one hand on the flapping reins, the other on his manly hip, he bumps proudly past los Ingleses, with his hat over one ear. Such of us as retain aught of our Eton classics mutter sadly, "Non his juventus orta parentibus." But away with moralizings on a hunting morning! At Orange Grove we leave the beach, and ride in a northerly direction over the Carteian hills, not without a look back at the Rock, rising large in the distance. And now the ground sinks sharply downwards, and we look to our going awhile. Then a small stream is crossed, we ride fast over a sandy road, bordered by prickly-pear hedges, to the First Venta, and emerge into the green plain that skirts the Guadarranque river. We canter in broken groups over the rough turf chequered with small muddy pools, leave the Duke of Kent's farm to our right, and enter the outskirts of the Cork Woods. On our left lies the river, deep sunk in its rocky bed, and the range of hills on whose side gleams the white convent of the Almoraima. Before us stretches the wilderness of gnarled and fantastic cork-trees. From the door of the Second Venta mine host looks regretfully at the good custom which is speeding past his doors, to the forlorn and grass-grown embankment of the Algeciras railway that knows not her sleeper nor wheel. Before long we swerve aside into a hollow track, bordered by splendid old trees, and come within sight of the Long Stables, our trysting-place. Here and there are dotted red coats and riderless horses, for the hounds have been here some little time. We also dismount awhile, and the Secretary moves about busily to collect field money. This done, we mount, the dogs precede us with professional alacrity, and we all plunge into the woods that clothe the skirts of a craggy range that rises above our place of meeting. Tangled bushes, knees of ancient rock, sandy slopes, clay hollows, dry torrent-beds, and patches of marsh are taken in turn. The Rock ponies stick at nothing, and their riders have only to stick on. The wood is unusually thick, and the field divides perforce into groups or strings that pass where they can.

And now there is a stir ahead, the hounds become clamorous, and Conolly blows a point of war. Some of us are in the middle of a bush, others well behind a tree with low and sweeping branches, others picking our way down a crumbling incline; but, no matter where we be, "forward" is the word. We get out of the wood in a few minutes, and see the hounds, though not the fox, straining up a heathery slope topped with a belt of rocks that form the sky-line. On we go, as hard as we can split, keeping a look-out, however, for the half-hidden boulders under foot, which our horses avoid by sudden bounds, very discomposing to him that hath no great grip with the knee. But the fox has taken right up the rocks, and some of the pack are falling behind. Up we go, clattering and stumbling, but not stopping, till we reach a long shoulder that curves round the edge of a deep valley fringed with small pines and bottomed with sand. Here the fortune of war turns against us, for the fox runs straight downhill again, and the many who have refrained from toiling up with us are now close by him. But there is justice on earth, as we learn by the furious din of tongues announcing that our friend has gone to earth. We can see two or three riders dismount and climb up to the place of sanctuary, a well-known hole in the hillside, and it is clear that our sport is to be checked. A glance below and around shows us that every one within sight is preparing to rest and to lunch; so we dismount and produce our whisky and sandwiches. But there is evidently to be no digging-out to-day, for in half an hour the hounds are moving off again along the valley below us. We brace up our girths and proceed downhill as best we can, most of us leading our horses. We find ourselves joining a lengthy string of riders, which soon comprises the whole field, and pass from the valley to a wide and gradual slope, from the top of which we see the Second Pine Wood, where fresh horses are waiting. Just as the wood comes within view another fox is started, and we enjoy a long and hard gallop over open ground, which is absolutely flat and smooth when compared with the up-and-down rock-work of the morning. Our new fox makes one or two desperate turns; but we run into him just before reaching the wood, and within five minutes his brush is hanging from the saddle of a lady who has been well up all day. Here we lose more than half the field, who ride slowly home by the First Pine Wood and San Roque. The survivors mount their second horses and move southwards towards the Pine Wood Plain. Before we have got clear of the trees there is a loud blast in front, the hounds answer joyfully, and we hurry up over ground seamed with curved and projecting roots. The well-known expanse of brown grass and heather is before us and the pace gets hot. Hitherto the fox has gone straight away, but now he swerves sharply to a deep depression on his left hand, which he crosses with a swing which sends him up the opposite side without an effort. The hounds are well on him, and the field do all they know to keep up, though the going is now very rough for horses. We are soon brought up short by a line of low crags which border the plain, and are divided by a small gully from the country beyond. Galloping is here out of the question, and, whilst a few adventurous spirits work their way down in zigzag fashion, we others halt above and watch the fox, who crosses the gully and slips into one of several thick patches of cover on the far side. The hounds, who have missed him by three yards, raise a chorus of protest, and patrol the skirts of his hiding-place in twos and threes. Some of them work round to the back of it just as he steals away across the open that leads to a much larger cover behind. They come, they see, and they conquer; and the huntsman arrives only to find peace restored, save among the victors, who have to be "taught their places" by a suasion not wholly moral. Two kills to-day, and eight miles home! So the cry is "Enough!" and we turn soberly in the direction of San Roque, which stands out on its hill big and white against the yellow glow of evening. The sun will be down in a moment, and we have a deep valley to cross before we enter the town; so we keep on the move, pick our way down the slope, cross the little stream where washerwomen do congregate, climb the muddy hillside whereon stand the Plaza and the bull-ring, and find ourselves clattering along the paved streets and surrounded by a mob of obstreperous boys. Night is coming on apace, and we observe a sympathetic silence as we descend the winding road to Campamento and the beach. We pass a last line of huts built of reeds, boards, and sides of old meat-tins, and there, before us, is the Bay and the Rock, already twinkling with lights. The waves at our feet, caught here and there by a lingering reflex of the vanished sunlight, touch the sands with a kiss of peace. The beach, Linea, and the neutral ground are soon behind us, and we return the salute of the sentries at the North Front as we pass from Spain into England. Our day with the Calpe Hunt is over. May we have many like it!

NIAGARA IN LONDON.

MANY people would be inclined to apply to the Falls of Niagara the famous saying, "See Naples and die." Let them go, then, to the panorama, "Niagara in London," or, as it is described more fully, the "great realistic cycloramic painting," at Westminster. After seeing this show it is difficult to help including a visit to Niagara amongst one's experiences in the world. The painting deserves to be M. Philippoteaux's greatest success. It is about the most attractive subject that he has yet chosen, and certainly one of the most amenable to panoramic treatment. As usual, the visitor mounts by a covered stairway in a central drum to the drum's head—a platform surrounded by railings. In devising a panorama it is not always possible to make this railed platform appear a natural feature of the scene. In views of battles, &c., you find it difficult to associate yourself and your comfortable point of view with the picture, and yet that is essential to deception. In the present case your circumstances and position tend to heighten illusion. When you leave the street you must suppose yourself entering the Museum on the Canadian side of the water. Then you climb the stairs, and now you come out into daylight on the roof of the building. A beautifully fresh morning gaiety seems to fill the air. Apparently from under an awning on the top of the house, you look out on a lively and coloured scene, bathed in the gentle sunshine of an autumn day. When you face the Falls and Goat Island you have behind you the gardens of the Museum running off into natural woods on the rising slopes of a hillside. In front, immediately beneath the house you are standing on, a high road coasts the heights above the river. Dotted sparsely with groups of carriages and gay figures, it runs from left to right, from Clifton House Hotel and the Suspension Bridge to the Horseshoe Falls and Prospect House. This last hotel appears comparatively close alongside of you on the right. It faces the road and the Falls, and bears on its sun-lit roof groups of painted figures, occupied as you are, in taking note of the tremendous scene. This gives a wonderful sense of reality to the whole view, which is heightened when you examine the excellent perspective. The distances are most convincingly felt. You seem aware of every foot in the three-quarters of a mile which separate you from Clifton House on the left and Prince of Wales's Tower on the right. Goat Island, which directly faces you, is excellently painted. Its distance, its atmospheric tone, the local colours of its trees and rocks, and the scale of its detail, are given with an air of accurate truth. You are as persuaded of the character of the country as if you had seen it. You know the amount of wildness, the comparative degrees of civilization on the two sides of the river the nature of the foliage, the number and character of the people you are likely to meet, and the directions you would choose to walk in. The water close at hand, both from its not moving and from the impossibility of making it sparkle and look translucent, scarcely convinces one of its reality with the same force as the rest of the picture. Further away, it becomes most effective, especially in the rapids above the Horseshoe Falls. Many visitors will wish to realize the feelings of Blondin and Captain Webb when they undertook their feats of daring. Blondin crossed just below the Suspension Bridge. As one comes up the stairway, a window seems to open on Webb's rapids—a fearsome place, indeed, for a human swimmer. As a picture, this view comes nowhere near the panorama either in general truth or piquancy of detail. The river, in reality nine hundred feet broad, gives an idea of quite a small stream. The smallest part of a panorama, though by no means the least ingenious or amusing to the public, lies in the arrangement of the real foreground. Unquestionably the landscape-painter will not be the victim of any doubt as to where reality stops and painting begins; but even he will find a moment's difficulty in determining exactly every point of transition into the woods behind the Museum. About the wooden fence, for instance, this is very neatly masked. The little pleasure-ground immediately surrounding the Museum has been well laid out to assist in the transition; and, when the real grass flourishes better, the illusion will become more complete. Short grass affords but a ticklish and dangerous passage to the eye. It is like welding a falsetto to a chest voice to pass suddenly on this flat surface from nature to art. The row of telegraph-posts on the road offers a better opportunity, and one which has been very intelligently used.

RELICS OF ST. THOMAS BECKET.

We are not ambitious of courting the proverbial fate of those who interpose unbidden between rival combatants; neither indeed are we as yet prepared to offer any decided opinion on the controversy still running its course—conducted, it is fair to say, on both sides in the most commendably amicable and courteous spirit—between Canon Routledge and Father Morris the Jesuit, as to the genuineness of the relics lately disinterred in Canterbury Cathedral. On some incidental points at issue we may have occasion to say a word in passing, and we may at once confess that, with every desire to accept the discovery for what it claims to be, it appears to us that "not proven" is the least unfavourable verdict which can safely be pronounced at the present stage of the discussion. But at whatever conclusion experts may ultimately arrive, the discussion itself is full of suggestive interest not only for the historical student but for all Englishmen who can appreciate the indissoluble solidarity of the national life of their country. There can be no doubt that Thomas Becket, or St. Thomas of Canterbury, by whichever title we may prefer to distinguish him, is one of the most striking and picturesque figures in the annals of mediæval England, whether or not we sympathize with the religious attitude he assumed or the cause for which he was content to die. In saying this we do not at all forget the great Archbishop and Confessor, as the Roman Church reckons him, who less than a century before occupied the same historic See, and who has been made the subject of a characteristically exquisite monograph by the present Dean of St. Paul's. But if Becket lacks the scholarly refinement and saintly grace which have for ages enshrined the memory of Anselm in the hearts of many who do not share his creed, that very gentleness and refinement contrast with the sterner but more impressive grandeur of "the martyrdom" of his successor. It is a significant circumstance, as Dean Stanley has pointed out, that before the death of Becket, although Canterbury had already for five centuries been the Primatial See of England, its Cathedral had not only acquired no European celebrity, but was not even the chief ecclesiastical edifice in the city itself, being eclipsed by the church of St. Augustine without the walls. But the great event of December 29, 1170, at once riveted on Canterbury and its Cathedral the gaze not merely of England but of Christendom. The martyr was canonized two years after his death by Alexander III., and there was an immediate outbreak of miraculous agency at his shrine, which long continued to be the most popular pilgrimage place in England, while his cult spread rapidly throughout every country in Europe. There were relics of him preserved at Rome, at Florence, at Verona, at Douay, at St. Omer, at Lisbon; there is a chapel dedicated to him at Lyons, and a house with an inscription bearing his name at Lille; his figure may still be seen in the Church of Monreale at Palermo, and his story is blazoned in the beautiful windows of Chartres, of Sens, and of St. Ouen, while a chasuble he is said to have worn is shown in the sacristy at Rheims, and his martyrdom is elaborately embroidered on another still kept in the Cathedral of Anagni; the Crusaders founded a church and cemetery in his honour at Acre. In England of course the tokens of devout homage were more conspicuous and more universal. It is hence that the name of Thomas became so common among us, and so many of our ancient bells, like that of Christ Church, Oxford, rejoice in the name "Great Tom." Meanwhile between the ardent devotion which worshipped him as a saint and the shallow fanaticism, now happily obsolete, which could discern in him nothing but a selfish hypocrite and "traitor," or a furious bigot, room has been found for an almost infinite diversity of judgment. By some he has been upheld as a champion of popular liberty, by some as a champion of orthodoxy, by others regarded as the upright and honest but incurably narrow protagonist of the exclusive privileges of a clerical caste. It would require more space than we have at our command to enter on a detailed examination of these and other rival theories here. But it is obvious to observe that the unfeigned and abiding homage which for nearly four centuries was paid to his name marks something in his character and career which woke a response in the national heart. The public penance of Henry II. and the costly offerings at his shrine might be otherwise explained, but men do not permanently and spontaneously honour what has no intrinsic worth. So much Bishop Stubbs fully admits, though his estimate seems to us—if Mr. Freeman will forgive the suggestion that on any conceivable subject they can be otherwise than absolutely agreed—to do less justice than Mr. Freeman's to the memory of "Thomas."

Our immediate concern however is not so much with the character as with the tomb and relics of the saint. We may spare our readers a minute enumeration—which the curious can easily find elsewhere—of the gorgeous ornaments of the shrine to which, just fifty years after his martyrdom, the body of the saint was translated amid a splendid assemblage of the highest prelates and potentates of England, headed by the Primate and the Sovereign himself, then a boy of thirteen. Nor shall we dwell on the growing multitude of pilgrims of every nation, rank, class, and age who for upwards of three centuries afterwards thronged to lay their offerings on the martyr's tomb. It is more to our immediate purpose, as bearing on the recent disinterment at Canterbury, to notice what occurred at the end of that period, when

> The ire of a despotic King

and the "traitor" prelate was rudely ousted from his dignity and pride of place, "his images and pictures throughout the realm put down and avoided out of all churches and chapels and other places, and his festivals, offices, &c., rased and put out of all (service) books." The "despotic" persecutor was himself the last of a long line of royal pilgrims. In 1520 Henry VIII., with his guest the Emperor Charles V., came to pay his devotions at St. Thomas's shrine. Fifteen years later on July 6, the eve of the great feast of the Translation of St. Thomas, and therefore, as he touchingly expressed it, "a meet day and very convenient for me," Sir Thomas More was executed for denying the Royal Supremacy. Two years later that same day, which had always hitherto been observed by the English primates as a strict fast, was ostentatiously kept as a festival at Lambeth by Cranmer, who "ate flesh, and did sup in his hall with his family, which was never seen before." Next year the blow fell. With a ludicrous parody of the forms of justice the dead Archbishop was formally summoned to answer charges of "treason, contumacy, and rebellion" preferred against him by the Attorney-General on the part of Henry II., and was of course convicted. Whereupon his bones were ordered to be burnt, and the treasures of his shrine forfeited to the Crown. A Royal Commission under the notorious Dr. Leyton was sent down to Canterbury to carry out this order, but unfortunately no authentic record is extant of the proceedings, and hence the doubts which have since arisen about the disposal of the body. Dean Stanley says that "the bones were either scattered to the winds, or, if interred, mingled indiscriminately with others," and this has been the prevalent belief in England since. And he quotes in proof of it a passage from Harpsfield's Life of Sir Thomas More:—"We have of late unshrined him, and buried his holy relics." But Father Morris has found on examining the text that the word used by Harpsfield is, not "buried," but "burned," and this seems in itself much likelier. Nor can we ourselves profess to attach any weight to Canon Routledge's reply that "Harpsfield, who was a staunch Roman Catholic, would not have cared to associate himself with the hated Protestants who had (on that theory) burned the relics of so great a Saint." The word "Protestants" is of course a misnomer as applied to Henry VIII.'s Commissioners, but let that pass. Harpsfield would no more have "cared to associate himself" with those who "unshrined" the Saint than with those who burned him; nor does he do so, any more than Mr. Gladstone e.g. "associates" himself with Mr. Pitt and other "blackguards" of the same kind when he dilates, as he is never weary of doing, on the hideous wrongs which for the last seven centuries "we" have inflicted on Ireland. He is simply speaking, like Harpsfield, of the atrocious outrages which "we," his countrymen, have perpetrated, and which he is as anxious as doubtless Harpsfield was to undo. On the other hand, we have seen that the traitor's bones were ordered to be burned, and it is hard to understand why the order should not have been carried out. However, as we said at starting, it is no part of our present aim tantas componere lites. But it may be worth observing that Harpsfield was Archdeacon of Canterbury during Mary's reign, and had therefore the best opportunities of becoming accurately acquainted with the true state of the case.

Meanwhile it is interesting to note how marked a contrast this very discussion indicates between the feeling about such matters in our own day and what was only too common even within living memory. We have said that Canon Routledge and his opponent are carrying on their dispute with perfect candour and courtesy and an obvious desire on both sides, not to score a controversial point, but to arrive at the exact truth. And the interest felt in the matter by the Dean of Canterbury and others concerned is no less evidently of the same kind. Dr. Payne Smith is not supposed to belong to that school in the Church of England who would most naturally sympathize with the claims and character of Becket, but we could as little conceive him as the most pronounced High Churchman holding high festival at the Deanery on July 6, after Cranmer's example at Lambeth, in order to ventilate his contempt for the memory of the "unshrined" martyr. In the dry light of history, on which such a flood of fresh brilliance has been thrown by the industry of German critics and others, during the last half-century, many rash or onesided judgments have had to be revised, and no one, Catholic or Protestant, with a character for learning or common sense to lose, would think of speaking of Becket in the way that was common enough in the days of our grandfathers. He may or may not have been a saint; how far he can be regarded as a martyr must depend partly on our reading of various disputed details of fact, partly on our estimate of the proper relations of Church and State, and on the latter point, if not on both, there will always be room for differences of opinion. But just as all loyal Englishmen, of whatever creed, must rejoice to know that a statesman who played so prominent a part in our national history as Wolsey was not the mere self-seeking time-server a reader of Shakspeare might be inclined to assume, so there is good reason to welcome the evidence that our countrymen did not for nearly four hundred years waste their devout reverence on the memory of a mere drivelling bigot or hot-headed fanatical prig. "Thomas," as Mr. Freeman is fond of calling him, was at least a man and an Englishman, and a man of resolute purpose and iron will. If he had been a Frenchman Comte would assuredly have assigned to him a conspicuous place in the bead-roll of Positivist Saints.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

THE morning performance on Wednesday at the Haymarket for the benefit of that excellent charity the "House of Shelter" in Whitechapel comprised an extremely rich and varied programme, as custom prescribes for such occasions. It was satisfactory to learn from Mr. Beerbohm Tree, in an interval of the entertainment, that a substantial sum had been realized, which will be further increased, it is to be hoped, by Mr. Tree's impromptu appeal to those among the audience who were but newly acquainted with the objects of the institution. His ingenious address certainly merited ample response. It would be injurious and perhaps not altogether just to those concerned to discuss at length a programme made up of excerpts from Othello, Money, and the Critic, not to mention Mr. G. W. Godfrey's adaptation of Mrs. Hugh Bell's L'Indécis, and a musical sketch given by Mr. Eric Lewis. When Mrs. Bancroft revisits past scenes of delight, like the lover in Moore's pretty poem, it is not to the accompaniment of weeping stars, but gaining the old merry influence and moving the delighted house as of yore. In the scene from Money, when the funereal Mr. Graves and the lightsome Lady Franklin honour the memory of the lamented Maria, Mrs. Bancroft played with irresistible vivacity and humour. Especially delightful were the delicate moments of perilous hovering between conventional decorum and the frank ebullition of pent-up spirits. As Mr. Graves, Mr. Alexander Yorke gave with ludicrous effect the odd interjected fits of hilarity of the constant mourner, and, though his make-up might be charged with exaggeration, his manner throughout was capital. The third scene of the third act of Othello, though eminently crucial from the actor's standpoint, necessarily suffers when detached from the tragedy and planted between two scenes of modern comedy. It is hard, indeed, to grasp Mr. Tree's conception of Iago from this one scene. Mr. Tree's reading shows close, and in parts searching, study, with the laudable determination not to be tied overmuch by the chains of tradition. But why should Iago draw his dagger on Othello when hurled to the ground? The action of the impetuous Moor, though he is merely directed to seize Iago by the throat, is not without propriety; but it is not difficult to make Iago overdo his honest part in playing the frank soldier. The Othello of Mr. Terriss illustrated the distinction between having a fine voice and possessing it. In Othello's passionate outbursts, it is not the voice, as Mr. Terriss suggested, that should be uncontrollable, but the passion. No one associates the "music yearning like a god in pain" with mere volume of sound or strenuous announcement of a fine vocal organ. Mrs. Beerbohm Tree was a graceful and sympathetic Desdemona, whose pleading for Cassio in this scene was so touching and sympathetic that the desire to see the actress in the play itself must be general. Mr. Godfrey's piece, founded on Mrs. Bell's comedy, is slight, but brightly written. The Man that Hesitates —— is better suited to the requirements of amateur or drawing-room entertainments than the professional stage. Mr. Arthur Cecil was very diverting in the part of the undecided Mr. Bramble, who is, however, not "lost," as the proverb has it, for all his nice hesitation between "honest straightforwardness" and "brutality" of speech, and timorous apprehensions of consequences. Mr. Arthur Cecil was very ably supported by Miss Florence Wood in the dialogue that succeeds the somewhat overdrawn monologue which opens the piece. The second act of the Critic concluded the programme. Almost all concerned, except Mr. Brookfield, as Lord Burleigh, strove to better Sheridan, as is usual, by most improvident "gag." Mr. Brookfield gave his Burleighan nod and went—with a prodigiously cryptic exit. Mr. Charles Wyndham was, indeed, an excellent Puff, imperturbable on occasions—as should be the case—and a spirited interpreter of his own play to Sneer and Dangle. Mr. F. Leslie, also, was delightfully solemn and sententious as the Governor, and played as Sheridan would have desired. The serious preoccupation of Mr. Leslie's acting was not communicated to the other actors. Mr. Terry and Miss Farren played burlesque in their own inimitable fashion. Mr. Grossmith and the rest—saving Mr. Kemble's portentous Beefeater—did not so much as betray an inkling of the motif of Sheridan's play. Mr. Grossmith seems to think it is always and everywhere seasonable to play the buffoon—even in the Critic.

MR. COLVIN'S EXHIBITION.

THE Keeper of the Prints has arranged for exhibition in what is called the White Building at the British Museum a choice of examples, some two hundred and seventy numbers strong, from the collection of paintings and drawings by the masters of China and Japan which was purchased from Mr. William Anderson, and has since been catalogued by him for the Trustees in a work which, as we took occasion to show, exhausts our present knowledge of the subject. The selection is but a tenth or so of the whole; but we understand that the remaining nine-tenths are in perfect order, and may be seen by students either in the Print Room or in the new gallery. There is not much doubt, however, that what is already on view is far and away what sporting writers call the pick of the basket. Mr. Colvin, who is nothing if not thorough, has arranged it so carefully and well as to have produced a model exhibition. In cases on the walls or in cases on the floor, those for the kakémonos and these for the drawings and the rolls, he presents a kind of panoramic view of Japanese art. You start, to the left of the door from the Ceramic Gallery (where Mr. Franks has arranged what is probably the finest collection of glass and ceramics in the world), with the Chinese masters; you pass on to the Butsu-yé—the purely hieratic work—of the Japanese themselves; you finish the wall in the company of the Yamato-Tosa school; you go on to make the acquaintance of Jō-setsu and his pupil Shiū-bun, the heroes of a sort of Chinese Renaissance, and that development of it which is called by the name of the master Sesshiū; you are next confronted by the group of painters proceeding from the illustrious Ka-no Masonobu and his sons, who are succeeded in their turn by the whole delightful following of Mata-hei—by the painters and draughtsmen of the Ukiyo-yé Riū, that Popular School which by us of the West was held responsible until quite lately for the whole of Japanese art. Then come examples of Kō-rin and his school, of the Shijō men, who derive their inspiration from the renowned Maru-yama Ō-kio, and of the Ganku painters, whose exemplar and chief, a certain Kishi Dō-kō, died just fifty years ago; and by the time you have made the circuit of the gallery, and have arrived, on the other side of the door from Mr. Franks's collections, at the "Thousand Carp" of the master Ina-gaki—who belongs to no school in particular, but unites, with Shijō qualities of design and a Chinese ideal of colour, "a careful observance of the laws of apparent size in ratio to distance, and an almost scientific conception of high lights and shadow gradations," peculiar, or almost peculiar, to himself—you have traversed something like ten centuries of production and achievement, and in this way have gone the whole round of your subject. Nor is this all. The show-cases on the floor, which are supplementary to those on the wall, with which they correspond as nearly as the shape and size of the gallery will permit, are devoted to a brilliant and taking gathering of examples of the various schools, and especially of the Shijō Academy, which, from material considerations, are unfit for exhibition in the other class. On each and all has Mr. Colvin something to say. His catalogue is, like his exhibition, a model of its kind. It is all, he says, compiled from Mr. Anderson's—from the Pictorial Arts of Japan and the Catalogue of Japanese and Chinese Paintings; but one may read both these, and yet learn something from this little twopenny Guide of Mr. Colvin's. He has order, method, understanding, grasp; he summarizes his material in such a way, and with such an infusion of personal intelligence and sympathy, that he has made the masters of Miako as much his followers and rivals as the men of the Umbrian School.

In the present exhibition of Japanese art the most striking feature is the supremacy of the Chinese. There are not many examples of the art of the Middle Kingdom; and those there are seem scarce beyond suspicion. The Japanese, for one thing, have always been the most dexterous of craftsmen; and, for another, the Japanese have always been the least original and the most conventional—the most addicted to the worship of types and characters, and the least disposed to depart from the clichés imposed upon them by authority, whether of genius or tradition—of artists. Now, as Mr. Colvin asserts—or rather reasserts—in his first sentence, the pictorial arts of Japan are "essentially derivative" from those of China; and, for this reason, the first place in the present exhibition "has been given to specimens of early Chinese painting." Such specimens are rare even in Japan. They have been forged to any extent by artists at once extremely reverent and extremely skilful; and to determine their authenticity is, if not impossible, at least extremely difficult. There are experts, we believe, who are ready at an instant's notice to differentiate between the brushwork of the Emperor Hwei Tsung (that light of the Sung Dynasty!), who flourished 1101–1126, and that of the gifted and admirable Muh-ki, who is also a man of the twelfth century, and that—in the inevitable absence of the thousands of specimens, and of anything like a complete understanding of the innumerable questions, of material and so forth, which must, in such a case, be taken into consideration—by sheer force of conviction. But of these there are not many in England as yet; and Mr. Colvin, following Mr. Anderson's lead, no doubt, is content to describe his first number, "White Eagle on Perch," as "attributed to the Emperor Hwei Tsung." The ascription is quite sufficient. If the thing be original, it is a thing of genius; if it be a copy—and in this case we may take for granted that it is as good a copy, as nearly a facsimile, as hand and eye and brain are capable of achieving—it is still the copy of a thing of genius; and that, for our present purpose, is enough. For, the fact is, this "Eagle" of Hwei Tsung's contains a great deal of Japanese art, and therewith it gives us something which Japanese art does not. In the first place, it is admirably conventional:—it reproduces the marking of the model on a system and in a pattern which were found so sufficient that you may discover, not traces of them, but themselves in all their fulness, in the principal member of the "Thousand Carp" of Ina-gaki, which is close on eight centuries younger. Secondly, combined with this convention which is distinguishable, not only in the feather-pattern of the beast, but also in the drawing of the realities which make him up—his legs, his wings, his head, his neck, and so forth—a sentiment of life, an interest in the personality of the model and an alertness to distinguish and to reproduce its essential characteristics, which is perceptible in a hundred other examples in the room, and remains, when all is said, to the average mind, perhaps the prime feature and the principal attribute of Japanese art. It remains to note that what the Chinese could give, and what the Japanese have seldom been able to conceive, is a certain dignity. We look for that quality in picture after picture, and in drawing after drawing, by native masters; and we find as little trace of it in the stilted and childish work of the Yamato-Tosa Academy as in the inspired and extraordinary calligraphy of Motonobu (62–4), or the wonderful "Tiger" (164) of Kiu-hō Tō-yei, or the incomparable craftsmanship of Hoku-sai (83, 178 83), or the pleasant devilries of Kiō-sai (189 97), or in Ganku's "impressionistic" and terrifying "Tiger at Rest" (119) and the Monkeys (97–9) of the excellent Mori Sosen. This attribute was peculiar to the Chinese of the twelfth century; to the Japanese who have succeeded him it was an unknown quantity. They adopted his conventions of representation and design; they copied his sentiment of life, and in some instances surpassed it; but this quality of dignity—this outward and visible sign of the union of imagination and style—was beyond the reach of their philosophy. For the rest, if we except the humour and characters—the Dickensian touch—which distinguishes the work of the Popular School, the whole of Japanese art may be said to be summarized and exampled in the first ten or twenty numbers of the present exhibition. Among these, with Hwei Tsung's "White Eagle" (1), the "Wild Geese" (2) of Hwui-su, Muh-ki's "Eagle" (3), and the "Crane Settling" (6) of Siang Lang-Lai—all of which belong to the twelfth century, and whose analogues occur all over the room—are the "Philosopher and Disciples" (10) of Si-kin Kü-tsze, in which "the drawing of the heads is marked" (as Mr. Colvin well says) by such "extraordinary individuality and precision" as we may look for in vain (it is scarce too much to assert) in any of the masters of Japan. This remark holds good in the case of certain "Paintings, probably Chinese"—"An Arhat and an Apsara" (11), and "The Arhat Vimalakîrrti" (13)—by which this section of the exhibition is completed. The last is in especial remarkable. Boldly drawn and perfectly suggested, the face of Vimalakîrrti is obviously an idealised rendering of life; it gives the characteristics of age, intelligence, intensity of sentiment, and vigour of will with rare directness and force; the convention by which the aspect of the hair and beard and eyebrows is rendered has much in common with that adopted in similar cases by (to bring the matter near home) Professor Legros. To such a capacity of individualization as is manifest in this and some other numbers in this section the Japanese, as the collection shows, have never attained. Their art is gay, decorative, fantastic, sensuous to a degree; in craftsmanship they have not, that we know, been equalled. But in the intellectual quality of art they are some stages of development in rear of the Chinese, to whom, as we have seen, are due the principles on which their artistic achievement is based, and to whom they are indebted for examples of practice and theory beyond which, in seven or eight hundred years of effort, they have not been able to pass.

The section of Butsu-yé is small but choice; it includes an example of the excellent Chō Densu and—in "The Thirteen Buddhas" (15), the "Amitâbha and Bôdissatvas" (16), and "The Amitâbha Trinity" (18), the first of the fifteenth and the second and third of the eighteenth centuries—some brilliant and splendid essays in decoration. The Yamato-Tosa school may best be studied in the cases on the floor, in which Mr. Colvin, with a feeling for romance which does him infinite credit, has arranged a vast series of drawings (134–57), illustrative of the legend of the hero Raikō and a monster of the most fiendish and dreadful type, known in the Land of the Rising Sun as the Shiūten Dōji, and to which we may one day return. In the next section are particularly to be remarked the noble "Chinese Landscape" (34) of Shiū-bun, which reminds one of Gaspar Poussin, the admirable "Cat, Plants, and Insects" (41), the several examples of Tan-i Bun-chō (47–9), the charming "Chinese Lady and Monkeys" (56) of Saku-rai Shiū-zen, Nam-mei's imposing and gorgeous portrait of a lady of too much reputation (57), and the superb and delightful "Buzzard" (58) of the same distinguished master, which may be compared with Hwei Tsung's "White Eagle," and the brilliant examples of the same genre left by Tan-i Bun-chō. All the Sesshiūs are worth noting; so among the Ka-no pictures are Motonobu's heroic portrait of the Rishi Chung-li K'üan (62), Tan-yu's magnificent "Storm Dragon" (67), the delightful "Hundred Cranes" (71) of Ten-shin, and Koré-nobu's astonishing "Flying Squirrel" (73); so of the Ukiyo-yî Itiū, are two capital examples of Hana-busa Itchō (80, 81), the dreadful "Ghost" of Chokusai (82), some six or seven Hoku-sai (83, 178–183), and a pleasant essay in romance signed Hiro-shigé (85), in which, for a wonder, the human sentiment of the situation is better rendered than the landscape. In the Kō-rin section, with a characteristic and disappointing example of the master himself, are the noble "Bamboos" (90) of Ki-itsu and a wonderful drawing—one of twenty-three—of "Tortoises on the March" (89) by the master To-nan. Coming to the Shijō men we are confronted with a set of artists—from Ō-kio, the founder, to Kiō-sai, his latest disciple—whom we have not space to catalogue, and from whose work we shall single out no more than Yō-sai's masterly "Hadósu killing the Korean Tiger" (110), Tō-yei's superb "Tiger among Rocks" (104), the flying mallards and tit-mice of Kei-bun, and Yū-sei's magnificent "Pea-fowl and Pine-tree" (105). Of the Ganku Academy we shall only note that, to say nothing of tiger and monkey subjects by Ganku himself and his son Gan-tai, it is represented by a pair of "Chinese Landscapes" (123, 124) by Gan-bun-shin, which suggest the Sesshiū on the opposite wall, and by a "Lake Biwa" (125) and a "Moonlight Scene near Kioto" (127), which remind us of Mr. Whistler. To those with eyes to see these two couples of pictures, both the work of painters of the present century, are in some sort typical of Japanese art.

FRENCH PLAYS.

M. A. BISSON'S comedy-farce, Le Député de Bombignac, which is the original of The Candidate, is, we are inclined to think, less amusing than the version of it which was produced at the Criterion and achieved so much popularity. There is certainly plenty of wit in M. Bisson's dialogue, and it is wit of a higher order than any that was introduced into the English play, which, however, was considerably elaborated, and seemed to us to have been altogether the gayer piece. The chief interest attached to the French performance at the Royalty consisted in the means which it afforded us of contrasting Mr. Charles Wyndham and M. Coquelin's different ways of interpreting the same character. M. Coquelin has the distinction of having created the part at the Théâtre Français some years ago—where, by the way, the authorities were by no means inclined to tolerate this comedy being produced at all, on account of its flimsy nature. We prefer Mr. Wyndham to M. Coquelin in this particular character. His light figure, mercurial temperament, and nervous impetuosity enabled him, as it were, to lift the equivocal deceptions which he is practising upon his wife and mother-in-law into the realms of fancy, where they cannot be judged after the ordinary standard of morality. M. Coquelin, on the other hand, by playing the part in a heavier key, brings it down to the level of everyday life, and we feel less inclined to deal leniently with the erring député, because he looks so like an ordinary bon bourgeois going off to Paris deliberately to enjoy himself naughtily. For all this, however, M. Coquelin's Chantelaur is a remarkably even performance, and he displays his unforced humour to perfection, giving each line its proper effect without in the least degree appearing to do so. Mme. Patry played the part of the Marquise de Cernais admirably, and this character is a far better one than the Lady Dorothy of Primrose League fame in the English play. Mme.

de Cernais is represented as a Royalist more Monarchical than the King, and as a Catholic more Papal than the Pope. She has converted the Armoury into a chapel, and her servants' knees ache from their constant application to prayers. In short, the whole house is turned by her savage bigotry into a sort of monastery, which excuses and explains her son-in-law's escapades. M. Jean Coquelin played the part Mr. Giddens made popular at the Criterion. He is very young, and, as we have already said on a previous occasion, shows distinct talent and the possession of considerable experience, but he is perhaps too boyish for such a character as this. He was better on a previous evening as the old Marquis de la Seiglière, which he played with pathos. He has manifest versatility and the making of a fine actor. Mme. Lemercier had very little to do, but acted, as she always does, charmingly; and Mlle. Kerwich was sympathetic as Renée, another of the numerous poor parts with which this play abounds.

The second novelty which has been produced at the Royalty within the past week—Octave Feuillet's Chamillac—is a curious play, which, if did not contain such well written dialogue, atoning for the slightness of its story, would certainly not have been tolerated for a single night, for the whole five acts do not boast sufficient material for two. The plot has been detailed by the morning papers, and, therefore, need not be reproduced. There is one situation, however, which is so singular that we cannot help particularizing it. It occurs in the fifth act, in a scene in which the General de la Bartherie forces Chamillac to relate in full to his daughter, with whom the young man is in love, the particulars of a disgraceful episode of his youth, which has blighted his entire career. There is no reason why this act of cruelty should be imposed upon the man whom the General absolutely intends to be his son-in-law. The relation of Chamillac's early misdeed has nothing to do with Mme. de Tryas, and the three principal personages in the play are by it put in a false position. The General, who has hitherto been shown as Chamillac's benefactor and a gallant old soldier, is now a savage tyrant, the lady is forced to listen to what must shock her, and the hero is made to degrade himself before his fiancée for no apparent purpose. The confession is one of the longest speeches in French dramatic literature, and it does M. Coquelin credit to say that he related it in a manner so touching and with such dignity, that it was not only listened to with attention, but made us forget and forgive the false position in which he and his colleagues had been placed. Throughout M. Coquelin played admirably. He had very little comedy, but wherever there was a cynical or humorous speech to deliver, he gave it in the best possible manner. Another excellent piece of acting was displayed in this piece by Mme. Lemercier as the heroine.

CHEAP LIQUOR.

THERE is no better example than wine of the axiom that it is more profitable to sell at a low price a large quantity of a commodity which costs little than to sell at a high price a small quantity of what is expensively prepared and long kept. The initial cost of alcoholic drinks is small—the care and skill required in the management of young wines, the years which must elapse before any wine or spirit can be ripe enough to be wholesome, the interest of capital, the rent, insurance, losses from evaporation, leakage, and other mischances, accumulating during those years, form the main elements of cost. Nothing but the slow process of age will bring such commodities to maturity. No royal road to it has yet been discovered. Extremes of heat and cold applied to wines, electricity and saccharine applied to spirits, have met with very meagre success, or have failed entirely.

Still the demand for cheapness, which in these times amounts to a rage, has of course created a supply. The readiest way to meet this demand is that adopted by our Continental neighbours—namely, simple adulteration. Much cognac is manufactured in Hamburg from potatoes. Port and sherry which owe their existence more to Elbe water than to grape-juice form staple articles of export from that enterprising city. The fabrication of Kunstwein is still a thriving industry of the Rhine, notwithstanding the efforts of the German Government to protect the legitimate wine-growers. The husks of grapes which have already yielded their juice are steeped in a watery solution of saccharine matter resembling in appearance white soap, which is obtained in any quantity by treating vegetable starch with mineral acids. This liquor is easily adjusted to the requisite colour and alcoholic strength, and the flavour of genuine grape-juice is closely imitated, and, to some tastes, excelled, by a skilful operator. When clarified, neatly bottled, and labelled with the name of some well-known growth, it is ready for the consumer. Unlike the real article it does not improve with age, but the reverse. This trade has been pushed with such energy that there are places in Germany, and especially in Austria, where the public taste is so accustomed to false wine, that the genuine article is regarded with [illegible]. We need not cross the Channel to find proof that the [illegible] can be thus depraved with preternatural sugar and [illegible].

A [illegible] of the matter is the desire of the average wine-buyer to be [illegible]. Like the drowning Welshman he [illegible] the [illegible] and declares that he will be imposed [illegible] and nobody shall [illegible]. The wish for cheapness being [illegible] the [illegible] he is the more easily leavened with the [illegible] literature of Bacchus so copiously poured into his letter-box throughout the year, so that when asked a fair price for well-made and well-matured liquor he is ready to think himself overcharged. No country is so well supplied as England with good wines at moderate prices, but the public generally will not drink many of the best cheap wines under their own names. An honest and wholesome red wine from Northern Spain must be christened Médoc to have any chance against a real Médoc, thin and poor, and intrinsically of much less value. A respectable bourgeois claret must figure under the name of some château, although the real château wine of the same vintage may be an inferior article. Within the last five years numbers of glens have been placed upon the register of trade-marks, which are not only innocent of barley-bree, but many of which are not to be found on the map of Scotland.

But the British purveyor of cheapness, however enterprising, is a less adroit manipulator than his foreign rival. Our laws against the falsification of consumables are also an obstacle. Still there are three courses open to him. He may subtract a good deal from the length and cost of keep; he may save a trifle in the capacity of his bottles; and in the minimum alcoholic strength at which spirits may be legally sold he may find room for further economy. The greenness of grape-juice little advanced beyond the mosto stage is not readily detected in these cigarette-smoking days, and the acetous fermentation which impedes its digestion in most stomachs is not always attributed to its true cause. Scotch whisky requires at least four years, and Irish whisky six years, before the fusel oil in them becomes disintegrated and loses its mischievous properties. Yet the total quantity of whisky now in stock in this country does not exceed three years' consumption. The fieriness of young whisky may be softened with a dose of syrup, but the iniquity of the unsubdued fusel oil remains in it still.

Many an honest wine-merchant of the old school has given up the contest in disgust; whilst others, obliged to continue the struggle for business, submit with a groan to the cry for cheapness, and send out half-matured liquors against their own better judgment. North of the Tweed the twelve-tumbler man is said to be extinct. What wonder, when the material of which he made his toddy seems now to have acquired the gift of perennial youth! South of the Tweed the three-bottle man has passed away; but with him has also vanished the thoroughly fermented grape-juice, patiently matured through long years into dry, soft, old wine, properly so called. It is not so much the quantity as the quality of his potation that brings the dram-drinker into trouble; it is not so much the mixture of wines as the mixture of immature grape-juice that tells upon the modern diner-out. What wonder if we see men not yet past middle age crippled with gout and rheumatism—maladies which did not always overtake their grandfathers even later in life, and after what might appear to us severe provocation.

RECENT CONCERTS.

UNQUESTIONABLY the most interesting event of the present musical season so far has been the production of Brahms's Concerto in A Minor for violin and violoncello, given for the first time at the London Symphony Concert on the 15th of last month. It was again given on February 21, the soloists on each occasion being Herr Joachim and Herr Hausmann. Like all the productions of Brahms, it gains greatly on a second hearing. This is especially true concerning the first movement, to which scant justice has been done in most of the notices which have hitherto appeared. Rich and generous in conception, full of unflagging energy and ingenuity in its setting forth, it seems to us fit to stand at the head of all the composer's works. The second movement, in which the wood-wind plays an important part, is of great beauty, and in its delicate simplicity affords a valuable contrast to the strong and thoughtful elaboration of the Allegro. The Finale opening in A Minor is vivid and animated at its beginning, but betrays some evidence of a fatigued imagination and a loosening grasp towards the conclusion, which is distinctly the least satisfactory part of the Concerto, in spite of the remarkable brilliance of much of the scoring. The bassoons and horns are used in a most delightful and original manner, and the orchestration throughout abounds in genius and knowledge. We have never heard Herr Joachim to greater perfection than on the occasion of the second performance of this Concerto, when the orchestra acquitted itself of its task in a far more satisfactory manner than at the first hearing. The greatest praise is due to Herr Hausmann for his thoroughly artistic performance throughout. The first production of Brahms's latest work was preceded by the overture to St. Paul, carefully played by the orchestra, and followed by Haydn's Symphony in C, played with a certain lack of discriminating refinement which somewhat jarred upon the ample spirit of joyousness with which the work is inspired. Schumann's "Gartenmelodie" and "Am Springbrunnen" were played in the highest perfection by Herr Joachim on the same occasion, when he also played the "Abendlied" as he only can play it. We wish that Herr Hausmann had chosen some more interesting motive for the display of his skill than Max Bruch's dreary and commonplace "[illegible]," in which somnolence all too willing is made [illegible]. The concert was brought to a close by [illegible] March from [illegible]. On February [illegible] Herr [illegible] and Herr Hausmann were respectively heard in Spohr's "Adagio from the Concerto in D minor" and Boccherini's "Adagio and Allegro in A," the programme including Beethoven's overture, Zur Weihe des Hauses—a work of delight and beauty which is not given as often as it should be—a commonplace and colourless "Serenade in F for strings," by Volkmann, and the ballad for orchestra, "The Ship o' the Fiend," excellently conducted by the composer. This is indubitably a work of very great promise, earnest in purpose, imaginative, and straightforward in execution. There is perhaps an over-tendency to repetition in it; but it is inventive and thoughtful throughout, and singularly free from the callow licentiousness of orchestration so often to be met with in the works of young composers. The London Symphony Concert given on February 29th opened with the "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" Overture, which on every successive hearing seems more perfectly fitted for its original purpose of being performed by a band at a bath establishment. It was followed by the second performance during this season of Liszt's much-abused but interesting "Todtentanz," of which we must confess that the music is far more suggestive of Parisian art than of the mighty series of pictures at Basle. It is needless to say that the pianoforte part was played faultlessly and with true feeling by Mr. Fritz Hartvigson, and we have never heard Mr. Henschel's orchestra to greater advantage. This made the rendering of the "Pastoral Symphony" which followed the more disappointing. It is not too much to say that it was throughout perfunctory and unfeeling; neither can we bestow anything but blame upon the haphazard and noisy performance of the overture to The Flying Dutchman, with which the concert ended. Between these two painful experiences Berlioz's "Duo Nocturne" from Béatrice et Benédict came as a refreshing rain; it was on all hands admirably executed throughout; it would be impossible to praise Mrs. Henschel's singing too much, and she could hardly have found a more charming second than Miss Marguerite Hall. The music of this delicate scene, with its subtle suggestions of opalescent light and colour, and the exquisitely unobtrusive feeling of its dramatic orchestral accompaniment, claims one of the foremost places among the most happily inspired productions of Berlioz. The present season of Mr. Henschel's concerts closed on Tuesday last with a performance of Mr. Cowen's Fifth Symphony—of Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso"—the March from the Götterdämmerung, and the "Ride of the Walkyries." We noticed Mr. Cowen's Symphony when it was given at the Richter Concerts last summer, and we cannot say that it gains upon us on a second hearing. Liszt's "Tasso," perhaps the most satisfactory of all his orchestral compositions, was remarkably well played by the orchestra under Mr. Henschel, who gave proof of real fire and command of his band in working up to the impassioned finale, which was given with genuine dash and spirit. The "Trauermarsch" was also distinctly well rendered, howbeit it was taken a little too slow—a rare fault with Mr. Henschel in conducting Wagner. The orchestra came well through the trying ordeal of the "Ritt," although the strings might have been more precise in their attack with advantage, bringing the last concert of the series to a close with an excellent performance. Mr. Henschel has shown that he can do much, and we hope for more from him during the forthcoming season.

The concert given by the Bach Choir on March 1st was rendered chiefly interesting by the first appearance of Fräulein Marie Soldat, who, with a perfectly justified confidence, chose Brahms's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra for her début before a London public. We have hardly ever heard it better played. To a thoroughly artistic feeling and great and already matured power Fräulein Soldat adds remarkable beauty and justice of tone, especially in the middle and lower register, her upper notes, as is not unfrequently the case with Herr Joachim's pupils, being somewhat weaker. Anything but well accompanied by the band, she played more than excellently throughout, and could hardly, even under more favourable circumstances, have given a more brilliant and reassuring promise for the future. The Bach Choir deserves our warmest praise for having brought forward Purcell's opera of Dido and Æneas; but we can hardly commend its members for the fashion in which they presented it. Upon all concerned in its production an evil spirit of dulness seemed to have descended. That most detestable of all English musical abuses, the "Handelian tradition," by which such of the works of the great master as are ever given in this country are so hideously disfigured, appeared to be rampant, dragging the most impassioned passages of the dramatic music of a great composer as far as possible down to the level of dreary commonplace. Miss Anna Williams, Miss Thudichum, and Mr. Thorndike deserve praise for their efforts to instil life into the general mass of inertness and apathy which surrounded them. Mr. Stanford's Elegiac Ode to Mr. Walt Whitman's words was also tamely given—we still feel a disappointing falling-off at its conclusion from the considerable promise with which it begins. The "Schluss-Chor zum Fest-spiel," from Beethoven's Weihe des Hauses, brought the concert to an end. It is curiously inferior to the overture to the same work which we have already noticed.

A BALLAD OF PARLIAMENTARY BURDENS.

(With apologies to Mr. Swinburne.)

THE burden of long speeches. Men shall smite,
  With many words, the brass-bound box and red
Upon the Speaker's left, and on his right
  With yet more words, till the third hour hath fled
  And thy heart fail for very dreariheed,
  And thy pulse flags, and all thy senses tire
  And cry aloud "Let fewer words be said!
This is the end of every man's desire."

The burden of vain questions. One shall ask
  Who voted for the guardians of Rathrogue,
Who spanked the boy at Ballywhiskycask,
  Who mocked the parish-priest of Scullabogue?
  And thou, while with the buzzing of the brogue
Burneth thine ear as with a burning fire
  Shalt say "Suppress this monopolylogue!
That is the end of every man's desire."

The burden of "fad" motions. Mr. This Claims Wednesday, and with paper-laden hat
On Friday evening next as ever is Down to the House will come Sir Simon That.
  Thou listening to the common-places flat
Poured forth for weak constituents to admire
  Shalt soothly say: "To stop this idle chat
Should be the end of every man's desire."

The burden of the bumptious. C-nyb—re
  Shall be a rod to scourge thee, and a rasp
For thy uneven patience, and the fear
  Of St-art shall constrain thee as a clasp;
  And P-ck-rsg-ll shall sting thee as an asp,
And weave around thee many a wordy spire,
  Till thou shalt deem that freedom from that grasp
Must be the end of every man's desire.

The burden of divisions. Endless flows,
  This way and that disparted, the slow stream
Towards the lobbies of the Ayes and Noes, Until thyself unto thyself thou seem
  A shadow among shadows of a dream;
And roused at length by voices as of wire,
  Thou murmur "To retrench this waste of steam
Should be the end of every man's desire."

The burden of disorder. Billingsgate
  Shall ope her fishy jaws, and one shall cry
Aloud "Thou liar!" whereto another straight
  Shall render a participled reply;
  And when the Chair itself takes by-and-bye
To calling names, thou, as the named retire,
  May'st well exclaim, "And doth this satisfy?
Is this the end of every man's desire?"

ENVOI.

First Lord and Leader! these thy rules are good;
  But several pegs thou'lt have to screw them higher
If thou wouldst compass what is understood
  To be the end of honest men's desire.

REVIEWS.

SELECTIONS FROM THE BOMBAY RECORDS.*

THE first volume of the Bombay Records, reviewed in this journal in August 1886, was an improvement on the Minutes of Mount Stuart Elphinstone, noticed in August 1884. And in this further instalment of the administrative papers of the same Presidency Mr. Forrest has made a second step in advance. The selection has been uniformly judicious. The editing is careful. And if there is a little repetition here and there, this will enable the student of manners and customs to be quite certain that he does not depend on an isolated fact and on a single row of figures for any adornments and illustrations of history. When readers are allowed to pick and choose, superfluity is better than deficiency. We shall divide this publication into three parts, though the editor is not to be blamed for not adopting any such design:—1. Political manifestoes, treaties, and correspondence with the French, Portuguese, Dutch, and Nawabs. 2. Commercial statistics, price-lists, notices of products, and shipments. 3. Episodes and incidents of social life. A very fair analysis of the whole is to be found in an introduction, by the editor, of some fifty pages.

The political papers are sometimes new, generally important, and almost always calculated to throw some light on disputed and critical points in the early history of English adventure. It may be new to some readers that the old East India Company, founded in the time of Elizabeth, was very nearly ruined by a rival Company that started about 1698, and was styled the English Company; as if it had not been enough for the first traders to contend against the jealousy of the Dutch, the hostility of the French, the caprices of Nawabs, and the raids of Sevaji and his Mahratta hordes. Sir Nicolas Waite, President of the new Company, arrived at Bombay in 1700, was promptly ordered off by Sir John Gayer, the President in possession, sailed up to Surat, and tried threats and cajolery in vain. At last Sir Nicolas resorted to the mean expedient of hinting to the native Governor of the place that the chiefs of the old Company were likely to leave the Settlement without paying their just debts. And on this Sir John Gayer, who had very injudiciously left the Presidency and followed his rival to Surat, was seized and confined for some months. Lady Gayer was dragged out of bed. Sir John was ordered to turn Mussulman. The rivalry between the two Companies lasted for some years, and when Sir Nicolas, tired of the contest, resigned the office of Governor of Bombay, a "very unhealthful island," he had by that time very nearly managed to ruin himself and his rivals. It was not till 1715 that Dr. Hamilton, who had cured the Emperor of Delhi of a troublesome disorder, procured a new firman for settlers in Bengal and Bombay. On other occasions Englishmen quarrelled with the Portuguese. An English sergeant was "murthered" in cold blood, and an Armada was fitted out at Goa. In an affray with the Dutch, two Englishmen, who had only sticks, were slain by swords; and in the inquiry which ensued the Commandore or Directore of the Netherlandish Company was so perverse as to prefer the word of a Parsi witness or a heathen to that of two Christian gentlemen. The English version of the riot was that the chyrurgeon of the Dutch ship challenged the Englishman to fight, and then, with a companion, fell on his adversary and "thrust him into the belly with his rapier, whereof in short tyme he died." But a more alarming dispute arose with the French Consul. This gentleman was ordered by the Nawab of Surat to take down a wooden staircase leading from the French gardens to the river Tapti, which, he alleged, had been erected for purposes of convenience and to allow the residents, in Oriental phrase, "to eat air" in the neighbourhood of water. It was also useful "to procure to my wife and family and all honest people this convenience to descend to the river side, without the danger of falling with the earth and wounding themselves." The original complaint was swelled by stories of violence on the part of the Nawab's servants, who "looted his garden and put some Frenchmen and natives to the sword." Things looked very warlike, but the English Council had no difficulty in clearly showing that no damage whatever had been done beyond the removal of the obnoxious staircase; that no blood had been shed; and that M. Anquetil de Briancourt was a pestilent fellow who kept spies about him, and was in treaty with the French Consul at Poona, the Mahratta Generals, and some of the Nawab's Jemadars, to introduce Mahratta troops into the city, set it on fire, and murder the English. So the injured Frenchman was shipped off to his own country. This ludicrous quarrel, with the English translation of lengthy French letters hardly veiling the absurd expressions of the originals, the traitorous papers found in the ex-Consul's possession, the plans of the city and fortress, the protests, rejoinders, and rebutters, take up nearly thirty pages of print, eminently characteristic of Gallic pretensions, sturdy British resistance, and true knowledge of the native character.

Even in those early times there was no want of communication, irregular and tedious, with other Settlements in India and Persia. There were frequent despatches to Gombroon and the Persian Gulf. News came from Madras of th glorious victory of Coote at Wandewash; of fighting near Patna between the English and the troops of the Vizier; of the conspicuous talents of the adventurer called Somers, but who is evidently the ruffian Sumroo or Sombre; of the cession of the Dewani of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa to Clive in August 1765; of the capture of Madras by the French under La Bourdonnais in 1746; and of divers other sieges and military operations on the coast and in the interior. A very pithy account of the Black Hole is given in a letter from a private gentleman living at Chinsurah, dated October 2, 1756, or more than three months after the catastrophe. The well-known tragedy is summed up in the following words:—"On the surrender of the Fort the Nawab had confined all the prisoners in close warehouse, where most of them perished either from want of air or from noisome vapours." We may be thankful that the terrible Special Correspondent had not then been invented. In all these episodes of our early struggles, defeats, reprisals, treatment of prisoners, captures of pirates, cessions of forts, Imperial firmans, victories in the field, victories in diplomacy, it is interesting to see how each event struck the contemporary chronicler. Jeffrey, we think, or rather Lockhart himself, excuses the republication of original criticisms on Scott's first poems by observing that a later generation who saw the sun in its meridian splendour may like to know how it looked when just appearing above the horizon. With rare exceptions, our countrymen seem to us never to have been unduly elated by cession and conquest or unduly depressed by disaster and defeat.

We now turn to a few commercial statistics. These pioneers of empire never forgot that their honourable masters sent them to the East to trade, and not to gain territory. Some of the letters to the Court of Directors are filled with information about the scarcity or abundance of turmeric, saltpetre, stick lack, aloes, and myrrh. Then we have a request for a surgery chest, ink, paper, quills, and black-lead pens; for tables of the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Creed "in letters all of gold," and the name of God written in as many Eastern languages as possible; an apprehension of the rise of all sorts of goods for Europe, owing to the disastrous competition of the French and Dutch; an omission in the bill of lading of the ship Massingbird, for which credit is entreated; a complaint of the inadequacy of the mercantile fleet, both as regards the number of ships and the amount of tonnage; the misconduct of one Robert Master, commander of the Sea Flower, who brought his vessel back from Carwar "without a single corne of Pepper," though there was enough at that port to fill a whole ship; a solemn admonition given to sundry writers on the establishment because they objected to do duty as sentinels over the Company's warehouses and goods; long lists of articles to be had in the year 1780, from bamboos, baskets, and bunting, down to vermilion, verdigrease, and wax cloth; an account of the various agricultural products of more than thirty Pergunnahs or Hundreds in the Province of Surat, such as would not discredit the Collectors of the year 1888; the fees of the Mayor's Court; the rate of interest charged by the Bank on loans made to the Council; the native mode of raising revenue in Surat, from the Land-tax, the Customs, the Octroi, and, alas! for Canon Farrar, from the sale of toddy or arrack; a prohibition against the export of grain from the town of Broach, unless the price should fall below a certain standard; and the exchange of the rupee with the now mythical and fabulous half-crown. All this could be prolonged indefinitely, but revelations of social life are worth more than commercial statistics.

That some handsome fortunes were made in India during the eighteenth century is undeniable; but these diaries and letters prove that they must have been made in Bengal or Madras. The scale of salaries was not only low but ludicrously insufficient, considering the climate and the mode of living. The President in Council had 300*l.* a year; the members, 100*l.* and less; and the minor officials from 30*l.* to 40*l.* It is perfectly true that these pittances were supplemented by what are termed "Free Gifts" conferred by the Directors in England. These often amounted to good round sums. Members of Council got more than 1,800 rupees each; chaplains the same; the Commander-in-Chief, 7,272 rupees; and the President or Governor, 12,121 rupees. To these some other additions were made from accumulations of the Dewani—in other words, from the land or general revenue of the country. In many cases the apportionment of this unappropriated sum to chaplains, senior merchants, and others equalled the amount of the Free Gift. Still the officials at Bombay were not satisfied. They contrasted their own emoluments unfavourably with the larger salaries of the Bengal merchants who drew 1,200 rupees a month, and with those of military men who received batta and had the chances of prize-money; and yet in a body they all refused to exchange their position for posts at Calcutta. It will no doubt be said that salaries were not the only means of livelihood, and that considerable fortunes were made in mercantile ventures which the servants of the old Company were either encouraged or were not forbidden to pursue. Here, again, the severe financial critic's mouth is shut, or his arguments at least are anticipated, by long memorials and by concise biographies of merchants, councillors, warehousekeepers, and factors, which show that private speculations were only in a few cases attended with success. A list of 186 gentlemen who for thirty-five years—that is, from 1743 to 1777—had served in the Bombay Presidency, tells the following sad tale. Of a considerable number it is recorded that they had "died insolvent in India," or had "been ruined by trade," or had lived on a pension from the Company. Some were worth 500*l.*, 6,000*l.*, 20,000*l.*, or 28,000*l.* A few had benefited by legacies or marriage. One had made money while Chief at Gombroon or Bunder Abbass. Another, who had been Governor for five years, possessed a large fortune; and of another it is said, with a sly sense of satire, that he went to Bengal on a visit to Mr. Verelst (the Governor), resided there some time, much improved his fortune, and went home in 1768. A footnote adds that in twenty-two years only three gentlemen and Mr. Stevenson—an outsider or Free Merchant, we presume—had gone home with fortunes. Very likely the official, tied down to his desk and his invoices, gave up to the Company time and talents which were meant for himself. But it is more probable that the officials were the victims of their own ignorance and rashness or of native duplicity. In other matters they were not handsomely treated. With some difficulty they were allowed to have a sombrero or large umbrella, an allowance for house rent, and twelve or fourteen rupees for the monthly hire of bearers and a palanquin. Some state was kept up by the President, who walked abroad, not with the caparisoned elephants of Warren Hastings, but with macebearers, trumpeters, and retinue. And on Christmas and New Year's festivities there was expended the very respectable sum of 1,100 rupees. But life must have been hard in those days with the climate, the small pay, the rivalry of European competitors, the duplicity of native viceroys, and the piracies of Angria.

Indian society, though by no means of the kind depicted in screaming farces and rubbishy tales, is liable to be convulsed periodically by social squabbles. The Sabbatarian zeal of the Rev. Mr. Cobbe, Chaplain at the Presidency, led him to affront Mr. Bradyll, Member of Council, at the Communion Table and in other places, because the latter gentleman had employed native workmen for repairing his house on a Sunday. Mr. Bradyll pleaded, not unreasonably, that it was necessary to secure and furnish his house before the bursting of the monsoon, to which the rev. gentleman replied, that he didn't care if "all the houses in town were washed away, provided no work was done on Sundays." Hot words and hotter letters passed. The matter was taken up by the President, and the affair ended by the suspension of the hot-headed chaplain, who was obdurate, and would neither forgive nor be forgiven. Mr. Waters, who was a good reader and apparently not in orders, was appointed to read prayers and sermons, and a passage to England was soon found for the suspended chaplain. Troublesome individuals, whether in the service or out of it, were liable to the same penalty. And it is not easy to see how order and discipline could be maintained except by the discretional exercise of some such power. Punishments in the Mayor's Court were of the kind common in the reign of the two first Georges. Courts-martial sentenced soldiers to six and eight hundred lashes. A native courtesan was moderately whipped; and in the seventeenth century a woman found guilty of petty treason in murdering her husband was sentenced to be burnt. Communications with England were often carried on by the Persian Gulf and Aleppo. It must have been a signal triumph when a post was established by land between Bombay and Madras, which runners were ready to convey in twenty-five days. The Company's servants were forbidden to practice as attorneys in the Mayor's Court, or to deal in grain on their own account. Their linguistic attainments must have been of the most elementary kind, to judge by the extraordinary spelling of native names and the metamorphoses of native terms, but one Ensign Hiern had made such a marvellous progress in the country language—it may have been Urdu, Mahratta, or Guzarati—that he was given an additional allowance for the term of nine months, to date from his arrival in India.

We have no space for an analysis of some papers which ought to be studied from beginning to end. Of this kind is the account of a Durbar where General McLeod held converse with Tippoo; a diary of an Englishman who resided at Carmenia, or Kirman, in Persia, and witnessed the frightful excesses of Nadir Shah, when he blinded and slew his subjects by scores; and a diary of one Mr. Herbert, who was sent from Balumbangan, an island to the north of Borneo, on an embassy to the Sultan of Bremei in the latter island. Mr. Forrest has wisely had recourse to Colonel Yule's excellent Glossary for the explanation of divers enigmas and puzzles, and he has added other notes which might have been multiplied with advantage. We have been left to make out that Ophgoons stands for Afghans, Codgee for the Kazi, Caphelas for Kafila (caravan), Hawab for Abwab, an extra cess or benevolence; jezari for jazailchi, a matchlock man; Chopper for Chapar, the Persian term for riding-post; Pillow for Pulao, the dish of that name; and there are divers other conundrums. What is meant by the people in the Boohspohos, who were with difficulty prevented from writing 2,000 tomans as a sum to be paid by worthy Mr. Graves, or what were the villanies and baseness of Tockorseo (Takagi, a Mahratta?), we can only guess. Mr. Forrest has not given us a very copious index, though he has afforded us much amusement and instruction.

ATHLETICS AND FOOTBALL.*

THE "Badminton Library" volume on athletics and football is thoroughly worthy of the subjects with which it deals. It is hard to imagine any higher tribute to its merits, for the subjects in question are rightly regarded with a high degree of interest by an enormous number of Englishmen, and yet they are by no means easy to deal with satisfactorily. There are plenty of books on football, and nearly all of them may be read with profit and pleasure by any intelligent student of that noble pastime, but few of them are really good books. However large the space at the author's disposal, he has not room enough for the materials which crowd upon his memory and imagination. The personal reminiscences of any ardent player would fill a couple of large volumes. The theoretic speculations of a reflective student would be with difficulty compressed into a third. And a thorough treatment of the historical aspect of the game would be likely to lead to an excursus equal in bulk to all the rest put together. The treatise of a mere tiro on one only of the games comprised under the generic name of football might extend to many hundreds of pages, and abound with more or less entertaining details. There exists a temptation, rarely resisted, to encumber the work with obvious and wholly unnecessary moralizations on the similarity of the game of football to the game of life, and on the desirability (which no one denies) of good-fellowship, unselfishness, self-restraint, and British pluck. Mr. Shearman is ardent, reflective, and learned in the history and traditions of the game; and he has nevertheless contrived within the compass of a single volume to combine an exhaustive discussion of almost every species of football with a complete and instructive treatise on athletics. The book is clearly and brightly written. Every page of it deserves careful study. No important topic is omitted. It would be hard to detect a superfluous paragraph. The ignorant may learn from it all that they are capable of knowing; while athletes and football-players will read it from cover to cover with keen and unmixed delight.

Athletic sports are an institution of modern times. Though foot-races and trials of strength were common wherever mankind really flourished from the times of Homer to those of Captain Barclay, the institution of college sports and school sports, the foundation of athletic clubs, and the movement which culminated in the establishment of the Amateur Athletic Association, date from no more than forty years ago. The topic of athletics is, therefore, a limited one. All that Mr. Shearman had to do was to ransack the records of four decades, and so to compress and systematize his spoils as to produce a readable summary. The first athletic meeting on record was held at Exeter College, Oxford, in 1850. Its promoters had probably little idea of the important movement which they were inaugurating. The card was arranged to look as much as possible like those published at Doncaster or Newmarket; the joke of regarding the competitors as horses was kept up in various ways; the odds against the favourites were scientifically ascertained, and were apparently freely taken and offered. But, while the form of the day's sport only awoke transient amusement, its substance proved to be a fertile example. Other colleges appointed days for a series of foot races; jumping and the hurling of weights were included in the programmes; Cambridge followed the example of Oxford; inter-University contests began to take place; and the public woke up to the merits of a way of taking exercise which was as cheap and easy as it was delightful, and which afforded a regular pastime for the odd moments of busy men, and an opportunity for public gatherings of an exhilarating and entertaining character.

The holding of athletic meetings developed gradually. New contests were tried, and rejected or adopted as the case might be, by the mass of athletic clubs. The art of time-taking and the science of record-keeping received attention. Individual athletes excited universal interest. Their progress from "record" to "record" was anxiously watched, and the great meetings at Lillie Bridge were attended by thousands of keenly interested spectators and by hundreds of intelligent and experienced critics. Athletics became what cricket and rowing already were, and what football was destined soon afterwards to become—a national sport. The story of this development is admirably told by Mr. Shearman, who has himself played no mean part in it. His account of individual athletes and their doings is extremely full, accurate, and lively. It is interesting to note in detail the gradual improvement which has taken place in almost every branch of athletics. In some the advance has been almost continuous, the "record" moving on from year to year, inch by inch, or second by second. In others, a single athlete has distanced all previous efforts at a bound, and his successors have found it impossible, for years together, to reach the point which he had attained. But they generally do it in the end. Very few of the existing records are of longer standing than a year or two. Brooks's great jump of 6 feet 2½ inches stood its ground for about ten years, and the celebrated quarter-mile record of Colbeck was unbeaten for thirteen years. It has been surpassed several times of late years; but, if Colbeck had not run into a sheep and broken its leg in the course of his best performance, his name might perhaps still stand second on the list. It is a pity, by the way, that Mr. Shearman, who usually writes English, nearly always speaks of Myers as a "phenomenal" runner, and uses the word "phenomenon" as the last epithet in his storehouse of admiring phrases to describe any performance which is quite out of the common. A walk of seven miles in two hours is quite as much a phenomenon, though not so rare a one, as a run of a quarter of a mile in 48¾ seconds.

As might be expected, Mr. Shearman gives much sound and practical advice to persons about to run. He makes very sensible remarks on the subject of training, and recognizes the important fact that different diets suit different men, as well when they are in training as at other times. He is, perhaps, rather dogmatic on the subject of smoking, which he forbids absolutely without regard to temperament. We can answer for one famous athlete, favourably noticed by Mr. Shearman, who jumped nearly six feet high, and ran the quarter in very little more than fifty seconds, and who never dreamt of giving up his pipe (to say nothing of late hours and capricious meals) for so much as a single day. Mr. Shearman may reply that, if he had conformed to the ordinary rules, he might have surpassed Brooks and beaten Myers; but that is only another way of saying that Mr. Shearman's generalizations may be absolutely true notwithstanding an apparent exception.

Football is a larger subject than athletics. The game is probably as old as the human race, and this book gives ample and interesting proof of its popularity at almost every period of English history. The game has, however, taken a fresh start within very recent times, and the history of the Rugby Union and Association games is even shorter than that of athletic meetings. Mr. Shearman's account of the Rugby Union game leaves nothing more to be desired. In describing the successive phases through which the game has passed, from the "shoving age" to the "passing age," and the characteristics of prominent Rugby Union players, he has displayed admirable skill, and entitled himself to the thanks of all lovers of the game. As was perhaps to be expected in a book written by a Rugby player, the account of the Association Game is less satisfactory. It is accurate and intelligent, as far as it goes, but the general development of the game is less vividly set before us, and we are told hardly anything of the peculiarities of particular players. If Mr. Shearman wrote this part of the book unaided, he suffered from a want of practical familiarity with the game. If he obtained assistance from an Association player, his colleague was much less competent than himself.

A very important portion of the book is that which deals with the various school games. These are, upon the whole, well and clearly described. The account of the Eton Wall game is marred by the absurd suggestion that this almost primeval pastime is a development of passage football, and by several omissions and ambiguities. Surely a description of a "Calx bully" ought to contain some reference to the important functions of the "seconds." A graver defect is the omission from the book of any account of the Rugby game as played at Rugby, which still differs—or till very recently differed—in many important respects from the Rugby Union game to which it gave rise. One of the few references made to the real Rugby game is misleading. The author says that in the Rugby game as originally played the game was decided by a majority of goals. The real original Rugby rule was that the only way of winning was to get two goals. The game came to an end when this object was attained, even if it took only five minutes, and, whenever it was possible to do so, the contest was carried on from day to day, or from week to week, until one side had obtained the requisite score.

Mr. Shearman quotes portions of the description of a football match which is contained in Tom Brown's Schooldays; but he fails to notice one rather curious fact about that description—namely, that it does not contain a single word to show that any of the players touch the ball with their hands. Mr. Shearman assumes that a "running and tackling" game was always played at Rugby, although thirty or forty years ago a dribbling game was played in all other schools. But there exists a by no means incredible tradition that Rugby boys merely scrummaged, dropped, and dribbled until some time after the period immortalized by Mr. Hughes, that it occurred to a player one day to pick up the ball and run with it, that his opponents remonstrated but could point to no rule explicitly forbidding the practice, and that in the end, since they could not stop the innovator from continuing to act on his happy thought, they followed his example.

It appears to us that it really makes very little difference to the essence and spirit of true football whether the ball be carried in the hands or not. Essentially football is a battle between two parties of combatants, each striving to get the ball to the other end of the ground and there to score a point, either by merely kicking the ball over the end boundary line, as is the rule at Winchester, or by whatever more or less complicated device of goal, base, try, shy, rouge, or touch down, custom may happen to decree. To see real football played one should go to a house match at any one of the big schools. It is surprising how much alike these contests are. The true spirit of battle animates both sides, and no one cares for anything but victory. All minor differences, including the difference between an Eton "run down" and a Rugby "run," are lost in the general similarity of the strife. The grand essential of true, warlike football is that, whether the game is close or loose for the time being, all the players, except the backs, should be constantly following the ball. The man who has it for the moment should be closely followed by a little group, any one of whom will relieve him if he loses it; meanwhile every forward on the other side should be rushing to the spot where the fray is thickest, not lurking in a leisurely way at some spot where he is likely to waylay a passing foe, or to receive the ball which is chucked or kicked to him from a distance by a distressed ally. But, since football became a pastime for middle-aged men, and since its rules were scientifically revised by Committees of Associations, a game has found favour which affords more opportunities for recovering a lost wind, and into which the ingenuity of trained intellects, combined in some cases with the shrewd instincts of pot-hunting professionals, can introduce ingenious modifications. Men's football lacks many of the finest elements of boys' football; and, by way of compensation, we have the tactical curiosities which an absurdly lax rule as to off-side has rendered possible in the Association game; while the Rugby Union game has come to consist mostly in a swift and dexterous passing of the ball from hand to hand, the great requisites for success being willingness to throw the ball away directly you get it, and skill in posting yourself just halfway between the man who had it last and the man who ought to have it next.

We do not wish to take leave of this book without saying a word in commendation of the illustrations, which are admirable. The instantaneous photographs of persons engaged in performing athletic feats are exceedingly entertaining and instructive.

SOME BOOKS IN ELIZABETHAN LITERATURE.*

It is fortunately as unnecessary as it would be ungracious to contest Mr. Bullen's assurance to his readers that this second selection of his from the, in some cases almost forgotten, in almost all cases little known, song-books of the Elizabethan age, is equal in interest to the first. It is sufficient, and more than sufficient, to say that the second, like the first, is one of the most delightful bringings out of old treasures that have taken book shape for many years in England. In fact, regard being had in each case to the knowledge of the day, as well as to the positive worth of the "find," we do not know any books, except Percy's Reliques and Lamb's Specimens, to which we can compare these two volumes. And we are glad to hear that Mr. Bullen, while not intending to diminish the value of his books to those who possess them by exact reproduction, thinks of making a still more popular selection from the books themselves. That he may find an abundant sale for it is a wish not at all sicklied o'er by the pale cast of doubt, which we confess we feel about his assertion, too steadily cheerful not to be slightly ironical, that Britannia's Pastorals is "a well-thumbed classic." "May the thumbs have no worse fortune" is, perhaps, a sufficient hint of our own opinion on the point.

As usual Mr. Bullen's editing is good. His notes are brief and to the point. In his introduction he, while giving tempting samples of his wares, avoids the habit, as unwise as it inartistic, of some editors who practically turn everything that is worth reading, and much that is not, into their prefaces, and thus either disgust the reader with a twice-told tale, or force him to make his choice between text and comment. If his inclination is a little to over-praise, not his wares at their best, but the general quality of them, that is so closely akin to and so necessarily an offspring of the enthusiasm without which the labour of producing such a book would be very unlikely to be undertaken at all, that we need not find any fault with it. For ourselves, we acknowledge to the full the exquisite charm of the best work here given, the frequency with which that charm occurs, and the singular difference between the time when Campion and his fellows did the "words" of songs and the time in which those "words" are done as they are too often done now. Yet we might interpose or add a slight correction or limitation. Very few of the pretty numerous songs in this book are without the charm above referred to; but very far fewer of them display that charm throughout, or even in great part. The inequality no less than the freshness and vigour of an age which was everything rather than critical displays itself everywhere. If Shelley had been Campion, it is nearly certain that he would have added a third weak stanza to the two incomparable ones of "Oh world! oh life! oh time!" If Campion had been Shelley, he would very improbably have written any of the weak lines which mar his partly exquisite pieces here. Sometimes, as in Dowland's "Come ye heavy states of night," there is strength with no weakness, and often there are charming half-inarticulate snatches like this:—

> Hey nonny no!
> Men are fools that wish to die!
> Is't not fine to dance and sing
> When the bells of death do ring?
> Is't not fine to swim in wine,
> And turn upon the toe,
> And sing Hey nonny no,
> When the winds blow and the seas flow?
> Hey nonny: no!

Read also this charming flouting-piece:—

> "Art thou that she than whom no fairer is?
> Art thou that she desire so strives to kiss?"
> "Say I am: how then?
> Maids may not kiss
> Such wanton-mannered men."
> "Art thou that she the world commends for wit?
> Art thou so wise, and mak'st no use of it?"
> "Say I am: how then?
> My wit doth teach me shun
> Such foolish, foolish men."

Read too this splendid Jonsonian cadence:—

> Thou sent'st to me a heart was crowned,
> I took it to be thine,
> But when I saw it had a wound
> I knew that heart was mine.
> A bounty of a strange conceit!
> To send mine own to me,
> And send it in a worse estate
> Than when it came to thee.

Such work as this can never be old, can never be in the unfavourable sense familiar, can never be in the favourable sense familiar enough. No effort can imitate it; it is of the kinds of poetry, by no means all the kinds, yet the most precious, which a man may give all the substance of his house for, all the labour of his days and his nights, all the accumulated knowledge and taste of a lifetime of literary study, and yet never succeed in producing them, except at certain times and in certain circumstances of history, as well as with certain personal gifts. Fortunately, however, if the producing of it cometh not with observation, the enjoying of it does. It is a mistake to think that appreciation of such verse is absolutely spontaneous, but it has that special grace about it that the more carefully it is cultivated the keener it is and the safer from satiety or weariness. "Tolle lege, tolle lege, but be sure that you can never read with too much understanding," is all we need say to readers of Mr. Bullen's book.

Among the less unworthy sort of Shakspearian commentators it is a not unfrequent and a harmless game to try to fix on that one of the pseudo-Shakspearian plays which it is most impossible that Shakspeare could have written. Fair Em is an old favourite for this purpose; Locrine makes good running; the Birth of Merlin is safe backing for a place. Indeed, it is rather surprising that nobody, to our knowledge (and that of the [illegible] Drs. Warnke and Proescholdt, to whom we are at last indebted for a good edition of the Apocrypha), except Tieck, has ever said much in its favour. Even what has been said comes to little more than that it is not [illegible] play, [illegible] to be assigned to Shakspeare. We could not [illegible], for it has—a point on which the present [illegible] as far as we can see, lay stress—exactly the characteristic which is seldom or never found in Shakspeare, and which is so frequent in other work of the time, especially in certain plays assigned to Middleton and to the writer (William Rowley) whom Kirkman the bookseller was good enough to yoke with the other William in his fifty or sixty years after date attribution. All students of Elizabethan drama know how in The Mayor of Queenborough and The Changeling a tragic plot, in their case of very high excellence, is yoked to a comic plot almost beneath notice, except for the fact that the tragedy and the comedy have little or nothing to do with each other. The tragic plot of The Birth of Merlin is not of high excellence; on the contrary, it is nearly worthless; but the comic plot is rather better than in the two other instances. But the mere intermixture, the total absence of any intelligent combination, is as noticeable here as there. Now this is exactly what you do not find in Shakspeare, though it may be admitted that Merlin's uncle the Clown is not quite so far, we shall not say from Feste and the Gravediggers, but from Launcelot and Lance, as some of his fellows. We open, however, the play (after very diligently reading it through) quite at random, and we find Merlin speaking thus:—

> My service, Sir,
> Shall need no strict command, it shall obey
> Most peaceably; but needless 'tis to fetch
> What is brought home. The King is coming hither
> With the same quest you bore before him. Hark!
> This drum will tell ye.

We are not concerned to deny that Bacon may have written that; Shakspeare never did or could. The edition is as good as it could be made. It is no doubt curious that the well-known story of Merlin's birth from a human mother and an incubus is differently handled, not only from the account in Geoffrey, but from that given by early French sources, and that the machinery of Aurelius and his devilish Saxon Queen Artesia, a kind of doublet of Rowena, is also not directly traceable to any earlier source. But it is not much more than curious. The annotation, though not full, is good. We are not quite sure whether the editors in commenting on "Layton Buzzard" do or do not know that there is an actual "Leighton Buzzard" in England; they do not say so, and their note—"Lay it on, Buzzard, was, perhaps, a technical term of hunting"—does not look as if they did, and conveys no very intelligible meaning. The Clown's innuendo is clear enough, though Tieck from his translation does not seem to have seen it. The apparatus of various readings from the original and the only two modern critical editions by Tyrrell and Delius is an excellent example of honest labour, to which we only wish a better object.

Mr. Ernest Rhys's lines in editing Dekker for the Mermaid Series have fallen on pleasant places. Hardly one of the better known Elizabethan dramatists has had such uniformly good words from critics of the most diverse views as Dekker, and only that one whom Mr. Gosse has charged himself with is more inaccessible to the general. In choosing The Shoemaker's Holiday, The Honest Whore, Old Fortunatus, and The Witch of Edmonton, Mr. Rhys could as to the first three have had no doubts. But The Witch of Edmonton is so undoubtedly a croix de Berny among plays, and Dekker's share in it is so uncertain, and, according to at least some judgments, so small, that there might have been hesitation here. We do not, however, quarrel with the decision, and it is certainly an advantage to have The Honest Whore and Old Fortunatus attainable at a less price than even the second-hand booksellers charge for Mr. Pearson's edition. The notes, as not unfrequently in this series, might, perhaps with advantage, have been either more numerous or wholly omitted; but the introduction is very well done, being as full of material information as the remarkably scanty stores available will permit, sensible, unpresumptuous in tone, and very rarely transgressing into the strange style of writing which in the introductions of this series has been rather too common. The frontispiece of the "Fortune," though not very specially appropriate to this volume, is well executed and welcome enough.

Mr. Gosse has had even greater advantages in respect of the presentation of Shirley; for Shirley is now, since the enterprises of Mr. Pearson and Mr. Nimmo, the least easily attainable of all our dramatists. Even imperfect copies of the edition of Giffard and Dyce, the only one, fetch several pounds. On the other hand, he is perhaps more easy to do justice to in a selection than any of his fellows. In their case, the wholes are almost always so unequal, and the parts constantly so beautiful, that the selector is torn by conflicting desires, for whatever he includes, he will put in much uncharacteristic rubbish, and whatever he rejects, he will exclude some characteristic beauties. With Shirley equable excellences rather than extraordinary flashes are the distinguishing point, and although some plays are certainly better than others, it is difficult to find in any of the less good plays exceptional bursts of poetry. Mr. Gosse's brief introduction is complete, to the point, and judiciously written, neither arrogating too high a place for the author, nor depressing him too low; and the frontispiece portrait is acceptable. The choice of the six plays given—The Witty Fair One, The Traitor, Hyde Park, The Lady of Pleasure, The Cardinal, and The Triumph of Peace—would hardly be possible to better, except in one instance. We should ourselves have substituted The Grateful Servant for The Cardinal, and we should, if by hook or by crook we could, have edged in St. Patrick for Ireland, a most pleasing eccentricity. But of these fancy improvements on other people's work there is no end. The principal thing is that it is now really possible for readers to form a sufficient notion of the last and not the worst of the men of the great age from a book of their own, by spending half a crown instead of seven or eight pounds; and that is much.

The merits and defects of the second volume of the "Henry Irving" Shakspeare are so much the same as the merits and defects of the first that it is really not necessary to say much about it. Readers will find here much erudition of divers kinds, many indications of the theatrical way of dealing with Shakspeare which will interest a theatre-going age, and a great many illustrations by Mr. Gordon Browne.

A book which has a special and well-defined object, and which is adapted thereto by a man who knows what he is about, almost escapes general criticism. Mr. Deighton, who has had much experience in India, tells us—what we can readily believe—that the difficulties of the mild Baboo are by no means identical with those of the average English schoolboy, and not to be met by the same means. He has accordingly set himself to expose all the necessary cui bonos. Without jocking, he seems to have done it well enough. We see infinite silly things here; but they are generally quotations from Gervinus or some other of our old friends of the commentator's Bedlam, and Mr. Deighton, for a commentator, is sane enough. "They make an excellent piece of work. Would they were all done!"

THOSE who think of keeping bees would do well to read this fat book before lightly embarking upon that undertaking. It is true that unsophisticated cottagers often succeed very well with their bees, in violation of all scientific principles; but even a superficial study of Mr. Cheshire's work will make it evident that to make "show honey," or to keep an apiary that will bear inspection by scientific friends, requires much patience, unflagging attention, considerable knowledge, and a skilful hand. There is no greater authority on bees and beekeeping than Mr. Cheshire, and his two volumes on the subject are the best works of their kind.

The first chapter of this second volume treats of the point which would naturally occur first to the mind of a non-beekeeper—namely, that of being stung, or rather how not to be stung. All kinds of contrivances are mentioned, among others a mask of wire cloth, "with an opening for the pipe, and a draw-door to permit of expectoration." It will be a consolation to smokers to learn that "terrifying the bees into submission" with smoke is one of the great principles of bee-discipline, except in the case of Cyprians. Before operating on a hive, it is well to puff some smoke from a pipe—or to get a friend to puff it—into the entrance. For non-smokers there are powerful instruments, with fire-boxes, bellows, and blast-pipes, which will discharge sufficient smoke into hives to subjugate the most irritable of bees. Brown paper, "which will smoulder for hours," may be used in these bee-smokers. "With very savage stocks," "creosote, to the amount of a few drops, should be rapidly vapourised by being added to the burning material in the usual smoker. When so employed no colony can stand it." This we can readily believe. The only doubt in our mind is whether the operator could stand it. Bees have a great dislike to carbolic acid, and if it is brushed over the alighting-board, the entrance, and the frames when the hive has been opened, it will effectually quiet the bees in most cases. Some people use a powerful spray-producer. One of these, filled with a weak solution of carbolic acid, is a most useful means of defence against an irritable colony. An excellent preventive against stings is methyl salicylate, or oil of wintergreen, rubbed into the skin. "After applying a few drops of it," says Mr. Cheshire, "I have been quite unable to get my own bees to sting me." It is sufficient to put about four drops into the palm, and then to rub the hands well over each other until both are completely smeared with it. (We are assuming that the head is covered with a veil, and that the wrists and ankles are well protected.) This oil will not injure the skin, and is very easily removed. An experienced beekeeper will often handle bees which he knows to be of a temperate nature, without any protection at all. The great points are to avoid all quick, darting movements. "So handle the combs that they are not jarred, and be especially cautious not to strike or kick the hive. Make no needless noises, and do not allow the breath to play upon the bees; and should one dart out with threatening mien strive to remain unmoved, when escape is extremely probable, while a hand in retreat is almost certain to retire wounded." It is a common mistake to suppose that an angry bee is certain to sting on alighting upon a human hand. On the contrary, she will always examine the skin very carefully first with her palpi—very delicate and nervous feeling organs, which are situated near the sting. It may seem that she stings at once, and without care or reflection; but a bee can do a great deal in a very short space of time, in proof of which it may be mentioned that "she can flap her wings more than four hundred times per second, and that each flap involves the extension and contraction, through a nerve impulse, of the muscles employed in the wing movements." This being the case, as Mr. Cheshire says, "we shall see at once that the 'no time' difficulty is removed." When a person has been stung by a bee, he should remove the sting immediately, "if possible, by the nail, running it in the direction opposite to that by which it has entered." On no account let him take hold of the sting with his thumb and finger, or a forceps, for then he will probably squeeze more of the virus into the wound from the poison-bag, which is generally left attached to the sting. Although the virus of a bee-sting is a strong acid, it does not always follow that an alkali will cure it. Much depends upon the temperament and constitution of the patient; and, while Arnica montana and Ledum palustre will give relief in many cases, in others they are injurious. We may dismiss the subject of bee-stings by giving the young beekeeper two pieces of comfort—the first, that at swarming time bees are nearly always in an exceedingly good temper; the second, that each time he is stung he will probably become less susceptible to the effects of bee-poison.

The chapters on hives contain every detail connected with them that any reasonable beekeeper can expect, and few will fail to find some fresh information in them. As everybody knows, the venerable and rather picturesque old straw hive has been, to a great extent, supplanted by wood, and even the interesting glass supers are more or less looked down upon by experienced hands. The best walls for hives are those made of a double skin of wood, the intervening space being filled in with charcoal or cork-dust. One of the modern accessories of the beehive is "excluder zinc," which consists of sheets of zinc perforated with oblong holes large enough to admit worker bees to the combs which are intended for table uses, but too small to allow the queen to pass through and spoil the combs by laying eggs in them. Another is the wax foundation, or artificial midrib. This is a thin sheet of wax, covered with hexagonal holes, and it is used for placing in a hive, super, or frame as an artificial foundation to induce the bees to begin the comb in the exact place and manner desired by their owner. These foundations are usually made now by pressing wax sheets through a double roller, something like a patent mangle, each roller being covered with rhombic bases. Then there is the queen-trap, of which many kinds are now made. In order to prevent excessive swarming, it is often desirable to arrest and imprison superfluous queens. They, in their turn, may prove useful for queenless colonies, and for this purpose an ingenious contrivance, known as an "introducing cage," has been invented. There is also a "queen-nursery," which consists of little cages, or drawers, 2½ inches square, covered with wire-cloth at each end, and with two holes on the top, into one of which a queen-cell is inserted, and into the other a sponge dipped in honey, to supply food. In another kind of queen-nursery the cell is held in its place by an indiarubber band, and a few bees are put in to act as nurses and attendants. Besides these, there is the queen's travelling-box, in which queen-bees are not only sent about by post in this country, but from abroad also. It is a box some three or four inches long, and between one and two inches wide, containing two well-ventilated living chambers and a third for food. A queen-bee with about twenty-five attendants can travel comfortably in this little box for a month or more. Everybody may not be aware that "bees are able by feeding to convert any young worker larva, or egg which might produce such, into a queen." It follows that "the beekeeper has but to remove the mother from a stock, and supply if needful the eggs or young larvæ, and the bees will do the rest." Besides this, some beekeepers, who wish to raise extra queens, induce their bees, by cutting and piercing some of the combs into particular shapes, to make more queen-cells. These cells are generally removed to the queen-nurseries, and so the process of queen rearing goes on. The clipping of one or both of a queen-bee's wings, with the view of preventing her from flying to a distance with her swarms, is one of the nice operations of the beekeeper; but for this purpose he must first catch his queen. It is enough to make a beginner's blood run cold to read of picking the queen from off a hanging cluster of swarming bees with the fingers; to be recommended to turn the fresh hive into which bees have just swarmed upside down, shake it round until the bees "roll over each other, like so many grocer's currants," and seize the queen when she comes to the top; or to throw down a whole cluster on to a sheet, search for and lay hold of the queen. Yet if he wishes to attain perfection he must be prepared to do all this and even more. It is possible, nay, "quite easy, not only to introduce, but to get one queen to lay in half a dozen distinct hives in a single week." The introduction should be at night; the queen should previously be kept fasting and in solitude for half an hour, and she should be put in by lifting, at one corner, the quilt of the hive, the bees being driven back with a very little smoke. Presently, when the bees find her they think that "she must belong to the hive, for she did not pass the entrance at all, but is found near the roof, and thus the bees are cheated into kindness, where a knowledge of the truth would make them wild with rage." When the operator wishes to remove the queen to another hive, he can usually find her by lifting the frames and searching each comb until he sees her. A sharp eye for a queen is one of the first things to be cultivated in a beekeeper.

Except for convenience or appearance' sake, there is no special object in keeping beehives in a garden rather than elsewhere. As a rule, bees do not gather honey and pollen from plants and flowers close at hand; "all included within a circle two miles in diameter, having the apiary for its centre, may be regarded by the beekeeper as his forage-ground." Nevertheless it is well that rich forage should be near, as this saves time and labour. The forms of the pollen of many flowers are to be found in botanical works—fourteen of plants popular among bees are given here—so, by taking some of the pollen from his bees' "pollen-baskets," and submitting it to a medium microscope, the beekeeper may "detect whence his honey is coming." To ascertain that one is getting honey at all, much less to know from what flowers it has been gathered, is more than one can hope for in purchasing honey in ordinary shops, for honey is much adulterated with corn-syrup, which is "produced in America in enormous quantities by the action of acids at high temperatures upon the starch of maize." Sixty-four pages of this book are devoted to "The Production of Honey." This is one of the most important—indeed, the most important—of a beekeeper's duties, and all his others should be subservient to it. A scientific apiarian may have fine and flourishing colonies, and bees of various breeds, pure as well as judiciously intermixed—he may be an adept at swarming, queen-rearing, and operating, and yet fail to produce good honey. Mr. Cheshire's description of the causes of small specks in honey will make most people who read it careful in selecting any honey that they either purchase or eat.

"The genus Apis contains about sixteen species," according to Mr. Cheshire. He tells us, moreover, that "the whole genus is naturally restricted to the Old World, for although members of it have now become naturalized in America, Australia, or the islands of the Pacific, they were originally conveyed thither by Europeans," and he adds this curious detail, that "it has been remarked that the Red Indians were in the habit of noting the gradual absorption of their territory by the white man through the forward advance of his herald, Apis mellifica." The latter, or German bee, is the brown bee so well known in this country. Its best quality is that it is an excellent comb-builder, and its worst is that it is very quarrelsome with its neighbours. The Apis ligustica, Ligurian, Italian, or Yellow Alpine bee, is good-tempered, industrious, and prolific, but its "comb-honey is not equal in appearance to that produced by blacks," and it requires extra care in winter. This breed has been much imported during the last twenty-five years, and it has "multiplied until almost all our black bees give indications of an admixture of Italian blood." The Cyprian bees, which are evidently great favourites with Mr. Cheshire, gained a reputation for savageness in England; but, although it is very true that they are demons when roused, they are gentle enough if properly handled. They winter better than the Italians, and are excellent in all respects, temper alone excepted. The Holy Land or Syrian bees are remarkable for building an extraordinary number of queen-cells. They are serviceable bees, but, like the Cyprians, somewhat variable in their temper. Hungarian bees are proverbially gentle; they winter well, and are becoming more and more popular. The Apis fasciata, or Egyptian bee, is exceedingly vicious, and, as far as Mr. Cheshire can tell us, it has no counterbalancing virtues.

The chapter on the Diseases and Enemies of Bees, if too scientific for some beekeepers, contains useful hints and suggestions for all, and even non-beekeepers will find it interesting. It only remains for us to add that the book is well indexed, well got up, and admirably illustrated.

ETHICS AND LOGIC.*

A GREAT change has come over the literary world since Francis Jeffrey, the most impertinent of successful editors, wrote that "it is an insult upon the understanding of a female writer to treat her like a lady." Even then he was dealing with Joanna Baillie, to whom he was "fully as rude" as he had been to another of her sex. One cannot help wondering what he would have said of such a work as Educational Ends, by a lady who is a D.Sc. of London University. Certainly he would have required to pass beyond his own philosophical position—such as it was—to understand the greater part of it. Miss—or shall we say Doctor?—Bryant has written an admirable book on the subject. The misfortune is that only by a few will it be read and appreciated. In great measure this is the author's own fault. Only those who are familiar with the philosophical terms she uses will care to accompany her far. The preface and introduction will be stumbling-blocks in themselves. Besides, it is surely possible to present one's views even on difficult matters with greater clearness than is here manifested. Miss Bryant is apparently deficient in imagination. Paucity of illustration is not necessarily a fault, although it makes the strain upon the reader greater; but, when illustration is resorted to, we should expect to find better examples than those on p. 146 and p. 252 of this volume. Surely even the "students of educational theory," for whom the author professedly writes, are human beings who are neither likely to be blind to the attractions of style nor apt to judge of a book's merits by its obscurity. Otherwise—and we confess to some doubts on the subject—they must be a set of irrational prigs. Miss Bryant divides her work into two parts—the one ethical, and the other psychological. Of these the former is the better in every way. It does not treat of the matters which we are accustomed to meet with in a scientific work on ethics. Rather, it discusses the question of the process of development of the good character—so far keeping within the lines indicated by the title of the book. Its endeavour is to show how the mind must pass from the state of isolated individualism, which seeks merely personal or selfish ends, to that state wherein the ends sought are common. In the latter there is given even to the individual person a higher satisfaction than he would otherwise attain. Not that this satisfaction for himself is consciously present to his mind when he leaves his first standpoint. "I do not mean that duties are accepted and sacrifices made because the person making them perceives that he will thus increase his personal liberty and satisfy his sympathetic feelings." That is not true in fact, and, if it were true, it would take all the ethical value out of each duty and sacrifice. It is not because all these things shall be added unto us that we are to seek the kingdom. That must be sought first for itself, and no doubt the reward will be great. Yet the character which is the best is built up without regard to reward on the one hand or punishment on the other. Were it not so, it would be impossible to speak of self-sacrifice in any reasonable way. The common life in which the individual merges his selfish existence, whose ends he makes his own, is naturally taken as that of the family first and the community afterwards. Neither of these is perfect, of course; but the identification of himself with their larger being is the first step which each one must take in his ethical progress. Duty is considered, not as imposed from without, but as recognized and accepted willingly as the means of growth. Miss Bryant writes forcibly in criticism of those who hold up an ideal of duty so negatively strong that "pleasure can be despised, pain endured, and any revolt of characteristic inclinations promptly put down." The following is her picture of the result:—

The satisfaction of natural desires and the exercise of natural impulses, within certain limits, are not only pleasant, but also healthy. An abrupt self-denial with respect to such desires and impulses, while they are within these limits, is, therefore, passively destructive of health; and an abrupt strain on them, without those limits, is actively destructive. The former arrests growth, the latter involves wear and tear. On the other hand, a self-denial which is not abrupt, though directed to the modification of the desires and impulses, is healthy, and has, too, a certain enjoyableness. Control of conduct in all details by a single sense of duty implies abrupt self-denials and abrupt strains. Enfeeblement is the result, and so also is habitual sadness. The result of training towards this ideal is a kind of good man who has himself always well in hand, but who never flings the vigorous life of his whole personality into the discharge of duty, whose soul does not laugh and sing with the joy of conscious development into a higher personality when each good deed is done.

Notwithstanding this protest against the morality of asceticism, against the imposition of duty under the guise of a barren "ought," there are indications here and there that the position is not without some attractions for the author; but they are scarcely of sufficient importance to deserve more than mention. More important is a tendency to error on the other side. It is easy enough to say that, "unless discipline carry the conviction of duty with it, this disposition [to transform a claim into a duty] is not cultivated by the discipline, and no real progress is made at the time towards the condition of mind in which it is possible for virtue to become a purpose." This is quite true; but Miss Bryant must remember that the majority of those being educated have to walk by faith. The Right for them is shown from without, and the only way in which they can learn its reasonableness is through example. In this sense she is perfectly correct in saying that the most successful disciplinarian is the Leader. In the later chapters of the first part of her book she works out her main thought clearly and carefully, coming at last to the community as the "common personality," whose end must be reached by the same process as must that of the individual personality. Even in its case there must be a going out of self towards a wider field than is necessarily present for itself alone. The end is for all and by the help of all. Here, as indeed throughout her book, there is a suggestion of optimism in the author, refreshing enough in these times. Without that it would scarcely be possible to speak of "education," or "growth," or "development" at all. The opposition, if any, which Miss Bryant must be prepared to meet is that which will come from those who remain in the region of the abstract understanding, who will not be able to reconcile apparent contradictions. To them the universal and the individual are diametrically opposed; and if the individual is to lose self in the universal, that means the extinction of the former. When our "dead selves" are buried, nothing remains. It is from a much higher standpoint that our author looks on the matter when she writes that the free man's object "covers the whole field of complete development for all members of the universal community," and adds that "the universality of the free man's ideas and ends of conduct does not destroy their individuality." As we have already said, the second part of the book is the less interesting and less successful, although it gives evidence of the same thoroughness and ability which we have remarked in the first. Its best chapter—in which the author's optimism is again apparent—is that on the "Quest of Necessity." The teacher, Miss Bryant holds, must encourage the child to the quest of wisdom by "sympathy and support given to his natural wonder at the unknown," and stimulation given to his natural belief in the possibility of knowledge. With any Unknowable, whether in its religious or in its scientific form, she will have nothing to do. She cannot believe in the ultimate insolubility of the problem of knowledge. The questions which the mind raises the mind must be able to answer. "The problem is to be pursued to its solution despite all difficulties, these being regarded simply as indications that new departures are necessary; ultimate truth is a reality, and science a real effort to obtain it." The volume closes with a chapter written to show that, although the author has treated the ethical and the logical developments separately, there is beneath the duality a fundamental unity. We have already mentioned what are the author's faults. It would be unfair to let the book go without saying that these sink into comparative insignificance beside its undoubted merits.

"There is no science in which such confusion reigns as in Ethics." Thus writes Mr. George Payne Best, B.A., M.B. Cantab., in his Morality and Utility. Indeed, this is his first sentence; but the reader who expects to find the confusion made less in the course of the book will be himself confounded. If he gets as far as p. 35, he will discover that this graduate of Cambridge, who is to set us all right on Ethical Science, in making "a really useful deduction" from a passage in Hume, uses the common Logical fallacy of Undistributed Middle. If he goes further, he will find that the absoluteness, universality, and permanence of moral laws are proved by a series of extracts from a curious variety of writers, commencing with Cudworth and Clarke, finishing with Bishop Temple and Mr. Bright. Having, as we will suppose, patience enough to read through these (although most of them, as the author admits, are taken at second-hand from Bain's laborious work), he will be at once surprised and glad to find in the midst of them the utterances of Philosopher Square taken from Fielding's novel. Whether the evidence of that worthy, or even of Parson Thwackum, is at all conclusive as to the absoluteness, &c., of moral laws, may be a matter of question. At any rate, these gentlemen find themselves in good company, for the quotations following that which records their discussion are taken from an Abbé, a Bishop, and a former Cabinet Minister. When Mr. Best has, by means of these distinguished authorities, carried his point about the character of moral laws, he brings these face to face with existing customs and institutions, with the object of showing that the latter are immoral. The moral instinct, he holds, is at variance with the institutions of society. Upon this text the whole remainder of his book is written. Morality is present to us as an Ideal. Whatever truth there may be in its utterances, it is not truth that can be carried out in practice. It is clear, the author urges, that "Morality—an absolute, universal, and permanent law—implies—postulates—an absolutely equal, asexual, immortal population." It is unnecessary to follow him into his grounds for the statement. We come across another of equal value:—"If the whole spirit of Christian teaching has not been to discourage the aiming at greatness, and the encouraging of equality, then I have greatly misunderstood the spirit of that teaching." But that is exactly what Mr. Best has done; as the very quotations from Scripture which precede this sentence ought to have told him. To quote "Let him be your minister," and "He made himself of no reputation, but took upon him the form of a servant," as passages which "encourage equality" in our author's sense is egregious folly. If he desires to find out their true ethical meaning, we can recommend him to study the first part of Miss Bryant's book, which we have already noticed. But Mr. Best's mistakes do not end here. He presents to us Morality as an Ideal which it is impossible to attain, forgetting to explain to us why it is there if its attainment is impossible; but he goes further than this. In the extraordinary chapter which ends his work, he at intervals prints (in capital letters) the following sentence as the sum of his philosophizing on the whole subject:—"Morality is the Decoy which leads us to Virtue." That is to say, the Ideal is a will-o'-the-wisp, a phantom, a mockery. Has it never occurred to the author that, if this be so, the only honest course is to get rid of it? If, as he apparently holds, it can only justify its presence in the mind as something tricky—a decoy—ought it not immediately to be banished? If, to use his own words, "Morality is an Illusion brought about by mental exaggeration under emotional states—under conditions the very reverse of those necessary for the securing of a result scientifically true," is it not mania of some kind? He is a doctor, and ought to know. For ourselves, we confess to the belief that, if there is insanity anywhere, it is at least not among those who hold different ethical views from the author. We learn (pp. 196, 197) that among the Ideals to be compared with Morality are Love, "that lowest of all Ideals," and Athleticism—apparently because these have an "annual tale of martyrs." Reading on:—

Thus it is with Morality. In the present day it counts few victims enough. But, by its presence in the mind, it promotes that lower degree (if we may call it so) of excellence which we name Virtue. But, if Morality be favourable to Virtue, and if virtuous action gives an advantage in the struggle for existence, we have all the ground for assuring ourselves that an illusion so useful, when once arising, will tend to be generalized through the action of Natural Selection, and perpetuated; and, not only so, but that it will never disappear until it ceases to be indispensable—until Virtue becomes organic in the individual, and Society is so well arranged that person and function are adapted to each other in such a manner that no sense of discrepancy shall arise in the mind that contemplates their fitness, one for the other.

Such a passage as this is conclusive testimony to the truth of the sentence with which the book begins and with which all readers should end.

No writer deserves better of a reviewer than does Mr. William Lucas Sargant. He has a thoroughly distinct way of saying what he means. Whatever value his opinions may have, there can be no doubt as to what they are. That is an especial merit in times when obscure phraseology and bad style are so common. Not that Mr. Sargant's style is good. Inductive Political Economy is written after a jerky Carlylese fashion. It is, on the whole, rather an ethical than an economical work, for the questions raised by the author do not all come within the range of the science, as it is generally understood and propounded. The book begins with a not unacceptable list of "terms and definitions," among which the most important is that relating to "reproduction." But the author, the printer, or the reader, has made an unpleasant mistake on the 36th page. What precedes is perfectly correct, but what would a sailor say to the following?—"The words were in practice so often confounded by steersmen, with ill results, that larboard was abolished in favour of port." That is all right; but "now instead of starboard and larboard we have port and larboard" is of course all wrong. Leaving that aside, we may say generally of Mr. Sargant's work that it is more likely to show the author's good intention than to have any practical effect. In one of his spasmodic utterances, not well known, Mr. Ruskin says, "I would like to add that, while I admit there is such a thing as mercantile economy, distinguished from social, I have always said that neither Mill, Fawcett, nor Bastiat knew the contemptible science they professed to teach." Something of the spirit of this sentence runs through Mr. Sargant's work, especially in his criticism upon Mr. Herbert Spencer and a late President of the Board of Trade. Malthus, as might be expected, comes in only to be condemned. If writers would only study Malthus at first hand and remember his circumstances, if they would even take the trouble to study Dr. James Bonar's representation of him, they would be less ready with their sweeping denunciations. A tendency established by the results of past experience does not mean a fact for all experience. There is another point upon which we shall only touch. Mr. Sargant recommends retaliation. To the foreigners he says, "We will tax you in return." It is scarcely conceivable that he has carefully considered all that this involves. If he could keep foreign duties at a certain—or below a certain—rate, his idea might work well enough. But that is impossible, and a war of tariffs would certainly not be advantageous to this country. Mr. Sargant is at once more successful and more interesting when he departs from the ordinary lines of the "Philosophy of Selfishness," and, either in offence or in defence, propounds his personal opinions. These are always worth a hearing, and, as we have hinted, are expressed with no uncertain sound. What he—from the philosophic point of view—requires to understand is that there is a possibility, brought in this country nearly to a fact, of reconciliation between the doctrines of Laissez Faire and Paternal Government, as the latter is generally accepted. It is the old story of the universal and the individual over again.

The second edition of Mr. Keynes's Formal Logic is only slightly different from the first. It is plainly intended for students only, and it is not hard to see that but a few of them will struggle through all its technicalities. Those who are really interested may find something to pay them for their toil when they come to the chapter on "Complex Inferences," which is sound and clever. The author, we think, is too much tied to Jevons, and, by introducing into his work the "universe of discourse," is likely to raise questions which no advocate of a purely formal logic could possibly answer. Whether it be owing to some jealousy between the Universities we cannot tell, but this author (from Cambridge) seems always glad to have a hit at Mr. Bradley (from Oxford). In only one case, so far as we have seen, is he justified. He is right at another point (p. 297) in correcting Dr. Fowler.

We do not desire to say much more of Mr. Laurence Johnstone's Introduction to Logic than that it is recommended by "Ricardus F. Clarke, S.J. Censor deputatus," and authorized by "Henricus Edwardus, Card. Archiep. Westmin." It will serve its purpose, no doubt, very well; but we believe that even the high authorities mentioned could quite readily have dispensed with some of the safeguards which Mr. Johnstone has found it expedient to produce for the benefit of the unwary Roman Catholic student. That, however, is a matter between him and his ecclesiastical superiors, and we are glad to pass his book, as Dr. Clarke does, with a Nihil obstat.

"THE present volume," says Mr. Furnivall, "is not a contribution to English history, but to the history of English." It contains that first part of Robert of Brunne's Chronicle, or, "Story of Inglande," which Hearne, the first editor, omitted as having no historical value, it being an English version of Wace's French adaptation of Geoffrey of Monmouth, with some additions from Dares Phrygius, Bæda, and others. In the main it is what the Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford calls "those wretched fables" of Geoffrey over again—the tales of Brutus, Corineus, Gogmagog, Sabrina (Sabren), Lear, Cordelia (Gordylle), Arthur, and all the rest of them, down to Cadwaladr. Whatever grains of fact the students of Celtic matters may by degrees pick out from among the husks of Geoffrey, this version by Robert of Brunne can add nothing to our knowledge of early British history; and historical students will hardly regard it as a useful addition to the Rolls series. But to the philologist, and especially to the student of the English language, it is a very different matter. The importance of Robert of Brunne's writings as laying the foundations of modern English is now well known, thanks to Mr. Furnivall's edition of the Handlyng Synne, and to Mr. Kington Oliphant's books on the English language. Philologists, at any rate, will have no quarrel with the decision which has given a place in the Rolls series to this hitherto unprinted portion of Robert of Brunne's Chronicle, which exists in two MSS. One of these is more consistently Northern in its forms than the other, which is in a mixed dialect such as belongs to the Midland, and is used in Robert of Brunne's earlier work, the Handlyng Synne. Hence the MS. in this dialect has been chosen for the basis of the present text, as being the more likely to represent the actual writing of the author. Mr. Furnivall expresses an intention of some time editing the Northern version also. The language of the text before us, being in that dialect from which modern English sprang has, for its date, a comparatively modern sound, and the same may be said of the metre, in which the line-ending e appears to be silent, as in modern usage. Many of the couplets run with something like the "light-horseman" gallop of Walter Scott. The interest which attaches to the Handlyng Synne as a picture of life and manners cannot be claimed by a so-called history which brings before us the dream-world of Brutus and of Arthur; but the prologue gives us a glimpse of reality, and is moreover all out of Robert of Brunne's own head. As a rule, he was not an original writer. "Like the architect of Lincoln's Inn Hall," remarks Mr. Furnivall, "Robert of Brunne can assure his hearers and readers that in his production 'there is not a single thing for which I haven't a precedent.'" Yet, to do him justice, he ventured upon some additions to his French model, which the editor has considerately marked with dots; and in some cases these additions seem to be due to his unaided intelligence. At any rate, he composed the Prologus and some other introductory matter, setting forth his authorities:—"And right as Master Wace says, I tell mine English the same ways; for Master Wace the Latin all rimes, That Piers [Peter of Langtoft, whom he followed for the Second Part of his Chronicle] overhops many times." He tells how he had put his story into as simple English as he could, for "the love of simple men That strange English cannot ken"; and how he did it, not for praise, but only to benefit the unlearned.

> I made it not forto be praysed, > but at þe lewed men were aysed.

He also cites "Dares the Freson," and, towards the end, for the history of the Angles, "seynt Bede." After the usual mediæval fashion, he asks as "meed" the prayers of his readers; and, as he had already done in the Handlyng Synne, he gives his name, Robert Manning, of Brunne (Bourne in Lincolnshire). When he wrote the earlier work, in 1303, he was in the Gilbertine Priory of Sempringham, probably as a lay brother; but when, five-and-thirty years later, he produced his "Story of England," he was in another house of the Order, at Sixille, now Six Hills, not far from Market-Rasen. Dan Robert of Malton, apparently the Prior of Sixille, caused him, he says, to write his chronicle for the benefit of his "fellows," "when they would solace make." According to the rule of the Order, nothing was allowed to be written without the knowledge and permission of the Prior. Hence, no doubt, Robert of Brunne's care to state the authorization for his work.

In orthodox fashion, he begins his tale from the Flood, and so passes on to Jupiter, the ninth in descent from Noah. From thence he traces the genealogy till he comes to Priam and his sons, when we have the tale of the Judgment of Paris, the three goddesses being degraded to "three witches," who "ladies were called, and in the air did fare." There is a similar adaptation of classical ideas when Brutus the Trojan comes to a temple where the misbelieving folk

> Dyane in lyknesse of o lefdy.

Diana was a fiend who spoke from an "Erlyk man ymage." In a note the editor seems to read this as "earthly man"; but in his glossary he interprets "erlyk" as "frightful." Further on Brutus falls in with "Nykeres," who in the French original are seraines (sirens), and in whom we recognize the Nixes of German folklore. Escaping the wiles of the sweet-singing "Nykeres," Brutus touches the coast of Spain, and then lands in Gaul, which is ruled by "þe twelue dosze-peres" (the twelve douze pairs—an odd piece of tautology). Finally, the wandering Trojan reaches the Isle of Albion, where there were no men except geauntes. A giant, Robert of Brunne explains, "is more [i.e. bigger] than man," but of similar form and make—that is, he adds with commendable caution, "so says the book," but he himself knows not, for "in my time saw I never none." Gogmagog, the biggest of these giants, he calls "that foul frog," a use of the word which the editor compares with the still existing use of "toad" as an epithet of abuse. When we come to the history of Kings Belyn and Brenne, who parted the kingdom north and south, we learn that "contek and [illegible] Out of the north will alway rise" —which looks as if Robert had no great love for the men beyond

Humber. "Overhopping," as he himself would say, many pages, we at last reach Hengest, who explains that he and his followers have been constrained to emigrate from "Saxoyne" because their folk are "so waxing," and have so many children who all grow up, that "the land is over-charged"—an early appearance of the over-population difficulty. Hengest's fair daughter "Ronewenne"—the Rowena of modern writers—comes before King Vortiger when he is merry and "well cup-shotten," and works him into such love-madness that he weds her, pagan as she is, in pagan fashion—

> Of prest was þer no benisoun,
> Ne messe songen, ne orysoun—whereof came all evil, as might be expected. A great deal of the narrative is occupied by the history of King Arthur, winding up with his retreat to the Isle of Avalon, where, say the Britons, he is still "on live"—

> Lyuende man wyþ blod & flesche.

This Robert of Brunne refuses to believe; indeed, he goes so far as to call it "the Britons' lie." After Arthur's fall there was endless trouble with the heathen Saxons, who at last overran all the land, so that "the Archbishop of London" had to flee to the woods, while his brother of York "lived in kerres [marshes], as doth the stork." One more quotation, and we may leave Robert of Brunne's poetry. The lines are introductory to the "Angle" and "Angel" story:—

> . Wel more oughte Englys loue God, & drede,
> . þan any nacion or any lede,
> . ffor a grace þat God haþ hem gyuen
> . ffor-by alle þo kyndes þat lyuen ;
> . Als fair are þe comune pedaille
> . As þe lordynges & of entaille.
> . Giue Englische men euen kepynge,
> . Mete & drynke, & oþer þynge,
> . Ys no man of so fair colour,
> . Ne so cler, ne of so swete sauour.

Mr. Furnivall has appended an elaborate index of rimes, as well as indexes of names and subjects, and a full glossary. He also sets a good example to other editors by being liberal of side-notes. To these it pleases him at times to impart a quaintly jerky effect by the use of forms such as "I've," "they'll," "he's," "doesn't," "'em," which last we know is good English for them, but still in a side-note "it is affectations." He gives us an interesting and in some parts characteristic preface—not wholly his own, for he tells us that the account of the life led in houses of the Gilbertine Order is due to Mr. W. H. Utley. In this Order men and women lived within the same inclosure, though separated by a high wall, and with no communication except through a small window with a turn-table, through which food and other necessaries were passed. The first priory of the Order—that of Sempringham—was founded about 1139 for nuns, who were waited upon by poor maidens; but these desiring also to enter the cloister, lay brothers were appointed to serve them and priests to minister to them. "This gave its whole character to the Order in after times, and the brothers and the canons were little more than attendants, temporal and spiritual, to the nuns and sisters." One feature of the Order might please the sternest Protestant. No organ or music was allowed in their church, nor any pictures or carvings, "lest they divert the mind from prayer and contemplation." The life of the lay brothers, to whom Robert of Brunne probably belonged, was, at any rate originally, a hard one; and altogether the rule of the Order was strict, and carefully framed to avoid scandal. But its pristine strictness, like that of many other Orders, was not fully maintained, and it is not known how far, in Robert of Brunne's day, the rules may have been "relaxed to the freedom or license of Chaucer's time." Mr. Furnivall tells us what little can be made out about Robert of Brunne's personal history, and of the Priors under whose sway he lived. His observations on the Handlyng Synne are partly repeated—a repetition of which no one will complain—from his edition of that work printed for the Roxburghe Club. Interest in Robert of Brunne has led him to visit Bourne, Sempringham, and Six Hills, of which he gives a pleasant description. He had the satisfaction of finding the language that Robert spoke, or at least one word of it, still living. "A walk across the fields to a farmhouse to ask the way produced in answer one of Robert's words, 'Yes, that's the gainest way.'" Lastly, he gives us, in his characteristically naïf and engaging manner, the history of the misfortunes that befell his work, and the delays in its production:—

> Twice before, in the many years since this text was begun, have I made collections of notes, &c. for preparing a fit Introduction to this Chronicle. The first time, all my notes disappeared while workmen were in the house during a long country holiday that I took. The second time, last year, I must have left in some shop, railway, or omnibus, the bound and noted volume of the text, with a Paper on the dialect and phonetics of the Lambeth MS. which Dr. Henry Sweet had most kindly prepared for me. Now, under great pressure of other work, the present Introduction has been written, on the urgent remonstrance of the Deputy Keeper of the Records. I can only ask mercy for its shortcomings, and for the long delay which has taken place in the production of the book; pleading also that this delay has not been due to mere laziness, though I acknowledge that it was wrong in me to do other work and leave this volume undone.

No one could resist such charming candour; so we are not surprised to learn that the Rolls authorities—"many, alas, now no longer with us"—showed "great forbearance."

GERMAN READERS AND MANUALS.*

THE editors of Whittaker's Series are fulfilling their promise of placing the most esteemed of modern German authors within the reach of English students. Having introduced them to Moser and Heyse, they carry on the series with Freytag, the greatest living master of German light literature. His novels which have won him so much popularity and reputation are more or less well known among us; but his comedies are quite unknown to English readers. Die Journalisten, the comedy selected by Dr. Lange as a specimen of Freytag's dramatic power, was written when its author was plunged in the vortex of an election contest in addition to his labours as a journalist. As the name implies, it is the outcome of his personal experiences. The story turns on an election, and a halo of romance is thrown over the prosaic calling of a journalist, the intrigues of a love-story being introduced into the unaccustomed quarters of a newspaper-office. The hero of the piece is the witty, energetic, but exceedingly frivolous, sub-editor of a Liberal newspaper, the Union. He is deeply smitten with the charms of a lovely heiress who is staying with her friend, the daughter of the Conservative candidate and the author of certain articles in the rival newspaper which the Union has turned into ridicule. Thus the lovers seem parted by the most insuperable of obstacles. After a great deal of fun about the mysteries of electioneering and editing that go on behind the scenes, everything comes right. The heiress buys up the paper, of which the versatile Bolz becomes chief editor, and then marriage follows shortly after. The piece is a charming comedy of everyday life. The interest never flags, for it is well sustained by cleverly imagined incidents, and the dialogue is witty and sparkling, but never forced. The characters are all distinct and well-sustained impersonations of types to be met with any day in ordinary social life. Bolz is a very original conception, showing that a man's heart has room for two grandes passions, and that the most practical and prosaic exterior may cover sentimental depths of which his comrades have no ken. His whole heart and soul are thrown into fighting the battles of his party and his chief. He makes no effort to win his ladylove, whom he worships at a distance like some bright star, that he may gaze at but not grasp. Alone among the journalists he is true to his profession, and by this very singleness of purpose he attains to his ideal.

Zopf und Schwert, Gutzkow's admirable comedy, is the latest addition to Whittaker's "Modern German Authors," and is edited by Dr. Lange, for use in schools, with notes philological and literary. The author, though one of the leading modern German dramatists, is little known and less read in England. He made his mark as a journalist at a very early age. Infected by the revolutionary fever of 1830 he became one of the leading spirits of the Jung Deutschland party, and in consequence his career was cut short by a term of imprisonment and the prohibition of all his writings. On his release he took refuge in the free towns of Hamburg and Frankfort, and devoted himself to the writing of satirical essays. From these he passed to the drama, wrote a great number of plays, and gained thereby much popularity and distinction. But, like all popular authors, he had to pay the usual penalty of success, for it raised against him a crowd of enemies among his less fortunate contemporaries. Adverse criticism and the annoyance of the attacks he was subjected to turned his brain, and he tried to take his own life. The attempt was frustrated, and he was shut up for a twelvemonth in a madhouse. After his restoration to society he tried to follow in Freytag's steps, and wrote several ponderous historical novels, but with no great success. His end was tragic. He was found dead in his room, suffocated by gas, in 1878. His historical comedies are the works by which he won most popularity, and of these Zopf und Schwert is about the best, and is still a favourite on the German stage. The scene is laid in Berlin, at the Court of Frederick William I., notorious for the extreme length to which he carried domestic tyranny, and for the injustice and oppression by which he warped the character of his distinguished son, Frederick the Great. The oddities of the King furnish an unfailing fund of admirable material for a comedy. The plot of the play hinges on the manœuvres for securing the hand of Frederick's sister, the Princess Wilhelmina. This lady was quite the equal of her brother in intellect, as her diary, when Margravine of Baireuth, recently presented to English readers in Princess Christian's translation, bears ample witness. There are several aspirants for the hand of the Princess. All of them are of high degree, and each is favoured by a different member of her family. The King intends to marry her to the Archduke Leopold, the eldest son of the Emperor. The Queen, her mother, is bent on an alliance with England, and looks on the Prince of Wales as the only fit mate for her daughter. The Crown Prince Frederick has set his heart on having his own friend, the hereditary Prince of Baireuth, as a brother-in-law. This Prince comes to press his suit in person. He is sent to the Prussian Court by the absent Frederick to act as a spy, and find out how that old madman the King treats his wife and daughter. He has fallen in love with the Princess from her portrait, seen at her brother's castle of Rheinsberg. He persuades her to receive a French master, recommended by her brother. For this bold step Wilhelmina is placed under arrest. An English emissary, Hotham, appears at the Court at the same time, sent to negotiate the alliance with the Prince of Wales. The Prince recognizes in him an old friend who is under great obligations to him, and is much more inclined to advance his suit than that of his own master. Matters are further complicated by a rumour that the Prince of Wales has arrived in Berlin, and is keeping up a strict incognito. Baireuth is in despair and suspects Hotham of playing him false. Hotham vindicates his sincerity by disclosing to him the secret that the Prince's supposed presence is only a canard got up with a political purpose, and gets him admission to the King's famous Tabakcollegium. Baireuth finds out that the King only admits him to this symposium with the intention of making him the butt of his wit. But forewarned is forearmed, and the Prince manages to turn the tables on the King and to give him a few home thrusts about his domestic interference. In the end all ends well; the King, seeing that Baireuth and Wilhelmina are in love with one another, gives his consent to their union. The scene in the Tabakcollegium gives occasion for much sparkling repartee. That in which the King suddenly drops into a secret reception of the Queen's, when she and her ladies are indulging in the forbidden recreations of cards and music on the sly, is very funny. The legend of the White Lady of the Palace is made use of by the Princess, who, disguised as this ghastly visitant, appears before the eyes of her irate parent, when he believed her to be a close prisoner. The threads of the plot are very dexterously handled, and the old King is a very faithful and carefully worked out character study. The whole play bears the stamp of that accuracy and faithfulness to historic details for which Gutzkow was famous. The notes are good. But in the first one we notice the strange slip of translating "Aufzug" scene and "Auftritt" act, thus reversing the meanings.

The Primer of the History of German Literature has been compiled by a lady who has long felt the want of such an elementary book for the use of her pupils. It is based on the larger work of Professor Kluge, and is meant as a help in getting up the names and dates of the chief writers of Germany in a shorter time than is possible by reading the voluminous works on the subject by German authors. We do not doubt that it will be found very useful in acquiring such superficial knowledge. But we must point out that to know the names of a certain number of men and of the books which they wrote is not to have a knowledge of the literature of any country, though in the present day and in the eyes of an examiner it may pass current for it. Such knowledge is practically useless. The literature of any nation is not formed of the titles of books, but of their contents. When once a book has been thoroughly read and digested, there is no fear of forgetting either the name of the book or the author. The use of literature is to supply new ideas to the mind; mere titles can give none. Miss Lublin's epitome, however, is accurate as far as it goes; and she prefaces the body of the work with a short introduction, showing the relation of the German tongue to its Teutonic brethren and more distant Aryan kinsfolk. She takes Ulfilas' Bible as her earliest specimen, and concludes her sketch with the lately-lost veteran Von Ranke, and does as full justice to the writers who built up German literature between these two as her very limited space will let her. Where space is so narrow, it seems vain to cavil at omissions; still, there are points left unnoted that connect some of the early poets with our own day which give a vitality to these old-world bards in the minds of young people. Thus, in citing Hartmann von Aue's "Poor Henry," there is no word to tell that it is the original of Longfellow's Golden Legend, so lately set to music by our most popular composer. Walther von der Vogelweide's beautiful bequest to the birds, which gave the poet another theme and will make the name a household word wherever Longfellow is read, is likewise left unnoticed. Nor is the use made by Wagner of Parsifal and Tristan und Isolde sufficiently made clear in the notices of these poems. Passing on to modern times, we are glad to find Miss Lublin doing full justice to Wieland, and giving him his due for reviving rhyme and romance in German poetry. She fully realizes, too, the greatness of Goethe, and devotes many pages to his works and character, and her analysis of Faust ought to be found acceptable now that its production on the English stage has made the name and plot of the great poet's masterpiece familiar even to those who are not German scholars. So many are the moderns that are enumerated in the latter part of the book, and some of them so unknown to fame, that we cannot but mark the absence of the brothers Grimm, Marlitt, and Werner, the best known of German novelists to English readers, and the popular playwrights Moser, Gutzkow, and Laube. Nor is a book of this size and compass without an index.

We are at a loss to discover why out of the works of Schiller any one should select Maria Stuart to put into the hands of schoolboys for use as a class-book. Perhaps the tercentenary of her tragic end, and the weak attempt that was made at exhibiting personal mementos of that saddest of stories, may have suggested to Mr. Bevir that it would be a pretty tribute to her memory to bring before his class the work in which the great German poet has embodied the tragic ending of that most romantic and unhappy life. Truth to tell, he has succeeded but poorly, and notwithstanding the attraction of the theme, Maria Stuart must take its place among the weakest of his works. It cannot be named in the same rank as Don Carlos, Wallenstein, or Wilhelm Tell, and is even far inferior to the Jungfrau. It falls short both in pathos and dramatic power, and does no sort of justice to the subject. It is strange that such a masterhand as Schiller should have failed to seize the best scenes in a life so full of dramatic incidents and should have chosen the final chapter which was so ineffective. Her rival denied poor Mary the consolation of making an imposing exit from the world. By the time she reached Fotheringay she was a prematurely old woman, worn out by the long tedium of a hopeless captivity. One cannot help feeling that death for her was a welcome deliverer. Had liberty been offered her she had no longer health or spirit to enjoy it. She is too utterly crushed to make an interesting heroine. The poet should have seized the sorrows of her prime for his subject. Misfortune falling on a young and beautiful Queen is much more striking and enlists more sympathy than the secret execution of a half-forgotten captive who has become inured to suffering. The meeting with Elizabeth, brought in to give the force of contrast, has no effect on the emotions of those who know quite well that it never took place. In the same way the introduction of Mortimer as an ardent admirer of the captive Queen, in the form of a nephew of surly old Paulett, is very irritating to English readers. Still more so is Leicester's love-sick monologue when the final act of the tragedy is over. If schoolboys are to read the play at all, they cannot do better than use Mr. Bevir's edition. He has avoided the too general fault of making too many notes, and takes care to point out the discrepancies between the poet's plot and authentic history.

Schiller's Minor Poems and Ballads is a fairly good selection, with such copious notes attached to each piece as to make the use of a dictionary unnecessary. Dr. Schlomka's Reader consists of three parts; the first contains short sentences; the second prose passages to give facility in the ready turning of English into German and German into English; a selection of favourite pieces of German poetry is the third. The exercises being intended to give readiness in applying already acquired knowledge. The short anecdotes are fresh and original, and more amusing than those in most books of the sort.

The Elementary German Course edited by Dr. Lange is divided into two parts. The first contains all those rules of the grammar that are generally useful in ordinary conversation or translation. The second part gives exercises to teach the practical application of these rules by turning German into English and vice versâ. To these are added a so-called historical sketch. In this sketch, which is compressed into one page, we have tried in vain to discover any history. It is merely a table of the Aryan languages of Europe, displayed in their several groups or families. It is not quite correct, for the language of Lithuania is left out altogether. German, Dr. Lange says, is now spoken in Switzerland and the Western provinces of Austria; thus he makes it out to be the language of over fifty-six millions of Europeans. This is only partially true, for of course every one knows that quite as many Swiss speak French and Italian as those who speak German, and that German is the official language of many Austrian provinces where it is not the tongue used by the people in everyday life. Dr. Lange's English is funny. "German and English Correspondences" he heads his vocabulary, and gives sentences "for translation into German or Extempore," as if the latter word were the name of another foreign tongue.

The author of a Manual of German Composition ought to look to his English and correct his own style before he gives advice on the subject to others. In his "Notes on Style" we find him cautioning the beginner against "keeping words or clauses apart which naturally belong together." This is the blind leading the blind indeed. He vaunts the great accuracy with which Germans can express their ideas from the richness of their vocabulary, and cites the number of words they have for a "field" or for "to kill" in illustration. But we could point out German words, on the other hand, which do duty for as many objects as if they were Chinese. Thus "Decke" may be the carpet, the hearth-rug, the counterpane, the table-cover, or the ceiling. And Decke is only a sample of a numerous class.

THE title of Mr. Maltman's Holiday Papers is misleading. It ought to mean papers to be perused in the holidays of the reader. It does mean papers composed in the holidays of Mr. Maltman. It might be contended that holiday is not, having regard to its etymology, the most appropriate word whereby to designate "the hours and days the writer could spare from the important duties of his calling as a preacher of the Gospel." However that may be, the volume, from the reader's point of view, is by no means of a holiday character. In the first place, a table, and that a stout one, is necessary for its convenient perusal, and its inclusion in the tourist's library would add seriously to the expense of Continental travel. Not counting a preface, an introduction, or a conclusion, each of which is substantially a paper in itself, the papers attain the respectable total of fifty-one, divided into nine chapters, and occupying no less than 625 large and closely-printed pages. Secondly, which is almost equally important, the moral characteristics of the essays are little, if at all, lighter than their collective physical entity. In this respect the author holds out a false hope in the preface by saying, "It is to be regretted that the style of this first paper is not quite what might have been desired. But it was felt that on such a question as teetotalism a little banter might attain the end sought easier than a great deal of solemn and weighty argument." No peculiar sprightliness animates the first paper. It is, indeed, somewhat liberally flavoured with passages sometimes on one side and sometimes on the other of the line which distinguishes mere vulgarity from vulgar blasphemy; but then, so are all its successors. We have not the pleasure of knowing in what conventicle Mr. Maltman preaches what gospel; but, whatever his location and doctrines may be, his style of expressing himself is common to an unfortunately large number of more or less honest, vigorous, and not particularly polished Dissenting ministers.

Having said so much, it is fully time to announce with satisfaction that few Dissenting ministers use their talents with such excellent intentions as those which animate Mr. Maltman. Maltman, by the way, is a name so appropriate to the admirable views concerning teetotalism which the author desires to enforce that any one unacquainted with the leading personages in Dissenting and temperance circles might almost be pardoned for suggesting the possibility of its being what the discoverer of Joseph Williams calls a nom de plume. For Mr. Maltman, from the first to the last of his 625 (and more) pages falls upon teetotallers, and smites them, taunts them, ridicules them, curses them, exposes their quibus bonis—this locution has been adopted advisedly, after deep consideration, and by and with the advice of an expert in baboo-English—annihilates their arguments, and generally routs them, slays them, and smashes them, as much as it is possible to rout, slay, and smash in print. It may be said that this is not the most difficult thing in the world, but no one could do it with a better will than Mr. Maltman, which is to his credit. He is particularly strong on the doctrinal side of the matter, and conclusively proves that teetotallers are Papists, Turks, Jews, and Atheists, with infinite gusto and determination. Sometimes, indeed, Mr. Maltman gets a little confused with the exuberance of his own logic, as when in the successful demolition of some teetotal argument to the effect that God made wine unfermented, and man fermented it, he asserts that "Man is a wonderful being, for he can make a piece of coal carry him across country before breakfast at the rate of fifty miles an hour, and think nothing of the feat either." A piece of coal which, after having been made to carry a man across hedges and ditches, sat down unconcernedly to consume its breakfast at the rate of fifty miles an hour, might not be a more wonderful, but would certainly be a more surprising, thing than a man. The argument incidentally mentioned above gives an idea of the sort of teetotal teaching against which Mr. Maltman took up his pen, and will by itself enable the ingenious reader to imagine the kind of monotonously crushing and almost cruel victories which Mr. Maltman gains on every page over his abject foe. But nothing satisfies his thirst for teetotal gore. He rushes from triumph to triumph, brandishing his battle-axe, and ever on to new triumphs. It is hardly to be hoped that sensible persons who agree with Mr. Maltman beforehand will follow him over any large proportion of his ensanguined course.

Naturally Mr. Maltman's method condemns him to suffer more or less from the vice of repetition. It appears that some Smith inserted in a teetotal tract a statement that, whenever any person tastes any intoxicating liquor "a start has already been made along that line which is so thickly strewn with the wreck of much that was great and noble." This unhappy passage Mr. Maltman quotes about a hundred times. The sentiment is certainly silly, the metaphor is vulgar, and the language is that of an uneducated man; but is the sentence worth repeating a second time? Also, from continuously whacking and slashing his detested enemy, Mr. Maltman has caught some of his affectations from him. Thus he is not free from the foolish habit of personifying all alcoholic potables as "the drink." Notwithstanding these faults it is probable that, if the Dissenting communities prone to the vice of teetotalism contain many human beings capable of reading Mr. Maltman's book through without expiring of weariness, it may be of some use. A person sharing Mr. Maltman's appetite for much argument and more vituperation on the topic of teetotalism, whichever side he took, could not be injured, and might be benefited, by its perusal. It would certainly not be a bad thing if noisy teetotallers were occasionally compelled to learn it by heart. The general public, which has made up its mind in favour of Mr. Maltman's main contention, will not be persuaded to read it.

THE ORIGIN OF ROOTS.*

IN The Principles of the Structure of Language, published about two years ago, Dean Byrne made an important, striking, but not quite accepted contribution to the study of comparative grammar. He set himself to account for the wide structural differences which separate different groups of languages by appealing mainly to the psychical differences which he believed to exist between the primitive peoples, as (for instance) in the various degrees of their mental excitability. Looking at language as "half mind and half matter," he set himself to trace the influence of mind upon matter. It was sufficiently risky to answer a still half-stated problem by plunging into the never verifiable conjectures of primitive psychology. That sort of thing did very well for the philosophers of the Social Contract. But the neo-grammarian has begun to set up his horn on high; he deals no longer in possibilities and probabilities; he has furnished himself with absolute principles, and scouts the "sporadic variations" of the "antiquated" Georg Curtius. Dean Byrne's present work, the Origin of the Greek, Latin, and Gothic Roots, is a departure, more daring than his last, from the sober regions of ascertainable phenomena, and takes us right away into the domain of "phonetic physiology." Dividing the past history of words into three set of laws—those of their original production, those of their subsequent change in utterance or form, and those of their subsequent change in meaning—he declares that only the second set have been investigated with any considerable success; that very little progress has been made with the third set, and that inquiry into the first set has been pronounced to be at present chimerical. It is this last "axiom of despair" which he now undertakes to disprove. He does not claim to have established certainties. He does not ask us to say that "this was so," only "it might have been so." His theory cannot be discussed here, but it may be expressed in outline. Objections and doubts will suggest themselves, but the reasoning is clearly and closely expressed; and, if it does not carry conviction, the theory or the subject-matter is at fault, not the exponent. It is to be feared that, in flippant or sceptical eyes, Dean Byrne has supplied further justification for the old gibe about "the vowels counting for nothing and the consonants not very much."

Starting from the principle that language was produced by man, not revealed to him in the form of roots, and observing that the Sanskrit, Greek, and other languages present "an apparent contradiction" in the double phenomenon of many different roots standing for nearly (if not quite) the same idea, and of many widely different ideas belonging to the same root, Dean Byrne asks the pertinent question how this state of things can be reconciled with "a nice discrimination of various meanings with various roots," or with "a correspondence between the sound itself and the impression which it made on the soul of the speaker." He finds it most remarkable that "the most expressive elements are those which have the least sound." Thus in the root pat (Skr.) Bopp finds the meanings ire, findere, dicere, splendere, and vestire; but in this root "the voice is only in the a; the p and t are mutes, not even sonant." On the other hand, the significance must be mainly in the p and t, inasmuch as the a is omitted in the Sanskrit writing. Therefore we must look for the correspondence between utterance and meaning in some correspondence between consonants and meaning. Of the three factors in speech—the voice, the breath in the mouth, and the muscular action of tongue and lips—the first, being chiefly concerned with vowels, is less important than the latter factors. Here we must quote Dean Byrne:—

> The utterance of a consonant involves an application more or less close of the tongue to some part of the palate or to the teeth, of the lips to each other, or of the under-lip to the upper teeth, an opening of that closure, and the passage of a jet of breath; and attention may fix either on the closure or on the breath, or on the mutual action of the two.

Thus we get under each consonant seven different phases of utterance, corresponding with seven different groups of the elements of thought, respectively suggestive each of the other. This is Dean Byrne's analysis, condensed from pp. 7 and 8:—

In the Closure	(1) Closure itself	ideas of contact, junction, coincidence, position, &c.
	(2) Concavity (formed either by lips or between tongue and palate)	enclosure, curvature, flexure, &c.
	(3) Relaxation (in lips or tongue)	softness, weakness, lassitude, &c.
	(4) End of closure (i.e. opening)	separation, partition, interval, &c.
	(5) Current of breath	motion, &c.
	(6) Pressure of breath	impact, tension, increase, &c.
	(7) Friction of breath	roughness, penetration, tearing, &c.

According to this system $p^1, p^2, p^3, p^4, p^5, p^6, p^7$ (for example) would be different elements of expression, and there would be a wider interval between any two phases of the same letter than between any two letters of the same phase. No doubt there would be a further power of distinction introduced by the difference of letters, especially by the broad difference between the various orders of letters. Thus by reason of the tongue's proximity to the soft part of the palate and of the viscousness of the saliva, the guttural in phase (1) was specially fit to express junction or adherence; in phase (4), strong separation, in phase (6) a breaking forth of growth or increase, and so on. The lips, on the other hand, having less muscular power than the tongue, were specially adapted in phase (1) to give the idea of simple apposition (particularly of doubleness) and in phase (4) of simple separation. Nor again were the vowels destitute of expressiveness, since they also require the organs of speech to be "put into certain definite positions." But "after every ingenuity of utterance had been exhausted," our primitive ancestors, struggling into language, must have found a wide interval between their means of expression and the very thought that was to be conveyed. Here Dean Byrne believes they helped themselves by "the analogies of use" and in a large degree by gesture.

Dean Byrne remarks that the nature of "the elements of expression" is a fundamental question of etymology. Differing from Max Müller's view that simple roots were increased and diversified as ideas grew and multiplied, and believing in the "primitive particularity of thought," he argues that many special elements were first produced, and that from them the more general terms were afterwards elaborated. Of this his fundamental principle he makes a happy application. Both Curtius and Mr. Max Müller agree in repudiating the connexion (which Bopp set up) between mare (Lat.) and vari (Skr.), and in deriving it from mar. Curtius connects this root with μαραίνω and marceo (to wither), the sea being fatal to vegetation (ἀτρύγετος), and quotes the affinities exhibited in the Gothic marei, the Old Dutch mære, and the Old High German muor. Max Müller traces the root mar from its original sense ("to destroy by friction") to the secondary sense ("to die, wither"), and finds it again in the Sanskrit maru, a desert, and thence transfers it to "that other desert the sea, which the Greeks called barren." Dean Byrne protests against this violent attribution of metaphor and poetic imagery to the mind of primitive man; he says that scientific etymologists of the present day pay no regard to any principle except phonetic laws, and violate "that which every consideration confirms," the primitive particularity of thought. In demolition Dean Byrne is not unsuccessful; let us see him in construction. In order to give the leading idea of the sea, the desideratum is a vivid representation of "fluid motion"; that will be found in flexile r in combination with the unimpeded flow of breath in a nasal or spiral consonant in the fifth phase of utterance. Accordingly he give us the following tabular confirmation of his theory:—

M_5r_5 mare, Goth. marei; μύρω; μορμύρος.
N_5r_5 Skr. nāra; ναρός; νηρίτης.
V_5r_5 Skr. vāri; οὖρον, urina; urinor; οὐρία; εὔριπος.
S_5r_5 Skr. saras and sarit; ὀρρός, serum; serra. Skr. sru, χ'ru.

The body of Dean Byrne's book consists of seven chapters, each dealing with one of his "seven phases of utterance" and enumerating the "Grounds." It should be said that a Root is to be distinguished from a Ground, because a Root, either by itself or with the addition of formative elements, constitutes a word; but a Ground is only "the partially organized material of the Root." To discuss this book in detail would be a pleasant scientific game, but it would not be suitable to these columns. Enough has been said about the Origin of Roots to show that it is a clever, suggestive, and perhaps important work. We believe the learning to be generally accurate. To conclude with two questions—Would Dean Byrne find any corroboration of his theory by studying the method under which dumb persons are taught to express their ideas without using the finger alphabet? or would he undertake to impart any of his "elements of expressiveness" to a class of dumb pupils unsophisticated by any other instruction? The smallest positive result would be better evidence of his theory than any amount of this subjective reconstruction of an imaginary process which is supposed to have occurred in a hypothetical state of society.

MEDICAL BOOKS.*

WE fear that a considerable number of schoolmasters and mistresses look upon themselves, in relation to their work, as so many machines for hammering into their pupils a certain daily quantum of the knowledge which they undertake to impart, and upon the latter as more or less convenient receptacles thereof. Dr. Warner's lectures are well calculated to correct this mistaken view, and to point out to those who have the management of children that, if they wish to avoid disastrous failures, they must study the individual peculiarities of the youngsters committed to their charge. It too frequently happens that the round boy is forced into the square hole, to the utter destruction of his chances of future usefulness and happiness. We believe that our teachers would compare favourably with any other class of the community for earnestness and conscientiousness in their work; but their success is not uncommonly marred by the incompleteness of their knowledge of the complex and variable being with whom they have to deal. Dr. Warner does not, of course, profess to give in half a dozen lectures a complete treatise on the study of children, but indicates the lines to be followed by parents and others responsible for the care of the young in educating themselves to understand them. The author justly observes that children with decided and obvious brain defects receive suitable training, whereas for those with slighter, and therefore more remediable, deficiencies no special provision is made. He suggests that "Small classes and specially trained teachers might be provided for the dull, the excitable, the wrongly-made children, as a safety and protection to society."

It is well that a school for the proper instruction of those who undertake the performance of massage should have been established. Until quite recently this valuable mode of treatment has been too much neglected in England, and patients requiring its application have been obliged to seek it on the Continent. As properly trained nurses have almost entirely superseded the "Gamps" of fifty years ago, so also it is to be hoped that the ignorant and obstinate "medical rubber" may give place to the educated and disciplined masseur and masseuse. The pamphlet under notice contains the concluding lecture of a six months' course delivered by Dr. Tibbits to the pupils at the Welbeck Street School of Electricity and Massage, together with a supplementary one on the circulatory and digestive organs. The former contains a detailed description of the manœuvres necessary in the performance of massage, and must have proved a useful adjunct to the clinical teaching of the subject. The latter is necessarily very elementary, but probably well adapted for the instruction of those to whom it was addressed.

We have read Dr. Money's little book on The Health of Children with much pleasure. It is written in simple language, and the information, which is concisely put, is just that which is required by every one who has the care of young children. The directions for feeding, clothing, and bathing them are most judicious, and the same may be said for the remarks on their nurseries and bedrooms, their exercise, amusements, and education. The author has, in our opinion most wisely, abstained from discussing the treatment of sick children, and so avoided giving his countenance to the popular error that, because a mother or nurse has had the benefit of the limited experience derived from the close observation of a small number of children, she is, therefore, competent to undertake their management when suffering from disease. Every mother should possess a copy of this excellent treatise, and its small price (sixpence) places it within the reach of all.

NEW PRINTS.

MR. DUNTHORNE is publishing several new etchings and other works of like sort. We have seen examples of facsimiles of twelve of Turner's Liber Studiorum series which Mr. Frank Short is executing in a mixture of etching and mezzotint. "Solway Moss," "Ben Arthur," "Bonneville," and "The Chain of the Alps" are among the number chosen. Mr. Short has succeeded, especially in his reproduction of the broad and noble "Solway Moss." Mr. D. Law, in his etching "Hawthornden," deals with an interesting and picturesque subject, and his point of view is well chosen; but his workmanship, a fuzzy mass of lines, has the aspect of an over-laboured pen-and ink drawing. Too many small lights and a poor choice in form and detail rob his etching of piquancy and concentration. "Schloss Zwingenburg, on the Neckar," is another effective subject, treated by Mr. A. H. Haig with sentiment, yet with hardly enough truth of value for an etching carried so far in tone. "L'Église des Dominicains: Arles," shows a better sense of tone, good architectural drawing, and some boldly placed black shadows. Still, the slighter and more sketchy "Regent's Canal" is decidedly Mr. Haig's best work. Here he makes good and legitimate use of the tool, and produces a charming and graceful composition without any appearance of useless labour. In "The Knoll, Taplow," Mr. F. Slocombe has run up two heavy and tiresome side scenes of dark, wiry, winter trees, which tell badly in his composition. If he cut out the centre and showed the cottage, one or two stems and lower branches, and less of the foreground, he could make a much prettier and more effective picture.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

WHOSOEVER invented the title of "History of Civilization" can hardly be acquitted of the charge of (in the words of the poet about another matter) "s'éprenant d'un problème inutile et stérile." An essay on the history of civilization any clever undergraduate or newly-made bachelor with his lecture notebooks pretty fresh in his head can of course write easily, though it may not be particularly easy to read it. But a History of Civilization is impossible. A full encyclopædia is a rather imperfect attempt at such a thing, and is the nearest approach to it. M. Rambaud (1), a clever and learned man, and a facile and ingenious writer, has illustrated these obvious truths very well, though not for the first time, by his fat volume on the History of Contemporary French Civilization in seven or eight hundred pages. It is really learned, really ingenious, really clever; but it is too voluminous for a conspectus, and infinitely too small for an exhaustive history. Divided into three books (from the Revolution to Waterloo, from the Restoration to 1848, from 1848 to the present day), it is subdivided into chapters on historical and administrative politics, national defence, education, literature, the arts, commerce, science, what not. And everywhere we find the same "betwixt and between." This age has been called the age of literary spoon-meat; certainly, if M. Rambaud's book survived alone, the student of the thirteenth century would not be likely to gainsay the proposition. And we cannot help wishing that so much knowledge and so much labour had been better spent.

Le fils de Coralie and Le père de Martial, popular as they were, were not great novels, but they were in every respect better than the even more popular works of M. Ohnet which followed and obscured their popularity. Also, Thérésine (2) is much better than anything that the author of Serge Panine has done or could do. Among other things, it is notable for a rather unusual vicissitude of story. The heroine, raised as a girl from almost the lowest degradation by an American millionaire (it must be admitted, an American very much de fantaisie), to be first his mistress, and then, when education and other things have developed a moral sense in her, his wife, is left a widow early, becomes a great lady in Paris, is machinated against by a rascally friend of her husband's, is delivered from him by other friends, is married a second time to a good young man, and yet ends unhappily in a fashion which need not be revealed. We shall only permit ourselves to remark that this second husband, represented as a model of chivalry, appears to us to be a rather miserable creature. The book is interesting. So also is Vaillante (3), though in a different way. It is one of the rare French novels—we certainly do not come across one a quarter, if we come across one a year—which are "young ladies' books," without being goody or childish. "Tiomane," the heroine, who is first the plaything and object-of-charity and then the good angel of a rich family, is capitally drawn in her kind, as indeed might be expected from the author of Misé Féréol. The hero, though a good fellow and, of course, an engineer ("O happy civil engineers!" as a bard, though he was not thinking of French novels, but of Lord Sherbrooke, once wrote), is rather a simpleton. There is no falling off in M. Fortuné du Boisgobey's (4) treatment of one of his favourite motives—the wicked stepmother who is false to her husband as well as fatal, or would-be fatal, to her stepdaughter. Indeed, we think there is more vigour in it than in his recent work. M. Matthey's (5) book, a sequel, as its title indicates, to his Billet de mille, is of the same class and also interesting. It begins with somebody entering casually into a garret by the window, as Planchet did, when the second series of immortal adventures began. But M. Matthey's room-climber was even luckier; for, instead of a tough and middle-aged Gascon gentleman, he found a very nice young lady, whom he was just in time to save from asphyxiation. The stories (for there are three) in M. de Braisne's (6) book are carefully and rather elaborately written, but there is nothing else of a very particular kind to be said about them. La neuvaine de Colette (7), which has, we believe, had some popularity in Paris, is worth noticing, chiefly because the anonymous author has modelled it with extraordinary closeness on the style of Miss Rhoda Broughton—so much so that one wonders whether a French Miss Broughton exists somewhere. The tales translated by M. Kolbert (8) from the Russian of different authors are short and mostly deal with manners, so that they make less of an addition to the dulness of nations than the longer romances which frozen Muscovia sends for that purpose in such numbers. Une aventure en Portugal (9) gives itself out as a true history, and we really do not know whether it is or not. It is in a way a crime-story, but such interest as it has (which is not great) comes mainly from the fact that its scene is in one of the least visited districts of Europe, the Southern provinces, Alemtejo and Algarve, of Portugal. But the heroine is not so nice as Alaciel.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

SINCE the Treaty of Berlin the traveller in Bulgaria has become quite a common object, and books on Bulgarian history and politics have increased apace. Mr. James Samuelson's Bulgaria Past and Present (Trübner & Co.) does not add much to the general stock of information collected in recent literature on the subject. It comprises a brief historical retrospect, a résumé of the dramatic events since the abortive triumph of San Stefano that have set all Europe at gaze, and a general survey of the present condition of the Bulgarian people, compiled from the traveller's note-books. Mr. Samuelson has a good deal to say that is interesting concerning the country and its industrial prospects, as, indeed, must happen to an observant man who journeys over the Servian frontier from Slivnitza even unto Rustchuk. He is less illuminative when discussing the political outlook, and he wisely declines to offer any forecast based on the present situation. His descriptive narrative, which is well illustrated by woodcuts and "collotype" plates, is brightly written, and includes vivid pictures of peasant life, the flowery region of Kazanlik, the Shipka Pass, Philippopolis, Gabrovo, and Tirnova. The last-named town, with its romantic position on the Jantra, and its many curious antiquities, is a marvel of nature and art that stirs the enthusiasm of the traveller who, as he says, is familiar with the wonders of the world. From the woodcuts the place appears to be a miniature Constantine. Mr. Samuelson interviewed Prince Ferdinand at Sofia and Prince Alexander of Battenberg at Buda-Pest. These interviews do not seem to have been remarkably fruitful, in a political sense; though Mr. Samuelson considers it necessary to assure the reader that he violates no confidence in his account of the second interview. His report of Prince Alexander accords in all respects with the reputation of the late ruler of Bulgaria. It is not surprising, though important perhaps, to note one observation. "He assured me," says Mr. Samuelson, "that, before he abdicated, he had received a formal promise from the Russian Government that they would not attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of Bulgaria. Nekludoff, the Russian agent at Sofia, furthermore told him that, if he left the country, the cause of Russian enmity towards Bulgaria would be removed."

Mr. H. Guillaume has compiled a handbook—The Amazon Provinces of Peru (Wyman & Co.)—that ought to set all persons about to emigrate agog to visit Lima and the Montana and the Amazonian provinces of Peru. It is positively heartrending to read in this glowing volume of the neglected resources of Peru. Sir Epicure Mammon's splendid vision in the alchemist's den was no poet's fancy; Mr. Guillaume proves it by eloquent reports of travellers, engineers, planters, geologists, and the like, and by the still more eloquent tables of statistics collected from all available quarters. "Here's the rich Peru, and there the golden mines, great Solomon's Ophir." Nothing has been omitted to complete the seductive quality of this guide to the true earthly paradise. Besides the practical prospects of gain cunningly spread before miners, speculators, planters, and so forth, there are ravishing woodcuts of magnificent rivers and mountains, and a charming photographic group of the ladies of Lima—"noble specimens of female loveliness," says the eminent Dr. von Tschudi—and very beautiful ladies they are. Every visitor to the Mining Exhibition to be held at Lima next summer ought to possess Mr. Guillaume's very interesting volume. It is compact, portable, and crammed with useful information. The neglect of Peru as a field for emigration, while the Argentine Republic is annually flooded with Italians, and La Plata and Brazil receive a steady influx of European population, is certainly not a little remarkable. Perhaps Peru is on the wrong side of the continent, and the Panama Canal may prove its best ally. Be this as it may, Mr. Guillaume's book can hardly fail to attract many Englishmen to Peru.

Charles Dickens and the Stage, by T. Edgar Pemberton (Redway), is an example of book-making that will not be viewed with disfavour by lovers of Dickens, however they may detest the class of compilation to which it belongs. The book shows diligent research in many directions, and it is embellished with portraits of Mr. Irving as Alfred Jingle, Mr. Toole as the "Artful Dodger," and Miss Jennie Lee as "Jo." Padding there is, of course, and a good deal of quotation from Dickens that assumes on the compiler's part an incredible flagging memory in his readers. For all these drawbacks, the record of the novelist's relations to actors and acting may be dipped into, and will be found interesting by many.

The new half-yearly volume of Book Lore (Elliot Stock) contains perhaps the usual amount of papers on "old-time literature," as the title has it, and decidedly more of extraneous and undesirable matter. Notes on library sales, bibliography, rare editions, and other bookish lore are always welcome in this magazine. But it is hard to say why it should interest the bibliophile to know that Mr. Grant Allen does not approve of novels, or that Mr. T. P. O'Connor is about to edit a newspaper, or that Walt Whitman is impressed into the "Camelot Classics." What have these precious literary items to do with a "Bibliophile's Kalendar"?

The Antiquary (Elliot Stock) is, on the other hand, much more true to its original scheme. The "news" columns, for instance, in this excellent periodical are really antiquarian, and quite pertinent as a chronicle of current research. The "Antiquarian's Note-book," again, is full of good matter, and worthy of comparison with the palmy days of the Gentleman's Magazine. The original contributions are altogether up to the standard of previous volumes.

The minor bards cease not. J. R. W.—A Book of Verse (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.)—is a modest and not unmelodious singer. "I wrote to please myself alone, not others," is his plèa. It is a pity he qualifies it by the hypothetical "one" here and there "among the throng who'll hear my song." His adaptations of Horace are a little free; his version of Niobe's sad fate is by no means bad, if not Ovidian, and he rhymes "halo" with "shallow." Mr. Isaac Sharp's Saul of Tarsus (Kegan Paul)—with a sequel, "Paul the Aged"—is oddly compacted of triplets and strong phrases:—

> Saul of Tarsus, silently,
> With a silent company
> To Damascus' gates drew nigh.
> * * *
> And his eyes, too, and his mien
> Were, as are the eagles', keen;
> All the man was aquiline.

The Chronicle of Mites (Kegan Paul) is a "politico-philosophico-theological satire," by James Aitchison, Minister, Falkirk, and the humour of it lies in the not very original concept of viewing a ripe cheese and its inhabitants as a microcosm of human vanities —a mitey maze, yet not without a plan. As satire is now, the satire may pass. It is less pungent than the material of the poet's vision, and, to say truth, deplorably tedious stuff.

If Mr. Allen Upward desires to typify his sojourn in Philistia by his Songs in Ziklag (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.), he reveals nothing of the promise of a sweet singer in Israel. Ziklag is evidently as unpropitious as Gath, to judge from these sonnets and songs. It seems they have pleased some, and that is sufficient excuse for "committing them to the public press." And so "I, too," says Mr. Upward—like Shakspeare and Petrarch—"have sung my lullabies in vain,"

> And thrown my sonnets on the maddening pyre
> Of passion.

Among our new editions and translations are Professor Nichol's Tables of European History, fourth edition, revised and enlarged (Glasgow: Maclehose); History of the People of Israel, translated from the French of M. Renan by Messrs. C. B. Pitman and D. Maurice, R.A., the official record of events in Egypt from May 1882 to the close of Lord Wolseley's campaign (Harrison & Sons); The Geological Record for 1879, edited by W. NEW BOOK BY MR. FROUDE.

THE ENGLISH IN THE WEST INDIES; Or, THE BOW OF ULYSSES.

By JAMES A. FROUDE.

One Volume 8vo. price 18s.

The Times.—"Mr. Froude's brilliant book on the West Indies is, perhaps, the most enjoyable he has ever written, and has a wider interest than might be inferred from the title. Never has he thrown himself with more intensity into those broad and burning questions which concern the future of the empire. Never has he found happier opportunity for fervent eloquence or picturesque description, and he has seldom displayed his powers to greater advantage. He has ingeniously searched out analogies and contrasts; he has drawn wide political deductions from the facts that have come under his observation; by turns he is persuasive, indignant, or sarcastic, and not infrequently he breaks out in scathing invective. Consequently, the book is full of a double interest, for it reflects on every page the opinions and personality of the writer."

With 10 Full-page Illustrations, a Map, and 28 Illustrations in the Text, One Volume, 8vo. price 24s.

THE LONG WHITE MOUNTAIN; Or, A JOURNEY IN MANCHURIA,

With an Account of the History, Administration, and Religion of that Province.

By H. E. M. JAMES,

Of Her Majesty's Bombay Civil Service.

Scotsman.—"To what profitable and enjoyable service the two years' furlough of an Indian civil official may be put is admirably illustrated in Mr. James's narrative of his travels in Manchuria. Adventure, sport, and information are all to be found in abundance in China, north of the Great Wall, and the track followed by the author, while it carried him over a good deal of new ground, is chiefly of importance in showing how large and full of interest for the specialist in politics and in science, as well as for the general reader, is the area covered by the 'three Eastern Provinces,' the cradle of the present Manchu dynasty, and the future field, as many believe, of another struggle with a northern invader for possession of the Dragon Throne."

"A lively account of a cycling tour in France, along roads and through towns and hamlets immortalized by Sterne, the results of which ought to communicate much of the pleasures of the excursion to the discreet reader. You may fairly measure the enjoyment of the trip by the joyous spirit of the voyagers' notes and the radiance and expansive force of Mr. Pennell's delightful drawings." Saturday Review.

The ISLAND: an Adventure of a Person of Quality. A Novel. By RICHARD WHITEING. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"The author's style has an elegance which gives the best effect to the vigour of his thought. Such good work is rare as modern satire goes. The book, though grimly humorous on occasion, has the strength which comes of earnestness and a touch of the indignation which drove the Roman poet to make verses. It is a powerful book, and should be widely read."—Scotsman.

EUROPEAN PROSPECTS.

A STATELY funeral has put an end to the ceremonial part of that German mourning the effect of which has been felt not only in Germany, and not least in England, where it partly obscured the rejoicings over the Silver Wedding of the Prince and Princess of WALES. As is usual, necessary, and well, Germany and Europe will now have to turn from mourning and from pageantry to business. Such circumstances as the death of the Emperor WILLIAM and the accession of the Emperor FREDERICK always bring out evidence of that gobemouche who exists, and by no means dies young, in more than three-fourths of political critics. His prominence on the present occasion has been of two kinds. There has been some mild wonder and satisfaction expressed that the death of one whose life has for many years been recognized as a strong guarantee of peace has not been followed by any immediate sign of war. Apparently those who thus speak expected the new FREDERICK to plunge at once into some new Silesia, in imitation of his great ancestor. The other symptom is a little less obviously absurd, but hardly more intrinsically reasonable. The Proclamation to the German people and the rescript to Prince BISMARCK appear to have excited the most lively hopes. Signs of "Liberalism" are discerned all over them; signs which, considering that it is the negation of "Liberalism" which has made Germany strong, prosperous, and great, would, if they existed, be of evil augury to all wise Teutons. Peace—as if peace depended on any man's word—is supposed to be more secure than ever. Reactionaries, it is announced with delight, are depressed and sorrowful. The time of men of blood and iron is over, and the blessed dawn of constitutional and Parliamentary government, which means the laborious construction of a certain policy for so many years, and then the laborious frustration and reversal of it for so many more, is appearing in Germany. In short, redeunt Saturnia regna. Alas! the Saturnian kingdom has been coming back at the beginning of every new reign and every new régime of every kind for a considerable number of centuries; but somehow or other it has never come.

When the documents are examined with other eyes than those of newspaper Correspondents, anxious for something striking to telegraph, it is impossible to discover in them anything which, in a reasonable mind, can give occasion to any particular hope, or to any particular fear. REHOBOAM was probably the first sovereign to signalize his accession by a frank announcement of the intended substitution of scorpions for whips; and the experiment ended so disastrously that no one, not even JAMES II., has tried it since. Least of all could it be expected that a soldier and statesman of proved ability and well-known principles like the present EMPEROR would do violence at once to common sense, decency, and his own antecedents by issuing, with his dead father yet unburied, a programme breathing fire and fury towards foreigners, arbitrary power and reactionary principles towards his subjects. It was not quite so impossible, but nearly as improbable, that he should encourage idle hopes and provoke not so idle fears by any complaisance towards the windy cries of constitution-mongers and demagogues. Accordingly the actual documents partake very much of the well-known nature of our own QUEEN's Speeches in their vaguer and more general parts, with, of course, details altered to suit the case. Both the fact of the address of the rescript to Prince BISMARCK and the tenor of the rescript itself dispose of the idle notion that the main pillar of the German Empire is to be dispensed with because of some fantastic crotchet of Liberalism. The Proclamation is on exactly the same lines. That it should be peaceful in tone, or rather in expression, is as much a matter of course as that it should contain compliments, quite just and reasonable, to the memory of the dead EMPEROR. But the significant reference to German arms in the one document, and the explicit declaration of the undiminished maintenance of the Imperial army and navy, have more meaning than "ingeminations of peace," which are not, and could not have been, much more practical than those of Lord FALKLAND. A "stronghold of peace," if not an ambiguous or a self-contradictory, is certainly a double-edged, term. Nor could anything be more distinct than the words in which the EMPEROR proclaims his adhesion to the HOHENZOLLERN theory of the inseparable connexion of prince and people. What that theory is is perfectly well known. It is the negation of the principles, not merely of persons like Messrs. LABOUCHERE and CARNEGIE, but of old-fashioned English Whig constitutionalists. It enjoins on the King, indeed, the sacrifice of all private feelings and pleasures to the welfare of his people, but it insists on the fact that he alone is the judge of what constitutes that welfare, and of the means by which it is to be promoted. As for the promises of protection to art, science, education, and so forth, they are no doubt perfectly sincere; but they are nothing new.

It is not, therefore, at any published declarations or programmes that reasonable people will look for the effect of the change in Berlin, but at the circumstances of the case. Undoubtedly there are changes there. It may have been customary to overvalue the effect of the personal relations between the CZAR and the Emperor WILLIAM; but they existed. The ill-health, regretted by all, both for selfish and unselfish reasons, of the present Emperor FREDERICK must, if nothing else, deter Germany from aggressive enterprises. But of such no one suspected her, except a few irresponsible Frenchmen; and this same ill-health may be a temptation to enemies and must be an additional stimulus to German statesmen to show that it must not be presumed upon. Otherwise, the only necessary or even obvious change is that there is one good German less in Germany, and that another, as good it may be hoped, has taken his place. But the circumstances which have so long disturbed Europe remain in other respects exactly the same. There is the abiding ill-will of the Russian people and of the French people towards Germany. There is the abiding conviction of the CZAR that it is the duty of a Russian Emperor to keep his hand against every man, to enlarge his borders perpetually, and to regard no terms and no treaties that stand in the way of such enlargement. There is the unhealed wound of the Bulgarian question. In respect to this last, indeed, matters are not looking, for the moment, very threatening. The peculiar form of the Turkish despatch on the subject of Prince FERDINAND's status excited some surprise. But it had this convenience—a convenience in all probability anticipated by the astute persons who drew it up—that it required no answer, except at most a bare acknowledgment of receipt for politeness' sake. A question requires an answer; a command at least suggests some sort of reply intimating compliance or non-compliance. But a mere statement of fact and opinion of fact leaves reply wholly voluntary, and makes the absence of it neither discourteous nor disloyal. The equivalent of a silent bow is all that is necessary. And especially in this new state of things the Bulgarian Ministers and the PRINCE—who is, in the opinion of Constantinople, only half a Prince—would do well to do as little as possible. It is extremely improbable that the new German EMPEROR will volunteer Pomeranian bodies for the defence of Bulgarian soil. But, if he is credited justly with anything, it is with a predilection and respect for constitutional equity as well as for constitutional law. It is certain that Russia has no legal right to interfere in Bulgaria, and the ingenious pleadings of the Chancellor Prince have not exactly established her equitable right. But it is no doubt true that the chief interest of the present moment is less to see how the change of sovereigns affects German policy than to see how it affects Russian; and that has yet to be seen. One of the worst possible effects of Lord Randolph Churchill's foolish words in the House of Commons on Tuesday would be the creation of any idea in the Czar's mind that it is safe to disregard England in forming his European plans. But Russian statesmen are, as a rule, fairly well informed, and they can tell the Czar, if he will listen to them, what value is to be attached to the statements of a politician like Lord Randolph when he is out of office, and endeavouring to pose as a more liberal and enlightened statesman than his late colleagues.

THE EMPEROR WILLIAM.

The Emperor William was one of three contemporary sovereigns who attempted or effected a great extension of their respective dominions. Nearly thirty years ago Napoleon III. had attracted to himself the largest share of the attention, if not the admiration, of Europe. The victories of Magenta and Solferino had revived and increased the military reputation of France, and careless observers scarcely understood that the moderate terms of the Peace of Villafranca had been imposed on the French Emperor by the threat of Prussian intervention. The annexation of Savoy and Nice in the following year excited well-founded alarm. There was little doubt that Napoleon III. had formed a plan for the acquisition of the Rhine provinces by an arrangement which was to include territorial compensation to Prussia at the expense of the smaller German States. It was probably in the hope of furthering his project that the Emperor in 1860 proposed a visit to the Prince Regent, afterwards William I., at Baden. On his arrival he was profoundly disappointed by finding the chief North German princes assembled to do him honour. When he protested against the general suspicion of his designs, the Prince Regent, while he politely accepted his disclaimer, requested him to communicate his assurances to the Regent's guests and allies. From this time the French Emperor ought to have understood that he had nothing to hope from the divisions of the purely German States; but it was still possible that he might profit by the chronic jealousy between Prussia and Austria. If he had boldly struck in on the side of Austria in 1866, he might perhaps have succeeded in aggrandizing France and in perpetuating the German schism; but he was befooled by a more sagacious diplomatist than himself with hopes or hints which were summarily repudiated as soon as the struggle was decided at Sadowa. It was not believed that King William had personally encouraged the ambitious hopes of his dangerous neighbour. He must have heartily agreed with his Minister in the determination not to surrender an inch of German soil. A French aggressor had now to deal not with an inferior adversary, but with the Prussian Kingdom enlarged by the acquisition of Hanover, of Holstein, and of Schleswig, with the North-German Confederation, and, as it soon appeared, with the other German States exclusive of Austria. To a public declaration of the Emperor Napoleon that the Southern States were no parties to the national alliance, the Prussian Chancellor replied by the publication of a treaty in which they had bound themselves, not only to join in a defensive war, but to place their armies under the King of Prussia as commander-in-chief.

At every point during the long diplomatic contest the restless French adventurer found himself anticipated and baffled by his resolute adversary. The desperate venture of 1870 was an attempt to retrieve a long series of diplomatic defeats. There is no doubt that, as Regent and as King, William I. sincerely desired the maintenance of the minor German dynasties. It was necessary for the common safety that the conduct of foreign affairs should be transferred to the chief of the Confederation, who afterwards accepted from his allies the title of Emperor. Even the King of Hanover might have been compensated for the loss of his kingdom by the Duchy of Brunswick if he would have consented to recognize the supremacy of the Emperor. Of all the disestablished potentates, the recognized claimant to the Elbe Duchies had the strongest reason to complain. It is believed that Prince Bismarck had difficulty in obtaining the consent of his sovereign to some of the arrangements of 1866. They heartily agreed in making the unity and strength of Germany the main objects of their policy. On the important question of the annexation of a portion of French territory they may perhaps have differed. There could be no question of the right conferred by conquest, and Alsace, if not Lorraine, was ethnologically German, though the inhabitants almost unanimously preferred their French allegiance. Two centuries ago Alsace had been treacherously seized by France; but the defect of title had been cured by lapse of time. Prince Bismarck held that the Empire would have been the stronger for the exclusion of the two disaffected provinces; but the heads of the army thought that Strasburg and Metz were required for military purposes, and the newly-elected Emperor, who was before all things a soldier, probably shared the opinion of his generals. The triumph of Prussia, and the ruinous defeat of the French Emperor, were not to be exclusively attributed to differences in ability and character. The union of all Germany, outside the Austrian provinces, into one powerful State was a natural and legitimate operation. During the whole course of modern history the great German nation had been divided against itself; and again and again, in successive generations, a part of the population had allied itself with foreigners, and especially with the rulers of France, against the mass of its countrymen. In no single instance, except for a short time during the last campaigns of Napoleon, was the whole strength of Germany combined against an invader. It has consequently become an axiom in the opinion of such statesmen as Thiers that France is injured when Germans no longer consent to be divided, and to be therefore weak. The obvious remedy was to unite Germany under a single head, with the result of making a hostile alliance with a foreigner an act of legal as well as virtual treason.

The policy of Napoleon III., from his accession to his fall, was personal, arbitrary, and selfish. At one period of his reign he seemed to hold a splendid position; but he impaired his further chances of success by provoking universal distrust. The German Emperor had merely to watch and utilize the force of political gravitation. His rival, afterwards his prisoner, pursued his own interests without regard to national tendencies. A third competitor for fame as a statesman and as a soldier had a far more difficult task than either William or Napoleon. Victor Emmanuel from his youth was bent on achieving the emancipation of Italy from Austria and her indigenous satellites in the Duchies and in Naples. His own forces were insufficient for the task, but his resolution and his diplomatic subtlety supplied all the defects of his position. He caused the French Emperor, whom he regarded with unbounded dislike and contempt, to do his work, and he induced Republican fanatics to assist in the establishment of a constitutional monarchy. The King of Prussia had not only Bismarck, but Moltke and Roon, at his side. The King of Sardinia had, indeed, Cavour, who might compare in ability with Bismarck; but he also made use of Garibaldi, and he overcame or defeated the hostility of Mazzini. Some of those who had good opportunities of judging believed that Victor Emmanuel could have accomplished his task even without the aid of Cavour. It is no disparagement to the first German Emperor to say that he could not have dispensed with Bismarck. The two chief authors of German and Italian unity had some characteristics in common. They were both by natural aptitude and inclination soldiers, though the Emperor had none of the roughness and dislike of ceremony which distinguished the Piedmontese mountaineer. Both sovereigns were religious according to the simplest type, though they belonged to different communions. Both were thoroughly to be trusted when they had pledged themselves to any cause. Victor Emmanuel had probably little admiration for Parliamentary government; but he never attempted to tamper with the Constitution which he had created. The German Emperor was, perhaps, legally justified in deeming that his own prerogative was still more sacred than the powers of Parliament.

The condemnation of hereditary claims which lately found favour with a considerable minority of the House of Commons derives no support from the history of Prussia. Two centuries have passed since the Great Elector of Brandenburg restored the prosperity of his dominions after the desolation which had been caused by the Thirty Years' War. His son, though his memory has been treated slightly by historians, conferred an inestimable benefit on his family and the State by assuming the Royal title. His descendants might never have aspired to make a kingdom if they had not first called themselves kings. A part of the coronation ceremony has exercised a marked influence on the constitutional policy of Prussia. It was, perhaps, an anomaly that a sovereign should acquire new prerogatives by the simple device of assuming a crown which he thenceforward proceeded to hold "by the grace of God." The pious formula was not treated as a mere form by the departed King. When he was crowned, according to custom, at Königsberg, he placed the crown on his own head, in token of his independence of all other human agency. On every fit occasion he afterwards repeated the assertion of his divine right. A mere Elector would probably not have justified on the same grounds a claim to regulate the numbers and the pay of his army in defiance of successive Parliaments. Prince Bismarck, who may or may not have shared his master's conviction, appreciated its practical utility, and frequently reminded the Parliament of the supernatural origin of the royal power. The first Frederick William, son of Frederick the first King, believed not less reverently in the formula which insured his uncontrolled dominion. Frederick the Great, who had few religious or ritual proclivities, took care that his subjects should acknowledge his divine or indefeasible right to govern. The accomplished elder brother of the late Emperor also took pleasure in dwelling on the divine right which was acquired at his coronation. It is not surprising that the members of the great House of Hohenzollern should cherish the belief that they are set apart by a providential ordinance. It must be confessed that Nature is more ready than the democracy to recognize the hereditary transmission of governing capacity.

THE INDIAN FRONTIER.

A SATISFACTORY debate in the House of Commons on an Indian subject is one of the rarest experiences of the Parliamentary Session, and the debate of Tuesday last, therefore, deserves a white stone. It was, of course, not wholly satisfactory. The attempt made by Lord Randolph Churchill to justify the accusations of those friends of Russia who represent him as a person capable of being converted to Russophilism by a visit of a week or two and a few pleasant parties at St. Petersburg is, of course, to be regretted. But it is refreshing to remember that no politician is more convinced of the futility of sticking to any particular utterance. And even Lord Randolph was sound enough on the general question, his reference to Russia being, after all, of the vaguest character, and at least admitting of the interpretation (which we have not the least desire to controvert) that it is quite unnecessary, not to say undesirable, for England to set herself of malice prepense to thwart Russia where no English duty or interest is concerned. Mr. Slagg and Mr. Caine and Mr. Smith exhibited, of course, the invariable and apparently either congenital or judicial incapacity of the ordinary Radical member of Parliament to deal with Imperial questions. Mr. Slagg's description of the modest process of putting locks on your stable-door as "a policy in mad career," of the mountains of the Khoja Amram as "an unfruitful plain," and so forth, might have been written beforehand by any tolerably skilled parodist. But the victory of the Lancashire manufacturer over the Indian philanthropist shown by Mr. Slagg's anxiety about the reimposition of "the obnoxious duty on imported cotton "goods" was really funny and genuine. Mr. Caine deserves at least the credit of not attempting to wander after Mr. Slagg into the unfamiliar region of high politics, and of confining himself to such well-understood subjects as "six quart bottles," wherein he was followed by the philanthropic Mr. Samuel Smith. But all these things were familiar enough and of little enough importance. It was newer and more refreshing to find that the front Opposition bench left the old fallacies of the backward policy to be uttered only by Mr. Bryce, and that Mr. Bryce was most moderate and careful in uttering them. It is true that after the experience of the Government to which he belonged such moderation was almost unavoidable. The short title of Mr. Gladstone's second and third administrations in history will not improbably be "the Government "which in less than seven years' tenure of office did its best "to lose Ireland and India." But whereas the efforts in respect to Ireland increased as time went on, those in reference to India followed a happier course. Mr. Gladstone lived to hear his own officials confess that they had disapproved the policy they were forced to carry out, and to order the resumption, at a vast increase of expense, of the works which he had discontinued. It was unavoidable that even a politician so honest and consistent in certain kinds of unwisdom as Mr. Bryce should, in such circumstances as these, "sing small."

The speeches of Sir John Gorst, of Sir Richard Temple, and of Sir Edward Hamley on the other side were as much to the point, as forcible, and as successful as the speeches of their opponents were vague and uncertain. Those who are intimately acquainted with Indian affairs and with the opinions of the remarkably able administrators, both military and civil, in whose hands for the last year or two India has had the good fortune to be, may find nothing new to them in these expositions. But these very persons will be the first to congratulate themselves and the country on having the facts put before the British public by such an administrator as Sir Richard Temple, and by such a soldier as Sir Edward Hamley. The demonstration which Sir Edward made of the general character and necessity of the new works of which the entrenched camp beyond Quetta and the Khojak tunnel are the most important is exceedingly welcome. Lamentable as are the fluctuations of English policy, it is scarcely possible, after the words used by Mr. Childers, that at least the most important parts of the new frontier defence scheme should be interfered with. For, as Mr. Childers himself justly enough remarked, this scheme is a necessary complement, or rather an integral part, of the settlement on the other side of Afghanistan, which was arranged by Mr. Gladstone, and perforce carried out by Lord Salisbury three years ago. The acknowledgment, it is true, comes a little late. For it was always contended here and by all intelligent upholders of the policy of keeping Russia back, that the necessity of costly works of this kind was one of the main objections to the policy of perpetual retreat advocated by Gladstonians, that by a blind trust in "deserts and mountains" we were infallibly bringing ourselves to the position of having to provide artificial substitutes for the deserts and the mountains when they were crossed. But nothing can be further from the desires of any one who understands the question than to indulge in recriminations at this moment. All that we can wish is that the policy of defence which has been elaborated by Sir Frederick Roberts, and sanctioned by Lord Dufferin, should be carried out.

That policy is very simple, is in no sense aggressive, and, so far as it has been already carried, it has met with great success in more than one important point. Whether its supporters do or do not maintain that a grave mistake was made in abandoning Candahar—and we think we may say that both views are represented among them—they do not propose to go back there. The most they propose is to secure the power of getting there before anybody else. They do not advocate the occupation of any new territory, but merely the transformation of the English district of Pishin into a sort of outwork or barbican, capable of being strongly garrisoned and easily reached. The great work of the Khojak tunnel is recommended, not merely to quicken, but to cheapen, the process of concentrating the defence on this point if needful. Sir Edward Hamley was speaking well within the mark when he said that the whole railway system required might have been made for less than the cost of the baggage animals which were procured and wasted in the last Afghan war, not only at a first cost lavish in itself, but with results disastrous to the districts from which they were drawn. It is argued also, and that not as a matter of probability but of already proved fact, that two great moral advantages are being gained by these operations. It has been constantly contended by the "backwards" that the unpopularity of any military occupation of, or operation in, Afghan territory with the natives outweighs its military advantages. The reply is that for some years past now operations have been going on; that the Afghan tribes in the district not only show no jealousy, but are thoroughly satisfied with the increased employment and facilities for trade which have been given; that dislike of Englishmen has not only not increased, but has very largely diminished, if it has not entirely disappeared. It is argued also that the evidence given of the strength and the neighbourhood of the English, and of their determination, not indeed to advance, but to hold their own, is exactly what is needed in order to prevent the restless dread of Russia and the sense that it is wisest to make terms with her. Now this dread and this sense have been the main instruments of all recent Russian conquests. All this together makes a very strong case indeed, and its strength could hardly have been better shown than by Mr. BRYCE's finding nothing to say against the tunnel except that he is afraid of being asked to go further when it is made. We had thought that Liberals like Mr. BRYCE were never tired of laughing at the "thin end of the wedge" argument. But that argument could never be more unhappily applied than here. For the great plea for the tunnel is that of itself it will make it unnecessary to go further in time of peace and cheap and easy to prevent the enemy coming further in time of war.

THE WEATHER AND THE TIMES.

PERHAPS it was the report on the New York blizzard that stirred an emulative pen in Thursday's Times to a wonderful example of newspaper meteorology entitled the "Vicissitudes of Spring." Perhaps the mandate went forth—"Tip in something flowery, of flaming crocus and "the windy month of daffodils, of farmy fields, and the "cockney joys of spring, of sudden snows and miraculous "thaws." The result fairly beats THEODORE HOOK's cunningest parody of LEIGH HUNT's metropolitan style. It is all about the weather changes between Saturday and Wednesday last; a confused chatter about rain, wind, snow, flowers, buds, trees, and the fickle ways of our unhappy climate. There was nothing unusual in the changes of weather that provoked this gush of flabby sentiment and spurious science. They were such as occur every year with more or less well-marked character; but, like every frost, or snowfall, or thunderstorm, they cause as much surprise as an earthquake. If every seasonable phase in the annual round of weather is to bring forth a similar effusion, the old formula, "The Weather and "the Parks," will have a formidable rival in "The "Weather and the Times." Saturday, the 10th of March, was a memorable day, "full of suggestions of Para-"dise." Your common, or garden observer—your gardener, to wit—would say it was but middling, on the whole; and cautiously add that it promised some sort of weather before night. "The opening buds beat their record of the season, "violets opened their petals wide to the genial warmth of "the sun, the crocus beds blazed forth in Assyrian glory of "purple and gold"—not a bad day's work for our sober clime. The reference to the violets is a fine old Cockney notion, and what can be said of buds beating their record? Did they beat time by unseasonably turning themselves inside out, or by marking the rhythmical passage of the breeze? Or, perhaps, it was the flowers, the fastidious violets that "love to live i' the sun," that beat their record. "Sunday came, and afterwards Monday"—indisputable, though delicately exact—and "the god of war was in his "leonine mood," which means that the wind had veered from S.W. to N.E. Then follows a reflection as portentous as anything in this solemn babbling of wind and weather:— "February fill-dyke has passed, and at its end the water-"courses were not filled with water"—they are now, praise be to AQUARIUS!—"without which neither man, beast, nor "fowl, to say nothing of the herb that groweth in the field, "can by any means thrive." And thus does our chronicler struggle towards Tuesday, the 13th, with unutterable pomp and prodigality of platitude.

"On Tuesday came a great and grievous change. As the "shades of night began to fall the windows of heaven were "opened, the wild north-easter rushed forth, like a giant, to "run his course, and brought a vicious storm of fine snow "in his train." Here's a pretty rout of striking images coming with quick vehemence in a hail of words. This is your true fine writing. Nor is the calmer descriptive style wanting. Here is a picture, complete by a few masterly touches, such as artists in black and white and painters who know what is meant by light and shade will delight in:—"Driven snow in spring is another matter. It "produces strange half effects. One side of a tree is "clothed in white, but on the lee the trunk is black." "Half effects" is good, and good also is the half effect of an etching, or the half effect of light and shade in a painting. On that terrible Tuesday "weathercocks and the like "were invisible"; but an "uplifted finger, moistened sailor-"wise"—as MASTERMAN READY instructed little WILLIAM SEAGRAVE—brought comfort to the distressed observer. "The cold upon the south-eastern side of the finger told "the story of a veering wind." The god of war was beaten, and on the morrow "those who had been full of complaint "overnight began to understand, with the Laureate, that "GOD fulfils himself in many ways." Wednesday was a nice moist day. The tell-tale finger was right, the wind had veered, and the perturbed chronicle ends in meek resignation.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

THE Local Government Bill will be introduced on Monday, and it is too late to make practical suggestions in the hope of any immediate result. Mr. RITCHIE, to whom the Bill is entrusted, will have a difficult task; but the great importance of the measure will render his colleagues as well as himself responsible for its conduct through the House of Commons. They have had sufficient notice of the intentions of the Opposition. Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. PARNELL will almost certainly discourage obstruction and offer the Government every facility for alarming or alienating its own supporters. On suitable occasions amendments will be proposed for the purpose of detaching, if possible, from the majority the more Radical section of the Liberal-Unionists; but there is reason to believe that the Bill will disappoint its assailants by the popular nature of its main provisions. There is no longer any useful purpose to be served by inquiring whether it was judicious to attempt organic legislation in the absence of any general demand for a change. All parties have, with more or less sincerity, pledged themselves to a policy which some of their members may have approved. Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH and his predecessor, Sir MASSEY LOPES, obtained large majorities in favour of motions for the relief of ratepayers at the expense of the national revenue; and they and their supporters must have foreseen that such a change would involve a readjustment of the machinery of local taxation. Successive Ministries have declared that the question must be considered as a whole; and in all discussions on the subject it has been assumed that the assessment and expenditure of the rates must be transferred to some elected body. A fanciful grievance was thought to require a practical remedy; and it could not be denied that the fiscal powers of Justices in Quarter Sessions were anomalous, though they had been honestly and prudently administered. It seemed, on the whole, logically, if not practically, necessary to recast the ancient system of local or rural government, and the present Government thought it necessary to prove that its own tenure of power was not an impediment to legislation. If the faint and fitful demand for new municipal institutions had been disregarded, it would perhaps have assumed more formidable dimensions. No other change of equal importance could be proposed which would not have been still more inconsistent with Conservative opinion. Lord SALISBURY has perhaps consulted the interests of the party by introducing a Local Government Bill.

As the fiscal and administrative business of the counties will be withdrawn from the control of the magistrates, it will probably not be thought worth while to preserve the judicial functions of Quarter Sessions. The hearing of appeals and the trial of prisoners are ordinarily conducted by the Chairman, with the formal assistance of two or three of his colleagues. The appointment of a professional judge of the rank of a Recorder would enable Parliament to relieve the judges of assize of a portion of their labours by extending the jurisdiction of Quarter Sessions. The most convenient and economical plan would be to transfer the duties to the County Court Judges, with perhaps a reasonable increase of salary, and in some cases it might be necessary to make an addition to their number. No change in the jurisdiction of Petty Sessions, or of magistrates acting singly, is likely to be included in the Bill, but zealous democrats will perhaps take the opportunity of denouncing unpaid magistrates in counties, though they may tolerate their existence in municipal boroughs. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN when he was Chancellor of the Duchy introduced the more than questionable innovation of placing working-men in the Commission of the Peace. If party fanaticism should induce other official Radicals to follow the precedent, it would be obviously expedient to disestablish functionaries who would be almost always incompetent to the discharge of their duties. It would be highly inconvenient to entrust to a local Caucus the nomination, or rather the recommendation, of candidates for the office of justice. The preference given in boroughs to the supporters of the Government for the time being has often caused dissatisfaction and scandal. The systematic adoption of Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN's party policy would soon become intolerable.

Neither Conservative nor Liberal Ministers had previously been in the habit of publicly boasting that they had exercised their power of appointing judicial functionaries for political purposes. Of the more important parts of the forthcoming Bill the gentry, however unpalatable they may find the change, have no right to complain. They have themselves been the principal promoters of the injudicious movement against the present arrangement of local taxation. Under the new dispensation they will probably have heavier burdens to bear, because the local expenditure will no longer be managed as at present by the largest ratepayers.

One of the most difficult questions connected with local government will relate to the appointment of a licensing authority. The best tribunal which could be selected for the purpose is that which already exists. County magistrates have the merit of being comparatively impartial, and, for the most part, dispassionate. Those of them who are interested in public-houses are legally disqualified from acting, and the remainder are better qualified for the duty than any body constituted by popular election. Country gentlemen never frequent public-houses, and for the most part they keep aloof from the United Kingdom Alliance and similar bodies. Being neither drunkards nor fanatics, they would be at liberty, if their powers were somewhat enlarged, to consult the interests and wishes of the population. As the law has been hitherto understood, they have thought themselves compelled to renew existing licences in the absence of complaint against the actual holders. If they were entitled to exercise discretion, they might often make mistakes; but no alternative tribunal would be either preferable or equally deserving of confidence. It is, nevertheless, useless to recommend the continuance of a system which is loudly denounced by a formidable body of agitators. In his answer to a deputation which he lately received, Mr. Ritchie seemed to imply an intention of transferring the power of granting licences to the new County Boards. The delegates clamorously demanded a reference in every case to a popular vote. A majority might, as they hoped, be found in every district to impose compulsory abstinence on a sober minority. As in other cases, modern politicians are anxious to restrict or to abolish the representative system, which not long since was universally applauded as the greatest of modern political discoveries. Legislation by mobs and riots suits better the purposes of demagogues; and they think it especially applicable to a subject which has excited an extraordinary amount of passionate excitement. Mr. Ritchie declined to propose an incessant succession of plebiscites in every county and parish, and he endeavoured to convince the deputation that it would be a strange proceeding to create representative bodies, and then to overrule their decision by the votes of their constituents. His arguments were unanswerable, and unacceptable to his audience; but, if the Bill gives the Local Councils a veto on the issue of licences, it will incur the risk of injuriously affecting all the other portions of the scheme. The temperance agitators never cease to assert the paramount importance of their favourite object; and, if the grant or the refusal of licences in any district depends upon the action of the governing body, the municipal elections will turn almost exclusively on the question of compulsory abstinence. It would be impossible to devise a more effective method of excluding the fittest candidates from local office. The battle will be fought between the sectaries on one side and the publicans and their habitual customers on the other. The successful combatants will be satisfied with redeeming their pledges to their supporters, without too carefully qualifying themselves for the discharge of their more important duties. The project of reforming the House of Lords by filling its ranks with elected County Chairmen would, if possible, be rendered still more absurd if the new dignitaries had recently been elected with a mandate to encourage or suppress the sale of alcoholic liquors. It is possible that the Government may have discovered the risk of dealing with licences, and a rumour that that part of the measure is to be postponed may rest on some solid foundation.

The business to which the Government and Parliament are about to apply themselves is, in some respects, unprecedented. The Reform Bill of 1832, though it effected a political revolution, might be said to be simpler than the Local Government Bill. The composition of the House of Commons was remodelled, but its functions and powers were unchanged, and the community at large had always been familiar with the processes of Parliamentary government. The County Councils are novel inventions, and their patrons can only judge by conjecture how they are likely to work. It may be found that, after a time, it will be necessary to pay the Chairmen, if not the ordinary members, of the Councils. Their disposition to thrift, to extravagance, or to judicious liberality, cannot be confidently anticipated. If they are elected on the basis of household suffrage, the constituency will perhaps be interested rather in a free expenditure of corporate funds than in rigid economy. A more restricted franchise, on the other hand, would not be sufficiently popular, and indeed it might probably be rejected by the House of Commons. The objection of novelty is obviously not conclusive; but it justifies caution and moderation in the conduct as well as in the construction of the Bill. Mr. Ritchie, who is not known as an ambitious orator, will probably introduce the Bill in a practical speech containing a clear explanation of its provisions. There will be little reason to regret the absence of eloquent dissertations on the dignity and the educational tendency of local government. Vestrymen and county councillors are useful in their way, and they are not the less to be esteemed because they have seldom aspired to be statesmen. The best argument which can be urged in favour of a Local Government Bill is that the urban municipalities have been on the whole successful. It is to be hoped that the Bill will not introduce any change into their constitution or their powers. It will certainly not confer on the County Boards any right of interference with the boroughs within their limits. The attempt to make the boundaries of counties and Unions coincide seems to have been judiciously abandoned; but it apparently implies a purpose of giving the County Boards some share in Poor-law administration. Such a proposal seems likely to raise unnecessary difficulties. Boards of Guardians know their own business, and they will not readily submit to any external authority except the Local Government Board. The overlapping of areas and the intersection of boundaries are for the most part but imaginary evils.

It has been said that the "prize-fight" which recently took place at Chantilly has conclusively proved, if proof were wanted, that a revival of the "Noble Art" is impossible. This may or may not be the case. Perhaps such a revival is eminently undesirable; perhaps, on the other hand, it would, in the long run, be found less demoralizing than the practice of sentimental journalism or, for that matter, any other expression of the new morality. Be this as it may, it is certain that pugilism is illegal, and that the enactment in its disfavour should either be repealed, or should be carried out, in the spirit as in the letter, as rigorously and exactly as possible. It is useless to wait for the principals in a prize fight. Mitchell and Sullivan, like Smith and Greenfield and Kilrain before them, trained quietly in England, crossed the Channel, did their business on French soil, and, being taken into custody and liberated on bail, found it to their interest to forfeit their recognizances, and come home. The law must be more alert than that, or, as Bumble puts it, "the law "is a hass." If, as Mr. Matthews is inclined to believe, it is as punishable to publish a challenge as it is to take part, whether as principals or accessories, in an actual fight, then the scandal of last Saturday becomes all the more flagrant, and the torpor of the Administration all the more reprehensible and amazing. It is said on all sides, and with truth, that the case of Sullivan v. Mitchell has done much to discredit the Ring; but there can be no question that it has done still more to discredit authority, and that it is as good an example of the national vice of Pecksniffism—i.e. the trick of preaching one morality and practising another—as has often been witnessed.

THE NAVY.

Lord George Hamilton has every reason to be satisfied with the progress of his fight for his policy up to the present. If his foes have been those of his own household, they have not deserved the character usually attributed to a man's domestic enemies. They have not been very dangerous. Lord Charles Beresford, who seems to have left all his Saxon behind him in the Admiralty, has praised his late chief where blame might have been damaging, and has blamed him only on a point where all is matter of opinion and theory. Such criticism is not very serious. To be sure, Lord CHARLES was debarred from finding much fault; for on his own showing he must be held to have approved of everything which he did not condemn in minutes of extreme violence. But external criticism has been equally absent, and in its place there has been very general praise for the FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY, who is beginning a new era of efficiency and economy. What Lord GEORGE HAMILTON has done in the way of increasing rapidity of construction, and so forth, ought to be recognized, and was duly commended here long before the publication of his Memorandum. The praise asked for that document and its appendices, and pretty freely given too, is a proof of the persistence of an old superstition. If public opinion were, as thoughtful persons say it ought to be, moulded by experience, we are afraid that these documents would be much more coolly received. These re-arrangements of Admiralty accounts, re-namings of departments, and shifting round of functions are no new things. There have been very many of them during the last two generations, and several even within the last ten years. All were to have begun new eras of efficiency and economy. In a little while, however, it was always found that, the more the Admiralty was changed, the more it was the same. Good bookkeeping is an excellent thing as far as it goes, and possibly the new system of arranging the Navy Estimates may have acceptable business results. But, when that is allowed, it is still true that little is really gained unless we are to have the clear conception of what the naval policy of the country ought to be on the part of the Admiralty, and the corresponding distinctness of intention and intelligence of criticism on the part of the House of Commons which would have given us a sufficient navy under any of the forms of our changing system.

There is very little either in the well-praised Memorandum, or in the consequent proceedings in the House, to show that the needful "vivifying touch" is about to be supplied. Lord GEORGE'S statement is a businesslike paper, quite equal to the yearly report of a railway Company in point of arrangement. It certainly shows that a good deal has been done of late, not so much to put the navy into a satisfactory state as to work it up from a condition of dangerous and disgraceful weakness. This is not denied on any side, but when it is examined for signs of the naval policy which is to save us in the future from renewed panics and repetitions of our unending changes of system, some faith is required to find them. It has the old Admiralty stamp on it much too visibly to be convincing. There is the same determination to do the least possible, the same excess of delight in saving for saving's sake, though there is more pride than of old in the amount of work done. Lord GEORGE HAMILTON'S comparison between the English and foreign navies may be taken as fully justified (for purposes of argument), and yet the conclusion he draws from it need not be accepted. The conclusion we mean is not his argumentative one, that our navy is strong enough, but the other and practical one which takes the form of a determination to build no more heavy battle-ships for the present. We do not expect to see the sun of England go down for ever because our navy is not demonstrably capable of overwhelming any possible hostile combination. No doubt in former times we have been comparatively less strong than we are at this moment. In 1793, for instance, our navy was just equal in numbers to the united French and Spaniards, and our ships, as a rule, were smaller and less heavily armed. But then we began that war with Spain on our side, and France utterly disorganized by the Revolution. When at present the fitness of the navy for its work is under consideration, it is not taken for granted that we shall go to war with the third naval Power in Europe on our side against the second, fighting single-handed, and in a state of anarchy into the bargain. The supposition, on the contrary, is that England should be prepared to meet an effective coalition. If that supposition is a sound one, it is manifestly unwise to fix our strength at the lowest figure that will do. No margin is allowed for accident, no reserve provided, and of all the ways of bringing about another panic in peace, to say nothing of war, this is the surest. The section of the Memorandum which deals with naval ordnance gives another instance of this miserly and, in the long run, wasteful manner of equipping the service. Several big ships are waiting for their guns, which are dropping in by batches of two and three. Of course on the sudden outbreak of war this would mean that for months these vessels would lie uselessly in dock; for, even if they were armed with old ordnance, time would be required to change their fittings. The present Board cannot be held responsible for the actual state of things. The determination to adopt the breech-loading system was taken late; and accidents—so called—which are not yet forgotten, suspended the manufacture of the new ordnance when it had actually been begun. But, if Lord GEORGE and his colleagues are free from blame for the past, they are responsible for the future. We cannot see any sign that they are preparing to secure a sufficient supply of the new weapons. Heavy cannon for the line-of-battle ships have been ordered in just sufficient quantities to supply the ships actually in course of construction. Here, again, in armament, as in ships, there is to be no reserve. The minimum is provided for peace, and no provision is made for the waste of war. Guns may be struck and disabled in action. Recent experience does not show that they enjoy conspicuous strength of constitution, even in peace, and no preparation is being made to supply more than can just be mounted. Behind them there will be nothing. This is precisely the fault against which Sir WALTER SCOTT, wiser for others than for himself, warned his friend TERRY. It is the neglect to provide "the ready" wherewith to meet contingencies which has always been the fault of the Admiralty. Until it is amended we look for little good from improved methods of bookkeeping.

The discussions in the House of Commons do not show that Parliamentary criticism is in a more hopeful state than Admiralty policy. Monday night was wasted in what was very little better than vague and purposeless talk, and Thursday was spent to no better purpose. The speech with which Lord CHARLES BERESFORD introduced his amendment was partly devoted to an explanation of his theatrical retirement, which in reality adds nothing to what was already known. As for the amendment itself, it is difficult to discuss with any satisfaction, simply because it is impossible to make out from their professions what the mover and supporters would really be at. We may guess that they would like to see the quill-driving clerks under the orders of an honest sailor. This is, no doubt, the esoteric meaning of the words "That the allocation of "authority [in the Admiralty] requires entire reform." This is a view like another. When we get to their speeches, however, we find they want a different and ill-defined, thing. They do not profess to desire to take the navy from under the control of Parliament, or to diminish the authority of the First Lord. None the less they want, in some way, to put Parliament, and the First Lord too, into leading-strings, to be held by experts. The two things are, incompatible. Without stopping to inquire whether experts would necessarily supply a consistent policy or good administration—which is not a matter of course—we point out that, if the First Lord is to be master, he must be obeyed. The only guarantee that his power will be well used is that Parliament should have an enlightened desire to possess a good navy, and that the First Lord should be taught that it is his interest to consult its wish.

BOULANGISME.

THE last contribution of France to the political vocabulary of Europe has not been received with all the attention which is its due. Boulangisme is the word, and a newspaper has been started to preach it. This organ, the Cocarde, is reported to be dull, and there is every probability that the adjective is deserved. An amusing journalist is not to be found at every street corner, even in Paris; and believers in Boulangisme have no better luck in that way than others. But, happily for a large and important part of the human race, it is very possible to get on in the world without wit. The staff of the Cocarde may expound the Boulangisme of General BOULANGER to admiring and confiding hearers with not the less success because they do not make too great a demand on their powers of appreciating "esprit." What their body of doctrine may be when it is fully expounded we can afford to wait to see. In the meantime the world can make use of the evidence before it, and form its opinion of Boulangisme from known facts. For the rest, a new political principle is not a thing to be despised; and a gentleman who can survive so much as General BOULANGER, and whose mere name, written by a practical joker in a visitors' book, can set half Paris in a flutter, is a very important person indeed. The General's dismissal has, as a matter of course, been greeted with a pretty loud chorus to the effect that now at last the bubble is pricked and the NAPOLEON de café-concert on his way to oblivion. We think we have heard something like this before, and yet here he is. The blue spectacles and the limp are no worse than the AUMALE letters. If the Opportunist Deputies have indeed been congratulating one another on the remarkable energy of Government, it may be remembered that their idea of energy is somewhat peculiar. The measure taken against him is, in fact, a recognition of his importance; and, considering what very small persons he has to fight, it will not be at all surprising if General BOULANGER is found fighting successfully for his great principle for many a day yet.

To judge from the General's career, we imagine Boulangisme to be something like this. It is the art of making the utmost possible noise over the smallest possible amount of work, of becoming famous by show, of appealing to fine sentiments, or to ignoble, by claptrap, of playing to any gallery which is likely to applaud and can be wheedled into paying for its seat, of parading hazy but grandiose looking schemes without the least regard to the possibility of carrying them into effect. To be sure, this is not an absolute novelty, even in France; and there are many professors of Boulangisme who are not followers of General BOULANGER. When the Budget Committee of the Chamber recommends that the budget of the Church should be suppressed, although it knows perfectly well that a majority has voted in favour of retaining it—that is Boulangisme. It is claptrap, played to please the Radical gallery. When M. DE LESSEPS, with a flood ot fine phrases about the mission of France, asks people to lend him 600,000,000 francs at any interest, and then promises to guarantee the loan by borrowing another 150,000,000 francs and investing them at 3 per cent., that also is Boulangisme. It is even a fine example, for it includes the haziness, the grandiosity, the claptrap, and the practical dishonesty. When a theatrical manager and fireman are sentenced to fine and imprisonment for carelessly causing the death of many scores of persons, and are then acquitted by the Supreme Court on the ground that they were not proved to be careless, here, also, there are traces of Boulangisme. The lower court obtained a cheap reputation for austerity by inflicting penalties it knew the superior court would remit, and so it satisfied a public clamour at no cost. In due course M. WILSON and his accomplices, having figured in a first, will figure in a second course of Boulangisme. Boulangisme is the talk about the virtuous calmness of Paris on the death of the Emperor WILLIAM; as if anything else would not have been absolutely contemptible. Boulangisme is the scolding of Bulgaria for its revolutionary disregard of the rights of Europe; as if France had a claim to deliver that lecture, or as if we did not all know to what gallery that claptrap is played. To be sure, General BOULANGER did not invent all this, but that is only to his advantage. It is no small thing to give your name to a common practice. In politics he who can do it shows that his popularity has a deep and wide basis. Besides, is it not the best of all ways to secure fame to do a little better than others what all others are doing? General BOULANGER has played the universal game better than any other, it is only right that he should give his name to it. What Frenchman has become famous so cheaply, and by such pure show? Who has so boldly done ignoble things to please the mob? Who has outlined so much? He is the only man in France who has a party which will act spontaneously for him. His allies, too, are winning. In the Côte-d'Or a Radical has replaced M. CARNOT. Extreme Radicals have also carried the day in La Haute-Marne and the Bouches-du-Rhône. Altogether, it looks more unwise than ever for the superior person to sniff at General BOULANGER. There are the makings in that man of the next Copper Captain.

HOSTS IN THEMSELVES.

THERE is a kind of complacency so innocent that it disarms ridicule, and we feel ourselves in its presence in reading Mr. O'BRIEN'S speech to the Notables who have just entertained him and his "fellow victims" at dinner. "Who would have thought two years ago," exclaimed Mr. O'BRIEN, in effect, "that we Irish members would be "sitting here among you gentlemen, and drinking our "sherry-wine at the tables of the great?" He and his friends, he said, to quote his precise words, "were men "whom Mr. BALFOUR had spared no effort, fair or "foul, to stain with degradation, and with contamination "with criminals; and yet here they were received and "welcomed as princes in the capital of England's industry "and England's greatness." The "capital of" &c., has, of course, very little to do with it, since the dispensing of hospitality at Manchester is, presumably, no exclusive privilege of the distinguished, and we suppose that anybody may give a dinner there to anybody else whom it pleases him to invite. Mr. O'BRIEN'S meaning was that his hosts were representative of their city, and that England's greatness was, to some extent, so reflected, at any rate through its Manchester variety, in their persons. Now Mr. O'BRIEN is an Irishman, or, in other words, he belongs to a race of men who have sometimes been accused of saying pretty things which they do not altogether mean, so that we ought perhaps to make a little deduction for "blarney." But, on the whole, the sentence we have quoted impresses one with an effect of sincerity. One cannot resist the conviction that the exultation of the man who uttered it is at any rate more than half genuine, and that he really felt, and not feigned, those emotions of pride with which he looked round upon the "haffable gentlemen who "had stretched out the 'and of brotherhood" to himself and his fellows. Before simplicity so sacred as this even cynicism itself might bare the head. If it is credible—and, as we have pointed out, we really think it is credible—that Mr. O'BRIEN is speaking in good faith, or to a great extent in that spirit, then indeed must we cease to wonder that he and his Separatist friends have so long been feeding their minds with the delusion that the "English "people is with them." Those who entertain so grotesque a conception of what is representative and influential among an English political party with which they are now in constant contact must be hopelessly incapable of distinguishing valuable from worthless manifestations of opinion on the national scale.

There was one, and only one, remarkable feature about the banquet given to Mr. O'BRIEN, Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN, and Mr. WILFRID BLUNT in the Manchester Free Trade Hall; and that, no doubt, is capable, by judicious statistical treatment, of being made to appear somewhat impressive. The board was graced by one-half of the peers, not being ex-Ministers, who have declared themselves in favour of Mr. GLADSTONE'S Irish policy. That is to say, Lord CAVAN was present at the dinner; and it only wanted the addition of the other one to complete the set of non-official Gladstonian peers. But perhaps the other half of this aristocratic party of salvation—the nobleman who plays JOHNNY DODDS of Farthing's Acre to the DAVIE DEANS of Lord CAVAN—has been guilty of a "right-hand defection" or a "left-hand falling off," and has reduced the true Church to a compact communion of one. The "anti-Union Roll" of peers is easily called, in any case; and as for the commoners who assembled to greet the Irish patriots, what are we to say of them? Here are their names—Mr. JAMES STANSFELD, M.P.; Mr. R. LEAKE, M.P.; Sir H. E. ROSCOE, M.P.; Mr. J. T. BRUNNER, M.P.; and, at the head of the table, Mr. C. E. SCHWANN, M.P. The first name on the list requires, of course, no ceremonies of introduction. Mr. STANSFELD is well known, and his exact status may perhaps be best defined by saying that he stands in the same relation to an ex-Minister of importance as Mr. BRUNNER and Mr. SCHWANN do to important private members of Parliament. Mr. BRUNNER is a little more notorious than Mr. SCHWANN from having ascended the Irish stump for a brief period before the Mitchelstown meeting, and having descended it with signal promptitude after that incident. As to the gentleman who sat at the head of the table, and to the "worthy Vice," and to the other representatives of the "capital of England's industry and England's greatness," it would be inexact to say that their names are altogether unknown to the public; for they occur regularly in lists printed by most of the newspapers after important divisions, and, for aught we know, they may thereby have become as familiar in the mouths of all Englishmen as household words. But unless that has occurred, their highly respectable names will convey no clear-cut and strongly marked conception of their individualities to the average mind of their fellow-countrymen. Yet there are some private members of Parliament on the Gladstonian side of the House whose names do convey a conception of the kind, just as there are several ex-Ministers who have impressed themselves more forcibly on the national imagination than Mr. STANSFELD. Why were none of these present? By what extraordinary concurrence of mischances—by what combination of colds in the head, attacks of gout, sprained ankles, previous dinner engagements, urgent private business—were they one and all prevented from attending?

THE OATHS BILL.

THE debate on the Oaths Bill on Wednesday was, no doubt, in the French sense, digne; it was certainly, in the English sense, dull. We shall do our best to avoid dulness in dealing with it; but we shall trust not to avoid dignity. It is to be regretted that the statement of the objections to the measure was not, in the first place, undertaken by some more competent speakers than Mr. LEIGHTON and Mr. DE LISLE, though the task was, to some extent, afterwards performed by Mr. DARLING and the ATTORNEY-GENERAL. No Parnellite member undertook to justify the singular change of conduct of that party on the matter—a change which has no parallel in that minority of the Conservatives which either abstained or voted for the Bill. It has been said by some Gladstonians that Conservatives have "changed their minds"—a saying only to be justified by the severe trials of experience and opinion to which the Gladstonian party has been subjected in the last thirty months, and which may excuse some forgetfulness of facts. Those facts are very simple. Had such a Bill as the present been brought in seven or eight years ago as a consequence of the general knowledge that the Parliamentary oath was constantly being taken in vain, it would have been difficult for many orthodox Conservatives to oppose it. The actual course of events was quite different. Mr. BRADLAUGH, having been elected for Northampton, chose, for purposes of his own which it is quite unnecessary to discuss here, to give the House of Commons the information that he was a person on whom the oath would not be binding. His demand to affirm having been given against him by the proper authorities, he then proposed to take the oath, and, in default of tender, endeavoured to administer it to himself. Indignation at this proceeding, and perhaps even stronger indignation at the constant refusal of the Prime Minister of the day either to pronounce boldly for Mr. BRADLAUGH or honestly against him, led to a succession of scenes in which the sense of decency of the House of Commons was vindicated. And, finally, when Mr. GLADSTONE was at last awakened to the discreditable nature of his conduct, the intolerable character of the privilegium thus proposed still prevented the House from passing it. But with the lapse of the Government and the Parliament of 1880 that technical knowledge of Mr. BRADLAUGH's beliefs or no-beliefs which had made his exclusion possible lapsed likewise, and he took the oath as he might have done years before. The question thus fell back to its earlier stage, with an added argument for some kind of new settlement. It became more than ever clear that no person willing to take the oath could be excluded, and that persons by whom the oath ought never to be taken were likely to present themselves in increasing numbers. The course proper to take in such a condition of things could not possibly be affected by the course which had been taken in a condition quite different. Apparently some considerable questions remain to be debated in Committee, especially the very important one whether, in at least inferior cases, the oath as an oath does not exercise a salutary influence. But it may at least be granted that no one who has been elected member of the House of Commons, and who is willing to take an oath the terms of which are to him gibberish, can be kept out by the present law. And it may perhaps be added that after recent experiences the House of Commons can hardly fear more undesirable members under a scheme of latitude than those whom a scheme of tests has let in.

FORTIFICATIONS.

THE exact value of the argument against a public inquiry into the state of our national defences, which takes the form of a complaint that it would betray our weak spots to a possible enemy, is neatly illustrated by the recently published Report on the fortification of our ports. A glance at it ought to convert any one who may still be on the other side to agreement with Sir H. STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, to whom we find we have attributed a more thoroughgoing approval of the military policy of the Ministry than it received from him. He did, in fact, express a conviction that possible enemies knew our weakness too well already, and a willingness to vote more money to make them good than the Ministry had thought necessary to ask for. From the Report it is abundantly clear that our fortifications are one great weak spot altogether. Even Malta and Gibraltar—ports of war which should be at all times in a condition to repel attack—are in need of fresh outlay to make them thoroughly sound. They are, however, in a comparatively favourable condition. A fortified place may be imperfect, and may yet be able to make a long and a good fight. At home things are worse than they are in the Mediterranean. The Committee which drew up the Report was convinced that even Portsmouth was not quite safe against sudden attack. The members of the Committee were unquestionably right in believing that the destruction of our chief arsenal might be decisive in a great war; and, as long as it could not be trusted to stand by itself, there would be an absolute necessity for keeping a squadron to look after it, which is another way of saying that it would be a burden instead of a help. Other naval ports are in an even weaker condition, and, as for the purely commercial sea-towns, we have hardly made a beginning in the work of fortifying them. The very mouths of the Thames and Medway are not safe, since an enemy could take up a position from which Chatham could be shelled with little or no danger to himself. For these and many other equally convincing reasons, the Committee has come to the conclusion that the fortifications are not in a satisfactory condition and ought to be strengthened. It may be observed that all this is, and long has been, the secret of Punch. Comment has been made on it here and elsewhere often enough, and assuredly it is all as familiar as his glove to our possible enemy.

Our esteemed and right-thinking contemporary the Standard has improved recent events, and asked itself what the Emperor WILLIAM would have said to it all. We think we know; and also what he would have done. He would have said it was disgraceful; and would have taken the money to put it right, though the House of Commons squalled never so loud. At least that is what he would have done if he had held here the position he did in Prussia. But then neither he nor any man held, or could have held, that position in this country; and so it is useless to speculate what his course would be in these circumstances. It is more to the point to ask what our course ought to be. Here there is more hope of coming to a result, though it is not so great as some may think. By far the worst part of our constant naval and military failures is the difficulty of imagining any change in our methods which will secure permanent intelligent management of our national defence. The House of Commons is generally willing to vote money when it is seriously asked for. The country is not indifferent to its safety. On the contrary, it is very nervous about it, and liable to wild panics, as was seen when the Duke of WELLINGTON's letter was published, and again in The Battle of Dorking times. Yet, in spite of good intentions and good will, we seem unable to get our navy and army seriously treated, except by fits and starts. There will not improbably now be another spasm of fear, another brief period of frantic digging, building, gun-casting, and of launching of ships. Work will be done, and much of it will be good. But, when the fit is over, who will guarantee that there will not be another spell of idleness, another interval of neglect, leading up to another panic? That, of course, is the most favourable view of it for us. It might lead to a national disaster. Until we secure this permanent watchfulness and constant care to keep the services up to the level of efficiency required for their work we have done little. Not even the reforms which are to cause the sublime head of Mr. STANHOPE to touch the stars and to make Lord GEORGE HAMILTON immortal will be enough. Perhaps not the worst way of securing them is indicated in the sea-song:—

> Till Hawke did bang Monsieur Conflans
> You sent us beef and beer,
> Now Monsieur's beat we've nought to eat
> Since you have nought to fear.

Let us keep up a wholesome fear by publicity, by yearly statements, showing exactly how things stand, and then if the beef and beer are not supplied, on our heads be it.

TWO PEERS ON THE SITUATION.

THE Duke of ARGYLL and Lord ROSEBERY have been severally demonstrating that vigorous capacity for public affairs which, when displayed by members of the Upper House, excites so strange a mixture of fear and jealousy in the Radical breast. The former has been addressing a meeting of the Liberal-Unionist Association at Cambridge; the latter has been entertained at dinner by an East-End political club. Upon the DUKE the situation in which he found himself, and the particular audience which he was addressing, appear to have produced a somewhat uncomfortable impression of novelty, and there was a certain constraint about his opening remarks which is unusual with so practised a speaker. Rousing himself, however, by memories of Bannockburn, on which historic spot he tells us that he has recently stood and "shouted "for joy," the DUKE went on to point out with new vigour and effectiveness the familiar contrast between Scottish and Irish history, both as regards the resistance respectively offered by the two races to English conquest and to Imperial incorporation. Passing thence to a general review of the Unionists' position and the attacks upon it, the Duke of ARGYLL delivered himself of a most destructive reply to a favourite argument of Mr. MORLEY and his school. It is impossible to say anything new about the Home Rule question, either on one side or the other, and the main line of reasoning to which the DUKE'S reply belongs is familiar enough. But the specific application of it in this instance has a peculiar force and freshness of its own. The whole weight of Mr. MORLEY'S contention on behalf of the Separation policy, in his speech at the Oxford Union, reposed upon the assumed incompetence of the Imperial Parliament to deal with the avowed and admitted political needs of Ireland. Yet Mr. GLADSTONE'S plan—and, indeed, all plans put forward by his party—would involve the creation of a statutory Parliament, and the Legislature which is to frame the statute declaring and limiting the powers of this Irish Parliament is the very assembly which the authors of the scheme declare to be "utterly in-"competent to deal with the needs of Ireland." This, too, is no mere rhetorical reductio ad absurdum. It is not as if the Imperial Parliament could safeguard Imperial interests by a few broad statutory provisions which need not necessarily infringe on Irish claims to local autonomy in particular matters. On the contrary, Imperial demands and Particularist pretensions are found in conflict at every turn; the question of fiscal policy is a sufficient illustration of that. There cannot be the slightest doubt that any constituent Act creating a statutory Parliament in Ireland would have, even in the hands of Mr. GLADSTONE himself, come into collision with the alleged "needs of Ireland." And what, as the Duke of ARGYLL asks, is likely to be the permanence of a Constitution so drawn up?

Lord ROSEBERY, we are glad to see, is in good spirits. This is a matter of no little importance; for Lord ROSEBERY, now that Mr. LABOUCHERE has, politically speaking, "found "religion," is the only member of the Gladstonian party who is able to infuse any humour of a lighter quality than Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S into political discussion. He is quite the "agreeable Rattle" of the Radical Club. At the Bow and Bromley dinner, however, he was hardly perhaps in his best form, and his jokes were occasionally of that order which is more pleasing to the joker's opponents than to his friends, who sit wondering whether his wit is unconsciously left-handed, or whether he is slily poking fun at his audience. We doubt, for instance, whether the bold Bowmen quite knew what to make of their guest's eulogism on adversity and its sweet uses, or felt altogether sure that he was serious in declaring his opinion that they had "every "reason to congratulate themselves on the present position "of the Liberal party." If this, however, was irony, it will not compare in point of subtlety with what followed. If Gladstonians find a difficulty in agreeing with Lord ROSEBERY that their state is the more gracious for these late defeats, their perplexity is as nothing to that with which a Unionist will listen to his account of their present wrongs. They are, it seems, subjected to every form of calumny and misrepresentation; and, as soon as the case is presented in the day, weeds are planted in the night, and the diligent Liberal has a task of almost superhuman difficulty and gravity in pulling them up in the morning. A more exact description, on the topsy-turvy principle, of what takes place with respect to the proceedings of the Government in Ireland it would have been impossible to frame. One would really think that Lord ROSEBERY had been recently passing some of his nights in the office of an Irish Nationalist newspaper, and that it was from this experience that his humorous imagination had derived the hint of this most audacious jest. His review of the comparative electoral fortunes of the Unionist and Separatist parties was apparently meant to be serious, and his comments on the Gladstonian defeats at Doncaster and Deptford seem intended for bonâ fide explanations of these events. But in that case his observations on Mr. BLUNT'S failure were singularly infelicitous. If Mr. BLUNT was beaten because he was speechless and in prison, it must be remembered that it was only by getting himself imprisoned and silenced that he procured his selection as a candidate at all. This, however, is in thorough keeping with the usual Parnellite desire for the glories of martyrdom dissociated from its inconveniences. Mr. BLUNT was glad to get all the votes he could attract by his mute and helpless appeal to the sympathies of the Deptford electors, and at the same time takes it ill that he should lose any of their votes by being unable to canvass them in person. As to Doncaster, Lord ROSEBERY admits with agreeable candour that "his knowledge of the district was not acquired in "political circumstances"; but, without knowing any more about Doncaster than the result of the last race for the St. Leger, he might still have avoided the singularly inept criticism which he hazarded on the recent election. It is, no doubt, true that the name of FITZWILLIAM is a name which it is difficult to beat in this district; but Ruff's Guide—we mean Dod's Parliamentary Companion—would have told Lord ROSEBERY, if he had consulted it, that the name of FITZWILLIAM, and, what is more, a name with the same initials as those of the late winner, was defeated on the Liberal-Unionist platform at the election of 1886.

With the future prospects of his party Lord ROSEBERY deals in the same light and airy fashion as with their past vicissitudes and their present fortunes. The kind of cheerfulness which he displays has, no doubt, a physically infectious element about it, and may so far have tended to raise the spirits of his hearers. But those among them who examined his utterances for any substantial grounds of reassurance contained in them must have been a little disappointed. His admissions against his party were generous, even, as some of his hearers may have thought, to the point of imprudence, and there was little or nothing to set against them. "It is quite true," he said, "that our Home "Rule scheme was [or, according to the revised version, "might have been"] a bad scheme, and our land scheme "was a bad scheme, but that was what we went out "upon. The Tories," he continues, "had all the time an "alternative scheme, which was not coercion, but which "has turned out to be nothing else." The statement, of course, is one of the "weeds" which Lord ROSEBERY planted at Bow last Wednesday night, and which has to be pulled up as part of the next morning's work of the Unionists; but let that pass. The Tories, it appears, have a scheme, by Lord ROSEBERY'S own admission—a scheme which they do not admit to be bad, which the country has not so far pronounced bad, and which they have consequently not yet "gone out upon." The only thing, therefore, which could have consoled the men of Bow for these damaging confessions would have been a confident declaration on Lord ROSEBERY'S part that the Gladstonians had not only given up their old "bad scheme," but had devised another which should "go one better" than the Tory scheme. But Lord ROSEBERY does not say this, or anything approaching to this. He says mildly that "it is very difficult to know "what the constituencies think. We go down to the con-"stituencies and we see enthusiastic meetings of Liberals "who are entirely with us; and I have no doubt our "opponents go down and see enthusiastic meetings of "Conservatives who are thoroughly with them. Therefore, "it is very difficult to test the matter till we come to a "general election." Surely this is rather cold comfort. What Gladstonian Clubs want to be told is, not that they will know what the result of the litigation is when the jury give their verdict, but that they have reason to think that that verdict will be in their favour. They must feel, too, that even a general election is little likely to turn the tables on their adversary, unless the "bad scheme" can in the meantime be replaced by a good one. And of any such replacement, or of any the most distant hope of it, there is not, and has not been at any time since Mr. GLADSTONE'S bad scheme was rejected, even the shadow of a sign.

THE OPERATION OF THE CLOSURE RULE.

It was edifying to observe the promptitude with which Mr. Bradlaugh intervened last Wednesday afternoon with a motion for the closure of the debate on the second reading of his Oaths Bill. There was, it is true, no general desire on the part of a majority of the House to "talk out" the measure, otherwise, of course, Mr. Bradlaugh's motion would not have been carried. But it is probable enough that one or two of the opponents of the legislative proposal would have adopted this means of getting rid of it, and its promoter therefore was only resorting to a natural and legitimate precaution. We may admit, also, that Mr. Bradlaugh himself has never been among the noisier opponents of the "muzzling rule." He sits, however, in the midst of a party who have never ceased to denounce the engine of Ministerial oppression which they now find to lend itself with perfect impartiality to the protection of a Bill which meets with almost all its opposition on the Ministerial side of the House. Their future attitude towards the Closure Rule will now probably undergo something of that favourable change which is noticeable in the demeanour of the man who has won his first stake at it towards an unfamiliar game at cards.

The combination of the new midnight rule with that of the Closure has also produced very satisfactory results. It has attained its object of shortening discussion on particular subjects, as well as of limiting debate in general, with hardly any friction. The first hitch—if, indeed, it can be called so—which has occurred in its operation took place last Thursday night, when Mr. Smith interposed at half-past eleven o'clock to bring some rather desultory talk on the Civil Service Estimates to a close by the motion that the question be now put. Mr. Dillon, who was about to address the House when Mr. Smith rose, is nowadays, of course, a person of too much importance to be snuffed out like any ordinary member, and Mr. Dillon accordingly threatened a little later on to vindicate his offended dignity by opposing the order of the day for going into Committee of Ways and Means. He complained of the want of courtesy displayed by the Leader of the House, which, it appeared, had also been keenly felt by that "sensitive plant" of the Parnellite parterre, Mr. Timothy Healy. To them were also added Sir William Harcourt, who "thought that the right hon. "gentleman might have postponed his Closure motion for a "quarter of an hour." He was proceeding to support this proposition by another which carefully and completely begged the whole question in dispute, when he too was offended by some Ministerialist ignoramus who did not understand the dialectic figure of petitio principii, and cried "Oh!" "If that," said Sir William severely, "was the "spirit shown by hon. gentlemen opposite"—a ribald spirit which can only jeer when an opponent kindly assumes the proposition which he has got to prove—he (Sir William) "could give no further assistance in the matter. He was "going to appeal to Mr. Dillon to withdraw his objec-"tion," but now—— And Sir William Harcourt resumed his seat with an air which said plainly that the blood of those who laugh at petitiones principii must be upon their own heads. Mr. Dillon did not press his objection, but Mr. Biggar did, and the order for going into Committee of Ways and Means stood over. Of course Mr. Smith's answer to the absurd charge of discourtesy was simple and complete. He moved the Closure at 11.30 because he knew that there must be two divisions if the motion was resisted. The motion was resisted; there were two divisions, and it was the very fact of the time spent in taking these two divisions which delayed the next order till after 12 o'clock, and thus enabled Mr. Dillon to oppose and Mr. Biggar to prevent its being taken. Sir William Harcourt's unkindly-treated argument was to the effect that since, as it was, the main question was only voted by 12 o'clock, "the leader of the House might have "allowed the discussion to have continued till a quarter "before the hour, and then have relied upon getting the "vote." But that is exactly what Mr. Smith could not rely upon. He had no reason to believe, and no right to assume, that the Closure motion would be resisted—as in fact it was—whenever it was made; and, if it were, it would then be too late to take a vote on the main question. Mr. Dillon and the Parnellites in general, including Sir William Harcourt, have the remedy in their own hands. They have only to let it be understood that they will not resist these motions of Closure, or at any rate not divide the House upon them, when brought forward, and they will be allowed to talk for a quarter of an hour longer every lawful night. If they will not enter into any such understanding, then they must consent to have their talk reduced by that amount of time. The thing is simplicity itself.

THE CONVERSION PROPOSALS.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer's scheme for the conversion of the Debt has three great merits which recommend it alike to the public man and to the capitalist. It does not increase the capital of the Debt, and yet it effects a very considerable saving for the taxpayers. From April of next year the annual reduction in interest, assuming that the scheme is completely successful, will amount to as much as 1,400,000*l.*, or nearly equivalent to the yield of a three-farthings Income-tax; and fourteen years later a further saving of the same amount will be effected. In fifteen years, therefore, the total saving will amount to about 2,800,000*l.* per annum, or not far short of the present yield of a three-halfpenny Income-tax. And this very handsome saving is secured without any burden being imposed upon the taxpayer, unless, indeed, we count as such the trifling bonus of five shillings per cent. which is to be granted to holders of Consols who voluntarily accept. Secondly, the scheme provides for the creation of one great stock of about 560 millions. This is the feature that specially recommends it to bankers, for we can hardly overrate the value to bankers of a British Government stock of such an enormous amount as to ensure always a free and ready market. Such stock, indeed, makes up almost for the loss of interest that has to be suffered. And, thirdly, the scheme is as considerate towards fundholders as is possible consistently with the main object of conversion. In other words, the reduction of interest is made gradually. For twelve months the fundholder receives the full 3 per cent. interest; then for fourteen years his interest is cut down only by a quarter per cent., and it is not until fifteen years have elapsed from the present time that the final reduction to 2½ per cent. is accomplished. Having these three great merits, it is reasonably certain that the scheme will succeed; but, of course, there are objectors, and principally the holders of the New Threes think that they have a grievance. Our readers are by this time doubtless familiar with the division of the Three per Cents into three great stocks—New Threes, Reduced Threes, and Consols. The first of these only is redeemable without notice, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken advantage of this to propose that holders of New Threes who do not expressly signify their dissent by the 29th of the present month will be held to have assented. Not a few holders think that this is unjust; but we need hardly say that their complaint is entirely unfounded. When the New Threes were created, a guarantee was given that they should not be converted before 1874; but, on the other hand, it was expressly stipulated that afterwards they might be converted without notice, and that the reservation was meant to be acted upon was clear from the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day had, just as Mr. Goschen does now, assumed assent where dissent was not expressed. Mr. Goschen, therefore, is merely acting upon the right reserved half a century ago, and is acting, moreover, upon well-established precedents. Indeed, he would have exposed himself to almost certain defeat if he had not adopted this expedient, or else entered into an arrangement with the banks to provide him with the means of paying off all fundholders who refused to assent. Generally it is found that where people are perplexed as to whether they ought or ought not to do a thing, they end by doing nothing. When Mr. Childers made his conversion proposals, he left the option to the holders of New Threes as well as to the holders of Reduced and Consols, and their doing nothing rendered his scheme practically abortive. Now, however, their doing nothing ensures the conversion of New Threes. The conversion of Reduced Threes seems also to be reasonably certain. The Reduced stock is a small one that can be very easily managed, and, therefore, there is little doubt that the bulk of it will be converted.

There is some doubt as to whether holders of Consols generally will convert. Consols constitute a very large stock—about 330 millions—and it seems to many that, if the holders simply refuse to convert, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be helpless to overcome their resistance, and will have to offer better terms. Indeed, a meeting of bankers has been held, and, it is understood, has decided to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a modification of his proposals. Still we are inclined to think that Consols also will be converted. The new Two and three-quarters per cent. stock is quoted at about 101½. It is, therefore, obviously better for a holder of Consols to accept a new stock which is at a premium of 1½ than to be paid off at par; and, further, it is obvious that, if Consol holders generally were so dissatisfied with the proposals that they threw their stock upon the market in unmanageably large masses, the price must have gone down under par. As a matter of fact, however, Consols remain well over par. Judging by the course of the market, then, it seems to us evident that Consol holders are making up their minds to accept the inevitable; and, as reasonable men, they, in fact, have no option but to do so. For years past the accumulation of wealth and the growing scarcity of new investments have been sending up the prices of securities of all kinds. Consols, however, as Mr. Goschen showed last week, have not risen in anything like the same proportion as other securities—mainly because for years past it has been foreseen that conversion was inevitable when once Consols had stood well above par for years together, and the higher Consols went the more inevitable became conversion. How great has been the rise in other securities may be seen from two or three examples. Thus, in the beginning of March 1878 London and North-Western Four per cent. Debenture stock stood at 107, it is now 134, a rise of about 27 per cent. in ten years. Metropolitan Board of Works Three and a half per cent. stock at the same time stood at 102; now it is about 113; while New South Wales Fours have risen from par to 108. United States bonds ten years ago varied in interest from 4½ per cent. to 6 per cent., and the prices ranged from 103 to 107; now the Four per Cents, which cannot be called in and redeemed at par for nineteen years, stand at 127. From these examples it is evident that if the holders of Consols were to sell very largely for the purpose of buying securities that yield a better rate of interest, they would drive up the prices of those other securities so extravagantly against themselves that they would find themselves worse off than they are at present. Indeed, the mere prospect that selling upon a large scale would take place has caused an extraordinary rise this week. As we have already stated, London and North-Western Four per cent. Debenture stock now stands at a price which barely yields 3 per cent. on the money invested; Midland Threes are at par; Indian Three per cent. Sterling stock is almost at par; and London and North-Western Ordinary stock yields at the present price, assuming the dividend of this year to be equal to that of last year, about 3½ per cent. Granted that some of the rise was speculative, it is still evident from the course of the Stock Exchange since Friday last that buying upon a very large scale—such as must ensue if there were large sellings of Consols would send up prices inordinately. But clearly it is not worth the while of the Consol holder to sell his stock, which will in the present year yield him 3¼ per cent., and for fourteen years succeeding 2¾ per cent., if he cannot get a higher rate of interest on the securities which he purchases. Even now, however, as we have just been pointing out, such stocks as London and North-Western Four per cent. Debentures, Midland Threes, and Indian Threes yield him no more than 3 per cent. A little further rise would bring the yield down to the level of the new Government stock to be created.

There was another point brought out very clearly in Mr. Goschen's speech last Friday which has gone far to ensure the success of his proposals. It had been assumed that, if the Government gave notice of redemption, it would be bound to redeem the whole of the stock to which notice had been given. For example, it was assumed that Consols or New Threes, if notice was given to the holders of either, must all be redeemed together. Mr. Goschen was careful to point out that this rested on a complete misconception; that, on the contrary, the law very clearly lays down that less than a certain amount must not be redeemed, but that it says nothing of redeeming the whole, making the inference very strong indeed that the redemption of the whole was never contemplated. And Mr. Goschen expressed his own undoubted opinion that the Government has the right to pay off the Debt in whatever proportions it pleases. Accordingly he asks Parliament to enact that, if there are dissentients, they may be paid off in the manner and at the time that Parliament may decide. This clearly gives the Chancellor of the Exchequer a great advantage in dealing with the fundholders. He may give notice of redemption in however small an amount he pleases. For example, if, as is generally assumed, the great majority of the holders of the Reduced Threes should signify their assent, while the holders of Consols should refuse to convert, then Mr. Goschen would be able to give a year's notice to the holders of Consols, and to pay them off in driblets at a time. There would, of course, be difficulties as to deciding as to who was to be paid first; but that is a matter of detail which would offer no serious obstacle. Some reasonable and equitable plan would doubtless be found, and when once it was found, Consol holders would perceive that they stood in the position which the holders of the Three per Cents occupied in the United States recently—that is to say, the Treasury could call in and redeem in monthly, or quarterly, or half-yearly amounts, just as it found convenient. And that he has the means of doing this Mr. Goschen was also at pains to explain. He showed that he has sixty millions of Savings Bank money to apply to redemption; that he can borrow on Treasury and Exchequer bills and Exchequer bonds; and that he can also issue new Two and three-quarter per cent. stock for the purpose of paying off dissentient Consol holders. Bearing all this in mind, it seems clear that the holders of Consols will recognize that it is impossible to resist conversion, and that therefore they will accept the proposals made to them. As we have pointed out above, the proposals in themselves are as considerate towards the fundholders as can be devised; they are fair, in fact, both to the State and to its creditors. It is not likely that better terms will be offered in the future; while it is certain that, if peace is preserved, and Mr. Goschen proceeds, as he intimated, to pay off by piecemeal dissentient holders, they will fare worse than they would do by accepting the present proposals. In the City, though there is some doubt, the prevalent opinion is that the majority of Consol holders will convert. There has, as we have said, been a marked rise in all sound securities this week, and the rise even for a while extended to the speculative classes of securities. In the sound securities the rise is likely to be maintained, for many holders of Consols will doubtless sell, while Consols are well over par, for the purpose of securing a better interest elsewhere; but that the rise can go much further is not probable, for, as we pointed out above, the really sound investments, such as trustees could purchase, are now at such prices that they yield very little more interest than 2¾ per cent.

THE FRENZY OF HENRY LABOUCHERE.

THE folly-drawer of the political philosopher is very full this week, even without transferring to it any of the contents of drawers not strictly political. The latter process might induce a polite inquiry to a writer in the Daily News why the work of a Frenchman (and such a Frenchman!) should be spoken of as "Rameau's Neffe," which is the title of its German translation. But there is no need thus to digress. The drawer is full of its proper occupants. There is Mr. Gladstone referring to Mr. Bright, in a semi-American, semi-unintelligible fashion, as "your great Rochdale patriarch," and refusing to commit the folly (of which no one who knows him ever thought him guilty) of attempting by any public expostulation to wipe off the stain of infamy which has been fixed on him in the Gordon matter. There is Mr. Shaw Lefevre, whom Sir Frederick Milner has "drawn" in a published correspondence with the same patience, skill, and success which Mr. Herbert Gladstone and others have experienced before. There is Mr. Blunt; Mr. Blunt, indeed, appears twice over in the drawer. There is his letter to the people of Deptford, in which he states that, if he had been elected, the Ministry of Lord Salisbury would have "fallen." To think of that now! It was not more stiff than that! You had only to put Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, ex-Conservative, in the place of Mr. Evelyn, ditto, ditto, and voilà, as the old French story has it, un pauvre ministère perdu! But the angel of death did not spread his wings on that blast, and the fatal Mr. Wilfrid Blunt could not display his fatality. Then we have Mr. Wilfrid Blunt again at Manchester giving his version of the celebrated conversation with Mr. Balfour, and a very curious version it is. For it now appears that Mr. Balfour never, even by Mr. Blunt's account, said in so many words anything like that which he was accused of saying on Mr. Blunt's authority, and that the anonymous lady who kindly volunteered the information that she heard it said must be a myth or a Sapphira. For Mr. Blunt only "gathered" from "several" conversations that the fiendish intentions of the base, bloody, and brutal Mr. Balfour were so and so. And we need hardly say that nobody is responsible for what any one else chooses to "gather" from his words. There are yet other pleasing things in our drawer; yet such is our respect for Mr. Labouchere that we put them all aside in favour of him.

For, as we have several times pointed out, we are almost tremblingly alive to any symptoms of—well, let us say—of Gladstoniasis or Gladstonitis in Mr. Labouchere. They are all gone into the world of blight, all those valiant sons of heroes. Sir George Trevelyan, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Morley, Mr. Bryce, to the dark Tower have they come, and not returned—at least in anything like their original likeness. The horrible inquiry of the scoffer—si un Gladstonien peut avoir de l'esprit—has more and more come to be answered by a sorrowful shake of the head. Only Mr. Labouchere made head against the malign influence, and that with increasing signs—which readers of the Saturday Review have had affectionately pointed out—of approaching catastrophe. It reminds one of that noble passage at the end of Marmion:—

> Tunstall lies dead upon the field,
> His life-blood stains the spotless shield;
> Edmund * is down; my life is reft,

And the Admiral—the admiral of the good flag-ship Veritas—shows the most alarming signs of succumbing. A letter to A. F. Bruton, Esq., which is published in the Daily News of Wednesday, is a nearer approach to the Frenzy of John Dennis than anything else we know, except one striking parallel to be mentioned presently. "We have now in power," says Mr. Labouchere, "a number of men whose views on foreign and domestic matters are entirely at variance with those of the nation," which in some incomprehensible way has nevertheless put them to look after foreign and domestic matters. "In order to retain power they work stealthily, pretending to concur in the national view, but in reality endeavouring, as far as they can, to run counter to it." A most parlous feat of gymnastics! "They have, therefore [and, without running counter, we heartily concur with Mr. Labouchere here] to be carefully watched," and, fortunately, here is one Henry Labouchere ("man talent") to do it. "They are desirous to meddle in European affairs which do not concern us, and would, if they were left alone [but I, Henry Labouchere, I am there also], give pledges which would make us parties to a European war. Moreover they hate France because that country has shown that it may be as safe and prosperous [and have six Ministries a year, aye, and everything handsome about it!] under a Republican form of government as under a Monarchical form. Lord Salisbury is himself a weak man [not like me!], and when he negotiates with Germany he becomes a mere catspaw of Prince Bismarck [Foi de

Labouchere; that is so!]. A "more dangerous thing than the continuance in power of a Government affecting, to a certain extent, Liberal principles, and doing its best to neutralize and injure those principles, cannot be conceived. To retain power, and to stave off the Democratic wave which every day [especially at Deptford, and Doncaster, and Dundee] is gaining strength at home, I verily believe that Lord Salisbury, his colleagues, his followers, and the traitors [oh fie! Mr. Labouchere], who, calling themselves Liberals, support him, will plunge us into a European war, were they faced with the alternatives of defeat at home or war abroad."

Now this is really a shocking state of things; that is to say, either the state of Mr. Labouchere or the state of England is shocking. We had thought that nothing but the celebrated mishap of John Dennis, Esq., could equal it; but a person of prehensile genius points out to us a passage in the late Mr. Charles Reade's A Terrible Temptation which is exactly parallel. "Mr. Williams," this remarkable passage runs, "says that a machine has been constructed for malignant purposes called an Air Loom. . . . It was invented and is worked by a gang of villains. . . . The gang are seven in number, but Williams has only seen the four highest—Bill, the King, a master of the art of Magnetic Impregnation [Lord Salisbury, whose scientific attainments are well known]; Jack, the Schoolmaster, shorthand writer to the gang [probably Mr. Goschen]; Sir Archy, Chief Liar to the Association [obviously Mr. Arthur Balfour; see Mr. Blunt and Mr. O'Brien passim]; and the Glove-woman, so called from her always wearing cotton mittens. This personage has never been known to speak to any one. [This is a little like Mr. W. H. Smith, but may admit of other adaptations]." The rest of the passage is too long to quote, but Mr. Williams (to whom, by-the-bye, Reade owed one of his many skilful adaptations of documents) was clearly of the mind of Mr. Labouchere; and, if any one will consult the original (Chapter XXVIII.), he will find all about it. Pray Heaven that Mr. Labouchere be not "kited" or "lobster-cracked"!—horrid operations which the other gang performed on their victims, just as Mr. Balfour untrousered Mr. O'Brien. But perhaps he has been kited already. For we read that this horror "lifts an idea into the brain, where it floats and undulates for hours together." That was what it evidently did to Mr. Labouchere before he tried to deliver himself of it by denouncing the traitors, the war-plungers, and all the rest of it.

His struggles against the fiends and his determination not to be subject to them are most gallant and touching. We take from a sympathizing paper the following summary of Mr. Labouchere's approaching exertions on the Army and Civil Service Estimates. He will move to diminish Vote 1 in order to bring on the question of Egypt. He will move to diminish Vote 3 in order to bring on the question of Mr. Marriott. He will disendow the Duke of Cambridge on Vote 16. He is going to attack in their pockets, if such things have them, the Royal parks, the Royal palaces, the House of Lords, the First Lord of the Treasury, the stationers, the printers, and the recipients of knighthood medals. We should not be surprised if he inquires whether seven mops are issued to seven maids at Whitehall and St. James's instead of (by a corrupt arrangement with the mop-mongers) fourteen as at present. But this feverish activity will deceive no one. It is the influence of the Gang working on Mr. Labouchere, and, in the very moment when he seems to be fighting for the cause of his country, making that cause ridiculous in the eyes of men and angels.

Seriously, the letter which we have quoted, practically in full, above, is one of the very funniest, or one of the saddest, documents ever written. If Mr. Labouchere has deliberately written down to the level of the New Town and North-West Ham Liberal and Radical Club, to whose political Secretary it is addressed, we beg leave to make him our chalorous felicitations. Never wordsmith—not Horace, not James, not Sydney—hammered out a cleverer thing; and we very much doubt whether since the fate of the poor lady who was allowed by a villanous British Government to be knouted by six drummers of the Preobajinsky regiment just off Piccadilly, any such discovery of baseness on the part of a British Ministry has been made by a British humorist. The number of men whom the nation, entirely at variance with them, has sent to power by a majority of some hundred; their stealthy combination of concurrence and counter-currence; their hatred of France; the catspawkiness of Lord Salisbury, with the terrible Bismarck in the distance; the staving of the wave (you can wave a stave, we grant; but can you stave a wave?); the traitors who call themselves Liberals; and the awful consequences which are going to come the day after to-morrow or, by'r lady! Tuesday, are all like the immortal roly-poly pudding—they are "really too good." But what if Mr. Labouchere really means all this rigmarole, all this nonsense of the lowest and stupidest public-house orator? Why, then, we are confronted with a very curious state of things indeed, and it behoves every Gladstonian who would not become an innocent to look to his own brains very carefully indeed. For with hollaing and singing of anthems to Mr. Gladstone you may apparently lose more than your voice—lose something much more precious and necessary. Heaven forfend that this loss should have happened, or be going to happen, to Mr. Labouchere; but, upon our word, it looks uncommonly like it.

ITALIAN WORKMEN IN THE ALPS.

It cannot be said that life in a small Alpine village is very exciting during the winter months. In fact, it is rather slow. In the second-rate inns the young men assemble, drink, sing, howl, and fight with each other, according to the hour of the night; in the better establishments, where such diversions are discouraged, the doors are usually closed at nine o'clock. If the host has a pretty daughter, a few young men will drop in about seven and seat themselves at the far end of the table; but, except by signs and tokens, they rarely venture to give any expression to their passion in the presence of a stranger. They smile sheepishly and drink their wine quietly. If any one addresses them, they act as if an important religious rite had been interrupted. The meek and gentle answer in monosyllables and return to their wine with a sigh, the more energetic speak loudly and sharply; all give you to understand that they do not desire your conversation, and that the less you say the better they will be pleased.

If you happen to have an affection for your host's daughter, this is the best opportunity of gaining her heart. Approach her airily and talk jestingly with her in an undertone. She is sure to laugh, and everybody present will think she is laughing at him. If you make use of this stratagem, however, you had better not walk alone through the village after nightfall for the next few months. In case you are a peaceable old man, you had better drink your wine as silently and look as sheepish as you can. You may gain friends, and will certainly make no enemies by doing so.

Occasionally a belated Italian drops in during the early winter months, in much the same way as a tired bird of passage settles on a ship. Treat him kindly, as the sailors do the bird, and you may find much to interest you in him. He is at once acute and credulous. He has lived under conditions and come into relations that are perfectly closed to every educated man. If you pay for his win and humour his fancies you may, therefore, find that you have entertained, if not exactly an angel, at least an interesting acquaintance unawares. You may almost always spend an amusing hour with a man of this sort. If he has no fairy tale or ghost story to tell—and this is rarely the case—he knows by a bitter experience the life of a travelling workman, which is at times almost as strange and romantic, though its thrilling incidents are separated from each other by intervals of the dullest prose; and if he is worth his salt he will dwell chiefly on the humorous episodes, for a good Italian workman is never sentimental, as Heine, with much justice, remarks that German wanderers of this class almost always are. He possesses tact enough to render it safe to talk freely with him; and, though his opinion of human nature is not high, he is never cynical. Let him depart, therefore, with the best of blessings and a few extra coppers in his pocket, though you know his purse is filled with silver florins.

Those Italian workmen are an interesting part of Alpine village life. In the spring they wander up from the plains, and stay wherever they find work to do. Their character for skill, industry, sobriety, and thrift stands very high. They live simply and save almost everything they earn. When the winter comes round again, they return to their wives and children, who have in all probability been meanwhile employed in cultivating the few poor fields which they possess or are able to rent, and the money they bring with them enables many an Italian family to live in comparative comfort which would otherwise be reduced to the verge of starvation. As they are for the most employed in some branch of the building trade, their winter holiday is no great business loss; the wandering life which they lead lends them a quite peculiar character. As Northern Italians they are acute, and as skilled workmen they understand their trade, but they generally speak the language of the district in which they settle during the summer months, whether it be German or Slav, with some difficulty, though they soon learn to understand it well. This, of course, renders them rather clannish wherever two or three are gathered together. But in their lonely walks to and fro over the mountain passes, they acquire a reticence as to their own private affairs which is unusual in their nation, and a talent for observing and remembering all that they see or hear which is rare anywhere. The reason of their silence is the inborn dislike of the Italian to show himself in an unfavourable light by endeavouring to speak a language over which he has an imperfect command. But though he is silent, he listens and understands, and when he finds a person who can speak Italian, however imperfectly, he is glad to have an opportunity of telling all he knows. He is intensely patriotic, as persons who pass their lives abroad usually are. In religious matters he professes to be a free-thinker, as he supposes all men of culture to be. But there is a point at which his scepticism draws a line. That ghosts and other spirits exist and occasionally appear would be an article of faith with him if the fact were not, as he thinks, so clearly proved by experience; that cows and horses converse with each other in human language on Christmas or New Year's Eve is a pious opinion for which a good deal may be said. He is sceptical as to no superstition that has not the authority of the Church to support it, and in abstract matters disbelieves no one but the Pope and the Protestant missionary who tries to convert him. This condition of mind renders him at once "the bene and the bale" of the student of popular traditions. On the one hand, no one can enrich your collection of tales as well as he. As he has a business exactitude of mind, he is often ready to give you various versions of the same legend, and to tell you where he heard each of them and which he thinks most likely to be exact. On the other, he brings Slav or Italian traditions into the German provinces, and thus carries the folk-lore of one race into the districts that seem to belong to another. For, silent as he usually is, when he is detained by stress of weather—by floods or a snowstorm, let us say—for some days in a single village his reticence is apt suddenly to thaw, and if his audience is sympathetic, he becomes garrulous in his broken Slav or German.

At first sight it seems strange that, while local customs are so stable, legends and stories of every kind should spread so widely. Human indolence and an Alpine winter afford a full explanation. To establish a new custom is an even more difficult matter than to do away with an old one. The Christmas-tree is still an exotic in England; it is hallowed by none of the associations that render it sacred in Germany; whereas the Grimm fairy tales have found an entrance into every nursery. In much the same way strange stories wander from valley to valley in the Alps, while no valley will admit a strange custom. Life is so dull in winter in the smaller villages that the arrival of a stranger, even if he bears his whole fortune on his back, is an event quite sufficient to fill the inn parlour. Every one is eager for news, and for once more anxious to hear than to be heard. All the opinions of the wanderer have a certain weight, and if he tells a story even to a sick child, it is remembered and discussed for a week or two in every cottage. If it is amusing, it is carried next market day to the nearest town, and so it spreads till it is not unlikely to return in a distorted form to its place of birth, and there either to supersede the original tradition, or to be noted by the conscientious collector as an interesting variation of it.

But men are as indolent as they are curious, and a living faith in the old superstitions is no longer to be found except in the places where the old rites have been handed down from generation to generation. An Italian may be asked for a charm against the toothache or a gipsy for a love potion, but neither can introduce a new festival or a new custom that is generally observed. He would be a bold peasant who in Upper Carniola denied the existence of the Wild Huntsman, and there are not many well stricken in years who have not at one time or another heard the winding of his horns or the howling of his hounds; but, if you were to ask them to bake the cakes which in Thuringia are supposed to protect both men and beasts from his force and fraud, there is hardly one who would not meet your suggestion with a shrug of his shoulders or a contemptuous smile. His grandfather lived in the house he occupies, he will tell you, and neither he nor his father ate the cakes. They cannot, therefore, be necessary; he will take his chance. As soon as a superstitious rite has been generally abandoned it falls into disuse, because it is seen that no evil consequences follow on the neglect; but if, during the period of its decay, unexpected disasters happen, it is likely to gain a double hold on the imagination of the people. It is because the inhabitants of mountain regions are more exposed to incalculable natural dangers than the dwellers in the plain that they retain their old customs with a greater tenacity. It is perhaps because the Italian workman has suffered more from the rubs of fortune than most of us that he is so anxious to find some way of outwitting the Devil, in whom he professes not to believe, and so ready to try a charm of any kind when his funds are getting low and there is no work to be had. As he has no settled home, he has no enduring customs, and so he carries charm and story from valley to valley and district to district, with a tolerant belief in their equal truth and efficacy, and a supreme indifference both to the advantages he affords and the vexation he causes to the collector of legendary lore.

THE TURF SILLY SEASON.

It is well known that all daily newspapers have their silly season, hailed with joy by irregular and unpaid correspondents, though dreaded by editors and staff, but on none does it seem to press with such awful weight of dull vacuity as on the racing journalist. Possibly he labours under exceptional disadvantages. The winter of his discontent is a long one, practically lasting according to Act of Jockey Club, from the week which includes the 25th of November to that including the 25th of March in the following year. Even from an agricultural point of view the greater portion of this period is unfavourable for the search after stubble instead of straw, and, judging by results, still more hopeless for the Turf writer seeking throughout the land for the accessories of his daily brick-making. He is cramped too by his loyal adherence, or semblance of adherence, to the great ne sutor ultra dogma. Not for him can the gigantic gooseberry distend its swelling sides, or the sea-serpent rear his maned crest above the billows, or the mouse make his nest in the ear of the unsuspecting cat; and even if driven by despair to allege that these phenomena have come under his own observation, they must be all in the way of business; the gooseberry must have been eaten in the garden at Danebury during the Stockbridge Meeting, the sea-serpent must have been seen by the reporter from the deck of the Calais-Douvres on his return from the Grand Prix, and the cat must have kittened on the back of Mat Dawson's Derby favourite. It is true that the steeplechase and hurdle-race meetings afford occasional and welcome relief; but these column-filling fountains are especially and literally liable to be frozen up, notices of postponement are but paragraphs, and the unhappy scribe has to revert, with openly avowed weariness, to his threadbare topics. The refrain of "There's nothing in it" suggests itself at the end of every sentence; and, considering how swift is the flight of time to most men, his yearnings for the sound of the saddling-bell at Lincoln are pathetic in the extreme.

> The daily round, the common task,
> MAY furnish all we ought to ask, yet who can help sympathizing with the man who, having exhausted those tiresome statistics of owners' winnings and of jockeys' mounts, having laboriously reviewed more than once the past racing season and the performances of the progeny of our principal stallions, having endlessly analysed the prospects of Derby favourites and the handicap for the City and Suburban, finds himself engaged in the twentieth compilation from his inner consciousness of the list of probable runners and riders in the Liverpool Steeplechase. Once a week our journalist seems to experience an acute phase of disappointment, for regularly on Friday morning he informs the sporting public that "The Sheet Calendar so eagerly anticipated contains but little of interest," though in this respect he is somewhat too exacting, for during the past winter at least, the official organ of the Jockey Club could hardly be arraigned for lack of sensational announcement, unless, indeed, the poor newsmonger expected to find, in addition to several warnings off and suspensions of licences, a feuilleton by the senior steward, an essay on Free-trade by the Right Hon. James Lowther, and an Anacreontic Ode from the pen of Mr. E. Weatherby.

But the ill wind which blights the professional, is as the very breath of life to amateur correspondents; the silly season is their opportunity, and to do them justice it must be confessed that they are not slow to avail themselves of it, but mount their hobbies and caracole gaily through columns which at other times would be closed to them as inexorably as are "the Limekilns" against trainers in wet weather. The happily "dead" months of 1887–88 have seen them well to the front; and, taking their inspiration from the time of year, choosing reform of hurdle-racing and steeplechasing as their theme, they have contradicted themselves and each other to their heart's content. Nevertheless, they were all reformers, all assured that the "illegitimate sport" is rapidly deteriorating, that something must be done to resuscitate it, and each man confident that his own pick-me-up was the infallible remedy, even if it consisted merely in a good all-round cursing of the G. N. H. Committee. Amongst the multitude of counsellors, however, there has been observable that discrepancy of opinion which Lord Salisbury recently noted amongst the advocates of Protection, and epitomised in the memorable words—"Where they are precise they are not agreed, and where they are agreed they are not precise." As an instance—Lord Marcus Beresford, who was early in the field, propounded the remarkable theory that hurdle-racing required more "venom" infused into it, and though he had many followers they were wholly unable to agree as to whence the necessary venom was to be derived—strange to say, no one suggested extracting it from his own or other letters on the subject. Again, there was tolerable consensus that steeplechasing would be greatly encouraged by large increase of added money; but how these sums were to be forthcoming at hunt meetings which already could hardly make both ends meet, no one to the best of our recollection condescended to explain.

Still these were but minor points of dispute; an old bone of contention proved as usual most attractive to the combatants, and the thickest of the inky fray was fought over the "grave" or "open ditch," as to the danger, desirability, and feasibility of which doctors disagreed even more hopelessly than is their wont, some declaring the obstacle to be an inhuman trap which numbered its victims by the score, while others equally expert averred it to be the fairest and most negotiable of all possible fences, the one thing which redeemed modern courses from being shams and steeplechasing from ridicule, and condemning the simple hurdle as the cause of more calamity than all the ditches that ever were dug; while most of the disputants on either side were fully equal to the occasion of advertising themselves, their experience, and the general excellence of their method of training and schooling. Both pros and cons, however, stuck to that most misleading appellation "open ditch"; for how a ditch which is closed or "guarded" by a rail can by any stretch of imagination be declared open is a conundrum which still awaits solution. Perhaps when the schoolmaster comes back from abroad even sporting correspondents may read Alfred de Musset, and will understand "qu'il faut qu'une porte soit ouverte ou fermée."

Meantime the gods of the G. N. H. C. must have been quaffing their nectar in Old Burlington Street and laughing at the woes of mortals, for no sign or sound came from that Olympus till just as the strife was dying out, when there appeared in a sporting weekly a few columns of official statistics, which proved, as far as figures can prove, that, instead of entries having diminished, as was alleged, owing to the obstinacy and incapacity of the authorities, steeplechasing and hurdleracing in this respect at least, had never been in so flourishing a condition as at present

We may bury the hatchet now, and write R.I.P. over its resting-place; it will not be wanted again before December. The Turf silly season is over, and the heart of the racing editor is glad within him.

COMING BOOK-SALES.

Decidedly there is a good time coming for les Amoureux du Livre. Before March goes out like a lamb more than one "distinguished bibliopole"—to use the consecrated auction phrase—will have brought his cherished treasures under the hammer, while the last days of the month and the first week of April will witness the dispersal of the second portion of the extraordinarily varied and attractive collection of the late Mr. Gibson Craig. But the miscellaneous sales which precede this major event have also considerable interest; and the list of books and MSS. to be sold at Sotheby's between the 19th and 22nd current is not without its notable items. For instance, there are the excessively rare poem by William Drummond of Hawthornden, Forth Feasting, Edinburgh, 1617, and the almost equally rare Nosce Teipsum of Sir John Davies, 1599. There are excellent rarities of Robert Greene, of Peele, of Nash, of Marston; there are Euphues and his England and the Anatomy in black letter; there is even "Rare Ben Jonson's" particular copy of Drayton's Poly-Olbion, with his motto in his own "Roman hand" on the frontispiece, and with the portrait of Prince Henry not absent. There are also Thomas Middleton's unique Honorable Entertainments, Compos'd for the Service of this Noble Cittie [i.e. London], a little 12mo., dated 1621, and bound by Lortic; The Charter and Laws of the City of New York, 1719; and two rare works by William Blake, to wit, the America, in blue ink, 1793, and the Poetical Sketches, by W. B., of 1783, only two or three copies of which are known to exist, one of them being the property of Mr. F. Locker-Lampson. The copy now about to be sold was formerly in the possession of Blake's biographer, Mr. Gilchrist. But the pearl of this batch is probably the MS. volume of Scotch Poems, by Robt. Burness, described in vol. vi. of Paterson's edition of the Works, and now, after many vicissitudes, again in the market. A few of the leaves—i.e. from 5 to 10 inclusive—were removed by some earlier possessor, who thus mutilated "Holy Fair" and "Halloween"; but the remainder of the book, a folio of 80 pages, contains transcripts made, circa 1785-6, by the poet himself, of thirteen more of his principal pieces. It includes a number of variations from the existing versions, and among other things fixes the date of "Holy Fair." Stothard's Life, by Mrs. Bray, with additional illustrations; the Contes et Nouvelles de La Fontaine ("édition dite des fermiers généraux"); a number of caricatures by Woodward, Rowlandson, Gillray, and Bunbury, and a goodly list of first editions of Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, and Ainsworth are also to be sold at the same time.

As might, perhaps, be anticipated, the library of Mr. Gibson Craig is especially strong in books relating to Scotland, as well as in all the publications, regular and occasional, of the Ballantyne, Maitland, Roxburghe, and other literary clubs. A few samples of its richest treasures have been already described by Mr. Craig himself in his Facsimiles of Old Book-Binding, twenty-five copies of which he printed privately in 1882. One of these, possibly the most interesting of all, is a copy of Paradin's Cronique de Savoye, published at Lyons by Jean de Tournes in 1552. It once belonged to Mary, Queen of Scots, and in the list of "Jowellis," &c., in the castle of Edinburgh in 1578 it is described as "pertening to oure Soverane Lord," James VI., and "his hienes deerest moder." It is still in admirable preservation, clothed in its original calf, stamped in gold in the centre of each side with the arms of Scotland, and having down the back "the initial M. ensigned with a crown." The covers yet show the remains of the old silk tapes which tied it. Its penultimate possessor was Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, at whose sale Mr. Craig purchased it in 1851. Another book described in the Facsimiles is Camerarius De Prædestinatione, bound in white kid, and lavishly blind-tooled with the crescents and cyphers of Diane de Poictiers and Henri II. A third is Humphrey's Life of Bishop Jewell, in ancient calf with gaufré edges, and bearing the crest and motto of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, to whom it was apparently presented by the author. But bindings are by no means the distinctive feature of Mr. Craig's library. It includes a large and very fine Kilmarnock Burns (1786); and there is also a copy of Fergusson's Poems, which once belonged to Burns himself and contains an original MS. poem by him on Jeremiah xv. 10, in his own handwriting. A copy of the so-called Queen Elizabeth's Prayer-book, John Daye, 1578; an unique Italian Block-Book; De Montfort, a manuscript tragedy by Thomas Campbell; several privately printed family histories, and a number of specimens from the libraries of D'Hoym, De Thou, Grolier, Soubise, and Mme. de Pompadour are also enumerated in Messrs. Sotheby's bulky Catalogue, of which it is impossible here to give any more detailed account.

Other sales are looming in the not distant future. April will break up the library of Mr. R. B. Stewart, of Glasgow, with all its stores of theology, antiquities, and music. Then, occupying probably thirty days, will come the scattering of the Turner collection, whereby will be offered to the discriminating amateur an almost, if not wholly, unparalleled assemblage of Spanish and Italian literature, romances of chivalry, Horæ, and large paper copies of all kinds, attired in the most approved costumes of Padeloup, Clovis and Nicolas Eve, Roger Payne, Le Gascon, Derome, Kalthoeber, Capé, and other luminaries of the bibliopegistic art. Last, but certainly not least in this place, follows the library of the late Mr. Beresford-Hope, which contains, besides much general literature, many valuable and important volumes of prints, a number of architectural and theological books, a remarkable series of Salisbury and other Liturgies, several complete sets of the transactions and publications of literary Societies, and a few very choice illuminated manuscripts.

FRENCH PLAYS.

Of the numerous plays which have been produced lately by the excellent French company now acting at the Royalty Theatre none has been more interesting or better performed than Beaumarchais's Le Mariage de Figaro. The history of this brilliant comedy is, perhaps, the most stirring of that of any in existence, and is, of course, well known. Produced with prodigious success in 1784, it received only two years later the crowning glory of being selected by Mozart as the libretto of his famous opera Le Nozze di Figaro. The operatic version is still so popular that when we say that its plot follows closely that of the comedy we need not mention it further, but simply recall that it consists of a series of diverting complications, sustained by inimitable dialogue, which those who can read between the lines, and are intimately acquainted with the political history of the period immediately preceding the Revolution of 1789, will find pregnant with bitter sarcasm against the abuses of then existing institutions. Many, however, of its biting sallies of wit have been blunted by time and rendered almost unintelligible. The fifth act, however, is so great a masterpiece of dramatic construction that the famous scene in which character after character is led out of concealment, only the more clearly to confound the guilty and justify the innocent, is productive of as much hearty laughter now as it was a hundred years ago. It is essentially a one-part comedy. Even the numerous female characters, admirable as they are, are subordinated to the great creation of Figaro, which stands out as prominently in this play as Falstaff does in The Merry Wives of Windsor, or Tartufe in Molière's great work. M. Coquelin avails himself of the numerous opportunities the part affords him to display, not only his native talent, but the excellence of the training in his art which he himself is the first to acknowledge he owes to the immense ability as a "coach" of his master, the late M. Regnier. Very soon after his first entry it becomes evident that he perfectly understands that Figaro is something more than a mere lively factotum of the city of Seville, and barbiere di qualità. Beaumarchais intended him as the incarnation of the lower class of the French people, illustrating all its finer qualities in one many-sided character—its wit and liveliness, its ready sympathy for suffering, and its hatred of injustice. Figaro is the advocate of the unfortunate, ever ready to place his homely philosophy and quick wit at the service of the down-trodden, and to speak up for their rights wherever he can. Beaumarchais himself informs us that, carried away by the enthusiasm of his subject, he was not aware of the prodigious effect it would produce when acted; and possibly, had not the right emphasis been placed upon certain lines by M. Dazincourt, who first played the part of Figaro, the piece would have passed off as did the Barbier de Séville, without creating any extraordinary sensation. It is an ascertained fact, however, that the author instructed Dazincourt, and doubtless told him exactly on what lines to dwell with significant inflection. The Théâtre Français fortunately preserves all its traditions. They are handed down from actor to actor, and in the works of Racine, Molière, Corneille, Beaumarchais, and Voltaire very few changes are made in the manner of delivering the great speeches. M. Coquelin has evidently mastered all the traditions which surround the part of Figaro, and he enters into its spirit in a manner which renders this particular impersonation of exceptional interest. By the varied eloquence of his elocution and his avoidance of exaggeration he lifts the character, which could easily be rendered very vulgar were its dignity in the least degree diminished, into a region of fanciful comedy. Nothing could be finer than M. Coquelin's delivery of the celebrated soliloquy which opens the fifth act. A few words of praise are due to Mlle. Kerwich, who played Cherubin very prettily; to Mme. Patry, a very versatile actress, who was sufficiently stately without being too stiff as the injured Countess, and to Mlle. Barety, who was a delightful Suzanne. M. Jean Coquelin was whimsical as Bride d'Oison; but this is precisely one of the characters which ceases to provoke those roars of laughter it did when everybody recognized, under the guise of the stuttering judge, one of the most notorious rascals that then disgraced the Parisian bar. M. Duquesne was the Comte Almaviva, but played it a trifle too heavily. He certainly did not recall Mario.

The second novelty of the past week consisted of a very even performance on Thursday evening of M. Emile Augier's well-known play Gabrielle, the plot of which most readers of contemporary French literature will remember turns upon the subject of the wife of a country lawyer who deems herself neglected by her money-making husband, and consoles herself with the attentions of a romantic youth, who has come from Paris on a visit. The husband, a money-making and unsentimental man, discovers the intrigue in time, and saves his wife from dishonour by a prudent stratagem, so that as the curtain falls she throws herself into his arms, exclaiming, "Oh! père de famille! poëte, que je t'aime"—a line which, by the way, brought more ridicule on the head of M. Augier than anything that he has ever written, since Julien can scarcely be called a poet; for it is precisely the lack of poetical sentiment which is the cause of the diminished affection of his wife. In many scenes, however, this play, which is otherwise rather tedious, is surprisingly fine, and the character of Julien, which was a great favourite with M. Regnier, suits M. Coquelin perfectly. As usual with Augier, the scene is laid in middle-class society, and M. Coquelin is inimitable as a bourgeois. There is a soliloquy in the third act in which the heart-broken husband takes a long farewell of all the occupations which have hitherto been so pleasant to him, which forcibly suggests the idea that perhaps M. Augier in his hours of leisure has studied Othello with advantage to himself. The resemblance between this speech and the one in Shakespeare's tragedy in which the Moor bids farewell to all the previous occupations of his life is, to say the least, surprising. The part of Gabrielle was played by Mlle. Barety, who is a great acquisition to the company, and makes the best of one of the least interesting of stage heroines. Mme. Patry, a versatile actress, played Adrienne with dignity. M. Duquesne did the best he could for the unsympathetic lover Stéphane, and M. Jean Coquelin acted the only amusing part in the piece, Tamponet, with a great deal of vivacity, although, to be sure, his voice at times sounded very fresh and juvenile for an old man of seventy.

During the week M. Coquelin has reappeared as Tartufe—a performance which was noticed at considerable length when it was produced last December during M. Coquelin's first engagement.

INDIAN FRONTIER POLICY AND EXCISE.

THE darkeners of counsel who achieve notoriety by senseless interpellations on Indian topics are this week to be congratulated on a new extravagance. They have tried the effect of combination. Two motions, each too absurd and indefensible to bear serious discussion, were rendered still more palpably foolish by the suggestion that the topics to which they referred are connected by a chain of causation. One honourable member wishes to impugn the entire frontier policy of the Government; another wishes to depict the Indian Excise Department as a huge machine of immorality. The brilliant idea occurred to the authors of these motions that each would gain from being united to the other, that the unwisdom of the Indian frontier policy would be more conspicuous when it was shown to have necessitated recourse to immoral sources of revenue, and the hateful policy of stimulating intoxication, in order to increase the Excise, be shown in an especially odious light when traced to the unholy requirements of a Jingo policy. Mr. Slagg and Mr. Caine, accordingly, joined forces, and with the natural courage which combination inspires, led a gallant assault on the policy of the Government of India with regard to its military expenditure on the frontier, and on the Provincial Governments as regards the management of their Excise. Such a charge is, on the face of it, inadmissible for the purposes of serious discussion. In a court of law it would be dismissed for "multifariousness." Legal tribunals wisely insist that a suitor shall deal with certain clearly defined topics, and with one of them at a time. To make two perfectly unfounded accusations, and heighten the effect of each by asserting their interdependence, is a proceeding which, however gratifying to an excited controversialist, does not favour the chances of reasonable inquiry or satisfactory result. A more indulgent rule necessarily prevails in an Assembly such as the House of Commons. None the less does it add to the futility of ignorant criticism that it should be permitted to embrace in a single discussion topics which are essentially unconnected, and each of which is only liable to be obscured by attempts to consider it in juxtaposition with the other. Lord Randolph Churchill justly observed that "it shows the laxity of the rules of this Assembly that a discussion of Indian affairs should be allowed to take such a course as this discussion has taken to-night." Such a procedure, however, being permitted, it is matter for congratulation that an ill-constructed and unsustainable motion had the result of eliciting from several competent authorities statements of a high degree of interest and importance. The charges were, first, that the policy of military expenditure on the frontier was unwise; secondly, that this expenditure was giving rise to grave financial difficulties; and, thirdly, that, in order to meet those difficulties, the Government of India was, besides imposing additional taxation, stimulating "the sale of intoxicating liquors, for revenue purposes, with serious results to the moral and material welfare of the people." We shall see what those who know the facts of the case have to say on each.

As regards the first, the one conclusive answer is that no measure was ever more carefully considered and more deliberately adopted, with the consent of every authority and the agreement of responsible politicians of every party in the House of Commons. The works on the Indus frontier were, Sir John Gorst said, "recommended by a carefully-chosen committee of experts in India, and were sanctioned by the noble lord himself" (the Marquess of Ripon) "and the Government of which he was then a member." Lord Ripon, it is well known, went out to India with strong preconceived views against an active policy in the direction of Afghanistan. Acting on those views, he directed the demolition of the military railway which his predecessor had commenced in the direction of Quetta. "The Sind-Pishin Railway was interrupted on political grounds in 1880, and down to 1883 there was a complete suspension of the works. There was no doubt that the suspension had added greatly to the cost; and, when the works were renewed in 1883 by the very same Government which had originally stopped them, Brigadier-General Sir Samuel Browne and his officers, civil and military, were instructed to carry them on with the greatest possible expedition." The necessity of the precautions, to which Lord Ripon became an unwilling convert in 1883, was demonstrated with alarming emphasis in 1885, when Lord Dufferin found himself, to use Lord Randolph Churchill's expression, "as near to war with Russia as we could be without being actually at war." Enormous expenditure was then incurred, and frightful risks were run in consequence of our unpreparedness for any action of defence or attack. "The frontier," says Lord Randolph Churchill, "was defenceless. There were no railways and hardly any roads and bridges to enable our troops to move about with ease, and without very heavy loss and expense." After months of desperate endeavour to make up for lost time, of the profuse outlay which emergency always entails, and of intense anxiety arising from the conviction that, should Russia choose to come to blows on the Candahar plateau, we were without the necessary machinery for obstructing her, the Government of India found itself again with breathing space; and resolved, with the warm approval of every military adviser, that no such panic could be allowed to recur, that the condition of the frontier was incompatible with the safety of the great Empire, which, as its rulers, we were bound to protect from invasion, and that Russia, being now within a pistol-shot of Herat and conterminous for hundreds of miles with Afghanistan, the necessary provision must be made for events which every year was bringing more and more within the range of immediate probability. The strategical position was explained with admirable lucidity by Sir E. Hamley, whose authoritative explanation of the grounds of alarm will, it may be hoped, put an end for ever to the fatuous indifference with which certain classes of English politicians have hitherto regarded the approach of an enormous danger. Russia, he said, is now prepared to put pressure upon England, whenever her policy needed it, through our Indian frontier. A railway traverses the Caucasus, and the garrison of the Caucasus could easily put down an advance force of fifty thousand men, which, of course, could be supplemented from Southern Russia. Northern Russia is traversed by railways and canals, and "when Russia pleases, all her immense force in men and material can be concentrated on the Caspian." The Caspian is a Russian lake, covered by Russian transports, ready to convey the combatants to its eastern shores. From its eastern shores a railway has been constructed to within a few marches of Herat. The hostile populations, through which it was pushed, have been exterminated or subdued. Persia looks on in trembling helplessness at the approach of a Power whose progress she could not delay for an hour. The Aral Sea is on the north what the Caspian is to the west, an effectual basis for the collection of Russian supplies and the despatch of Russian armaments. A line of strong garrisons carries the forces of the advancing Power along the Oxus to a point at which they could easily co-operate with the army of the Caspian. The favourite dream of Russian strategists, formulated by Scobeleff with brutal outspokenness, has ever been to organize hordes of Asiatic horsemen, and to hurl them on the Indian frontier and re-enact the days of Tamerlane. The scheme is, as Sir E. Hamley said, "stupendous"; but it has been deliberately conceived and persistently followed out. "Russia knows her own mind," and the dream has never been brought so far within the limits of possibility as it is to-day. She would begin with the invasion of Afghanistan, and, having "possessed herself of the three corner cities of Herat, Cabul, and Candahar, she would in the space between them proceed to erect an advance base of operations by filling it with immense supplies of men and material for a campaign against India." Such being the programme, is the Indian Government to look on in passive acquiescence? If we await attack in the plain of the Indus, we shall do so, the soldiers tell us, at immense strategical disadvantage, and, according to the views of every Indian authority, run formidable political risk. The Government have determined to be ready to strike an effectual blow, at any rate, for the defence of Candahar. We shall have, when the military works are complete, a good military high-road parallel to the Indus, a couple of railways converging on Quetta, several important lines which will enable us to bring the whole military resources of India, and, viâ Kurrachee, of England, at the shortest possible notice to bear upon any spot on our frontier which the movements of Russia show to be endangered. We have an entrenched camp within British territory, but near enough to Candahar to allow of our anticipating Russian attack; we have fortified the mountain barriers which a Russian invading force would have to surmount, and are tunnelling a range which might otherwise delay our advance. We may thus hope, says General Hamley, "to give tranquillity to India for generations." Can any one—can even Mr. Slagg?—seriously believe that the policy, thus carefully and calmly elaborated, deserves condemnation as "unwise"?

As regards the financial difficulties of the Government of India, no difference of opinion among competent authorities can be said to exist. We have so recently considered them that there is no need to say more than that the views which we ventured to express are completely borne out by the statements of the Under-Secretary of State and Lord Randolph Churchill in the recent discussion. Lord Randolph's contention, however, that the growth of the Indian expenditure during the last decade is a proof of extravagance, has been, to a large extent, disposed of by the explanation recently given by the Indian Finance Minister. The largest portion of the growth arises from the development of departments, such as Railways, Irrigation, Post Office or Forests, the net result of which is to enrich the Exchequer. There is a certain automatic increase in expenditure arising from the growth of population and the general demands of an improving administration. But it is moderate, and has certainly not, as the Finance Minister showed, exceeded the barest demands of a civilized Government.

The last head of the accusation—namely, that the Government had stimulated the consumption of alcoholic drinks in order to increase the Excise—hardly deserves anything but the comic treatment to which Sir Richard Temple exposed it. Sir John Gorst met it point blank by the statement that the invariably recognized policy of the Government is to place as high a tax on spirits as could be imposed without giving rise to smuggling and illicit distillation. Every one who knows the Indian administration, is aware of this policy and of the sedulous care with which the Government enforces it. Of late years the Provincial Governments, in the course of that development of their local resources to which the decentralization of finance has given rise, have watched the operation of the Excise with care, and have taken measures to stop illicit manufacture, and to secure the legal amount of tax for their Exchequers. In Bengal an experiment was tried which, after prolonged inquiry, was not approved, but which certainly was not devised by Sir Ashley Eden—a perfect type of the best order of administrator—in the interests of intoxication. There has been an increase of recent years in the amount realized by the tax, which is fully accounted for by increased efficiency in the machinery of collection, and the prosperous seasons which the Indian peasantry have enjoyed. The charge, asserted or implied in Mr. Slagg's resolution, that the Government or its officials have deliberately stimulated the consumption of spirits, from a financial motive, is in direct contradiction of known facts, and does little credit to the knowledge or intelligence of those by whom it was advanced.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

SINCE its production at Norwich Dr. Mackenzie's oratorio, The Rose of Sharon, has been given more than once in London under the conduct of the composer, with the advantages of a chorus of exceptional competency and training, an excellent orchestra, and the original executants of the solo parts. On Tuesday, at the St. James's Hall, Mme. Nordica and Miss Hope Glenn replaced Mme. Albani and Mme. Trebelli, while Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Santley once again interpreted the music assigned to the Beloved and King Solomon, with the technical perfection and artistic feeling that makes all comment superfluous. Mme. Nordica's method is not altogether such as is traditionally associated with oratorio singing; but her rendering of the Sulamite's part showed some dramatic apprehension, though differing considerably from that of Mme. Albani. There was less light and shade in her rendering of the music, and decidedly less emotional power. We missed, for instance, the thrilling rapture with which Mme. Albani gave the exquisite, though rather exacting, melodic theme, "My Beloved is mine, and I am his," where it recurs after the fine sequence of choruses in the second part. In numbers of a graver character, such as "The Lord is my Shepherd," Mme. Nordica was completely successful. The contralto solos were sung in excellent style by Miss Hope Glenn. Always an important function in oratorios, the chorus is remarkably prominent in The Rose of Sharon, owing to the dramatic significance of the music. This is especially notable of the villagers' chorus and the choruses of women interjected in the lyrics of the Sulamite in the second part, where the relation of chorus to the dramatic action is analogous with its ancient employment in classic drama. Indeed, the term "dramatic oratorio" applied by the composer to The Rose of Sharon is completely justified by the character of the choral numbers, and suffices to distinguish this original and beautiful work from the Mendelssohnian type of oratorio. On Tuesday the choruses were admirably sung, all sections of the choir showing, by their execution of music that is at times extremely difficult, the efficiency that comes of devoted study and perfect confidence in the conductor. There is little need to speak of the delicacy and beauty of tone with which the rich and elaborate accompaniments, the various instrumental episodes—such as the delightful "Sleep" music—were rendered by the orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Carrodus.

LONDON BIRDS—THE SEA-GULL.

THE sea-gull—we speak generically—is entitled to a place in the list of London birds. In the London below-bridge, the busy, mercantile, riparian London, among the docks and shipping, this bird can hardly be said to be uncommon, being at all events a frequent visitor. It does not, however, confine itself entirely to the East-end, as specimens may from time to time be seen, especially in the spring, about the waters in the parks of the West End, the Serpentine in Hyde Park being a specially favourite resort.

During the severe weather we have lately experienced, accompanied as it has been by hard north-easterly winds and snow, Londoners have had an unusual opportunity of observing the habits of sea-gulls, as they have frequented the river above bridge, literally in hundreds, their range extending at least to Putney—in other words, from one end of London to the other. It is seldom, indeed, that these birds appear in such numbers on the Thames above London Bridge as they have done lately, and their appearance has, from its rarity, caused a corresponding excitement among Londoners, as is proved by the numbers of people that have crowded the bridges and embankments to watch their movements. To a considerable proportion of them, no doubt, the marvellous flight and power of wing of the gull came as an absolute revelation. To those intimately acquainted with the bird and its ways, the advent of so many on the higher reaches of the river was not only a surprise, but a source of enjoyment, which no doubt induced them to form part of the crowds engaged in watching the birds. There is, perhaps, some slight cause for wonder, when we consider the habit so common to gulls of following the tide in rivers, that these birds are not more often seen in London between bridges, as food in the tideway cannot be lacking to them. The reasons of their scarceness, however, are no doubt, firstly, the crowded state of the river itself, to say nothing of the densely populated condition of its banks, and, secondly, the great distance from the sands and saltings of the estuary to which the birds always retire for the night. In addition, food is plentiful in the lower reaches; and therefore, except in the case of such exceptional weather as we have lately experienced, the gulls find no occasion to venture into the narrow and crowded waterway of the river as it flows through London.

When we say that food is plentiful in the lower reaches of the river, we must not be understood to speak of food to be found in the river itself, or even on its banks; as the sea-gull in autumn, winter, and early spring, before it leaves for its breeding-places, is as fond of foraging in the fields and following the plough as is the rook—with which, indeed, it may often be seen feeding in the greatest amity. No doubt the late immigration of this bird into London was to a very considerable extent caused by the fact that its feeding-grounds on land were closed to it by the snow and frost, and that it was therefore forced to depend entirely on the water for its supplies.

The gull may be said to be omnivorous; nothing, indeed, apparently comes amiss. It will devour small fish, and for this reason is very fond of following shrimpers and other small trawling vessels for the feast to be obtained when the fishermen are shaking out their nets—mollusks and crustaceans which it finds left by the tide, and, one of its greatest feasts perhaps, the scraps and offal thrown overboard from the cook's galley of a passing ship. So fond, indeed, are the gulls of the meal provided them by the refuse thrown overboard from ships, that they will in a harbour where a guardship is moored, apparently observing times and seasons, attend daily with the greatest regularity for the food they know will be supplied to them. In addition they will, as we have said, wander far inland in search of worms and grubs, and when so engaged will not even disdain on occasion to help themselves to the farmer's grain, though this cannot be said in any way to be their natural food. That a gull, however, can live entirely on corn is proved by the fact that the stomach of one so kept by John Hunter is now preserved in the Museum of the College of Surgeons.

Gulls make excellent pets, and are most useful in gardens, having an illimitable appetite for slugs and a general aptitude for devouring obnoxious insects. And, strange though it may appear, considering their natural wariness and wildness, it is not necessary to obtain them young, as an adult bird, pinioned by a good or lucky shot as the case may be, will, often before its wound has thoroughly healed, have become so tame that it will come with great regularity to be fed, if it does not, as certainly will eventually be the case, know and follow the person who is in the habit of feeding it. Gulls in captivity, or rather wandering at large in a garden, though deprived of their power of flight, are by no means the miserable birds that many would imagine. On the contrary, they are most masterful, and evidently consider themselves of very great importance. They will generally condescend to notice all the members of the household to which they belong, though naturally they have their favourites, giving their preference as a rule to those who feed them, and will possibly admit certain well-known visitors to a limited intimacy; but they usually resent the intrusion of strangers, even to the extent of pecking their heels—a far from pleasant operation for the victim, especially if performed by a specimen of one of the larger gulls. They are, in fact, birds of great character, each individual having ways of its own.

Their noisiness—they cannot be said by their best friends to possess musical voices—is to some few people an absolute bar to their being kept as pets. We, however, can only pity those whose nerves are so highly strung, as they thereby lose, at all events, the chance of the friendship of one of these delightfully intelligent birds.

Some knowledge of these birds and their habits may be obtained by watching those in the Zoological Gardens, where a considerable number are kept, pinioned and in a semi-domesticated condition, yet living so happily, that many of them nest in the spring, though we fear with, as a rule, little satisfaction either to themselves or their keepers. Here the birds may be seen in all states of plumage, from the mottled brown of the first year to the pure white and grey and black of the adult. Since the large aviary was built last year, matters have been so ordered that some of the smaller gulls may be seen unpinioned, and, therefore, able to use their wings.

In London, as we have said, gulls are only occasional visitors, and the Londoner must go far from town to make certain of seeing them in all their beauty.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

THE main feature of the concert at the Crystal Palace last Saturday was Mendelssohn's music to Œdipus at Colonos. Even the interest which attaches to any unfrequently performed work by a great composer failed to make the afternoon a lively one. The rest of a by no means remarkable programme was miscellaneous and chiefly vocal, while the Œdipus itself could not compensate for the lack of any important instrumental number. If only in deference to the fame of its composer, and to satisfy the curiosity of the public, it is right that this work should be sometimes heard. These occasions, however, will always be rare, as it is easy to see why such a work is not more popular. We are as much accustomed to look at the Greeks in a heroic light as to approach religious mysteries with awe; to read their poets with a glamour as to treat the Bible with a spirit of reverence. If we can complain that church music is not religious, we can as justly complain that the setting of a Greek play is not heroical, or, at any rate, not conceived in the classical spirit. And we are surely justified in this; for, if the separate utterances of any piece of music mean nothing precise, its ensemble has an unmistakable character. When looked at as a language, music read by the letter makes most indefinite, by the spirit most definite, statements. Now if the "Dead March in Saul" be considered a good example of the simplicity, majesty, and severity of a classic style, Mendelssohn's Œdipus is unquestionably wanting in these qualities. It is not altogether simple, stern, and grand; not altogether free from gush, from a whining spirit, and the modern diffuseness. You do not find pretty sentimental word-spinning in Sophocles's play, but you meet with loose phrases, rambling picturesquely here and there, in Mendelssohn's music. Perhaps the best work, as far as setting goes, has not been done in the most important places. The short dialogue choruses near the beginning are finely and appropriately effective. Nor were these speeches loud or noisily accompanied; they were restrained and sad, and seemed superstitious in their simplicity. As music, of course the well-known chorus describing Colonos is much more important. It is a smooth, beautiful, and tuneful chorus, quite modern in feeling. Some stirring and martial passages occur in the choruses connected with the battle, and the choir sang them with great spirit. Indeed, in spite of a few hesitations, the performance, as a whole, did fair justice to the work. The mixture of recitation with choruses in a case of this sort, where the reciter sometimes takes both parts of a dialogue and sometimes bandies answers with the choir, is, if inevitable, very often unpleasant, and at times destructive to art. Mr. Charles Fry, the reader, was not to blame for that. He carried out his long and difficult task with constantly sustained energy and an unflagging attention to details. His enunciation was clear and distinct throughout; and, if he appeared rather to exaggerate the part of Œdipus in the direction of plaintive pathos, it was probably in some measure owing to the contrast of the bare voice of speech with the full power and varied tone of the orchestra. This may have robbed the character of some elements of tragic and heroic power. The Œdipus of Sophocles strikes one in no way as a whining, beaten-down beggar or jottering sentimentalist, but as a terrible old man, linked with the Gods and the destinies of nations, and perhaps all the more awful from being masked in rags. Mr. Fry also declaimed "The Minstrel's Curse," a ballad translated from the German of Uhland. An orchestral accompaniment has been provided by Mr. F. Corder, consisting chiefly of short phrases descriptively instrumented, which occur for the most part between the stanzas. From the nature of the problem one could not expect the effect to be other than disconnected; but Mr. Corder has nevertheless contrived to introduce some very significant orchestration. Miss Louise Dotti sang two airs, which showed her voice to be of sympathetic and tender quality, especially in the lower notes. She gave Mozart's "Dove sono" (Le Nozze di Figaro) with expression and suitable style, too; but in "Angels ever bright and fair" she thought it necessary to conform to the stupidest Handel traditions. Simple as they are in modulation, &c., Handel's airs must either be sung as marked tunes, or else mean nothing. Surely very few hold the old Puritan view that religious feeling demands an intolerably dreary, pointless performance, fit to make a burlesque of any air, whether dramatic or purely melodious. Great singers—we will not say artists—in order to show off their voices, have set a precedent for the ridiculously slow time in which this air was taken on Saturday.

Hitherto we have spoken of nothing but vocal music, and, indeed, if we except Weber's Overture to Euryanthe, there was no purely instrumental number on the programme. We can only say that we have heard the Overture done at these concerts with more fire and expression than on Saturday, when the performance was somewhat wooden. In place of instrumental solos, the London Vocal Union, who assisted the Crystal Palace Choir in Œdipus, sang T. Cooke's charming Glee, "Strike the Lyre," and Hatton's somewhat commonplace Part-Song, "When Evening's Twilight." They sang with smoothness and clear, steady vocalization in both numbers, as well as in "Ladies, sigh no more" (Stevens), which they gave in answer to a recall. In honour of the Silver Wedding the Overture was prefaced by Brinley Richards' "God Bless the Prince of Wales."

DRAMATIC RECORD.

MESSRS. LYNWOOD and Mark Ambient's drama Christina, which was originally produced at the Prince of Wales' Theatre at a matinée some months since, was lately revived at the Olympic. We remarked on the occasion of its original performance that "when certain modifications have been introduced it may prove a taking piece." Unfortunately, we fear, this advice has been discarded, for the piece still requires a great deal of modifying if it is to prove as successful as in many ways it deserves to be. The plot deals, as we related in a former review, with a subject which has lately done duty only too often on our stage—Nihilism—and which is becoming tedious from repetition. The authors have, however, treated it with some degree of novelty, and made the revolutionary episodes subservient to the love interest, which is sufficiently sympathetic to command attention. The characterization is well managed, and the dialogue, even if it is rather old-fashioned, is terse and dramatic. The piece is now extremely well put upon the stage, some of the scenery being particularly effective; notably so the first, which gives a very pretty view of Lake Geneva from Chillon. The acting is excellent. Mr. E. S. Willard takes the part created by Mr. Hermann Vezin; and, since it is that of a villain of the deepest dye, he is quite in his element, and consequently eminently successful. It is impossible to be more villanous. Mr. Yorke Stevens plays the hero; and, as he is always a pleasant actor, he contrives to invest the part with a good deal of interest which it previously lacked. Miss Alma Murray is afforded in the play, as Christina, the best opportunity for the display of her varied talents she has had since she performed Beatrice Cenci; and she avails herself of it, acting throughout with much charm in the lighter scenes, and with genuine intensity in the tragic episodes of the last two acts.

The Don is urging on his wild career at Toole's Theatre in good earnest, and seems likely to be encouraged to continue it for a long time to come. As it has been remarked before, it is unfair to judge a play from a first night's performance; and an audience consisting of personal friends of the performers or critics or—the most difficult of relationships—both in one is not the most satisfactory one. Mr. Toole has certainly found in the Don a part that suits him in every way, and the newness of such a character for him gives him ample scope for his humour and pathos; for, though the audience see through the absurdity of the situation, still they cannot help sympathizing with the poor Dean in his distress and perplexity when he is so constantly and consistently being misunderstood, and finally on the point of being taken off to prison. Good support in a play like The Don, where each character is telling, is a necessity for its success, and in The Don all the parts are well sustained. Miss Linden renders that of Dora particularly pretty and attractive by her graceful and naïve way of acting it. Miss Violet Vanbrugh's Kitty Maitland, charming as it is, is not quite one's idea of a high-spirited girl, not above flirtation with undergraduates. She might, for instance, be got up less æsthetically, and be, in fact, altogether more commonplace. Miss Kate Phillips is, as usual—though not in the usual line for her—really excellent as the smart and lively little widow. Mr. Shelton is gyp-and-scoutlike (he is called a gyp) as Harris. Of the merits of Miss Thorne's and Mr. Billington's performances we have spoken before.

REVIEWS.

A JUDGMENT on the "balance of military power in Europe," when made by an authority with any pretensions to competence, would be sure of a hearing at present. Colonel Maurice's right to be listened to at any time will not be disputed, and his book comes out under particularly favourable circumstances. As he explains in his preface he was stung, if not into writing, at least into writing in the way he chose, by the attack of a controversialist on a friend, and his not very courteous treatment of himself. Instead of the treatise which was to have been written, Colonel Maurice published a series of articles in answer to Sir Charles Dilke in Blackwood's Magazine. In this way he was able to explain his ideas and state his views with all the advantages of the advertisement (the word is used without malice) given by the rattling of replies and rejoinders. So the way was prepared for his book. Whether this was to Colonel Maurice's advantage, except as a matter of immediate business convenience, we do, however, vehemently doubt. One has to keep referring almost at every other page to "The Position of European Politics"—and that, to put it frankly, is a bore. If Sir Charles's name were deleted every time it occurs in Colonel Maurice's pages, there would be a distinct shrinkage in their bulk. If all that is mere answer by Blackwood's to the Fortnightly were taken out, these two hundred and forty pages would be reduced to about a half of their number. That half would be much the more valuable of the two, but it runs at present a considerable risk of being buried in a controversy. The public does not mind a straw about these newspaper rows, and wishes "our governor" would tell the Colonel of the Baronet to stop answering. "The taste for eloquence is going out, Mick," as the gentlemen who was Morgan, but had been either Hoolan or Doolan, observed with regret. Who will be bothered with wrangling literary Siamese twins? On the merits of the controversy, either personal or general, we shall say as little as may be. Colonel Maurice is of course to be believed on his word when he denies that he wrote as the mouthpiece of the Adjutant-General, but the case invites the use of the distinguo. No doubt he was not directly prompted, but Lord Wolseley is, as we all know, capo di scuola, and of that school Colonel Maurice is a distinguished pupil. Much is produced in art which the master never sees, but does none the less inspire. Colonel Maurice will probably not deny that his work shows the influence of his studio. We do not think it the less deserving of attention on that account, for his studio happens to be the place in which the government of the British army is at present being carried on, and it is important to know what the views of the chiefs are. Our complaint is not that we get them, but that we are compelled to take so much superfluous and purely temporary matter with them.

Colonel Maurice when he does come to his subject deals with it as a soldier and a man of sense. He declines to look at it merely as a matter of returns and paper lists. Considerations of national character and of the form of country are always present with him. At times he seems to omit elements in the effective fighting strength of foreign Powers which could not be neglected in actual war. He has not a word to say about the Austrian navy when discussing the probabilities of a war in which France should be opposed to Italy. And yet Italy could hardly be attacked by her neighbour except as a party to a coalition; and Lissa shows that the Austrian navy, though a small force, no doubt, cannot be ruled out of the game. Again, he takes no account of the German navy as an adversary to the Russian, and yet it has been on the growing hand this many a day. Over and above these omissions there is a sin of commission in Colonel Maurice's book which is a more serious error. It is his treatment of the question of the reduction in the Artillery. He requests his critics to believe that he has no unworthy interest in arguing, though under certain reserves, in favour of the measure. We take that for granted, and are quite prepared to believe that an officer who is himself a gunner, and has worn "the Jacket," would not support a reduction of the force unless he had what he thought sufficient reasons for doing so. No doubt he is absolutely right in saying that an increase in the Artillery would bring him promotion and the continuance of old associations more valuable than promotion to a cavalier of honour. All that may be granted; but the personal disinterestedness of the disputant does not make his argument logically good. We still think Colonel Maurice's argument bad. Substantially it is this:—We cannot put two army corps into the field without transport and commissariat machinery, hitherto wanting; this can only be got by increased expenditure or by sacrificing something; but we must not look for increased expenditure. Therefore there only remains the resource of sacrifice, and the Horse Artillery having been that part of the army which was cut down the least closely to the quick, it had to suffer. Now allowing every link in this chain of reasoning its full force, what does it all amount to? It is a confession that we must limit our available movable fighting army to two corps, which again means that we must renounce all hope of undertaking offensive operations. Colonel Maurice may believe that this country would allow its only practical army to go abroad while a counter invasion was possible, but we have not the strength to share his faith. Therefore we still think the reduction a most unwise measure; and when we are told of the effect England could produce by threatening an enemy's coast here and there, we remain utterly sceptical as to the possibility of any such aggressive tactics while the country had to remain under the protection of a mob of men with rifles, utterly destitute of transport, commissariat, or field artillery, and very badly supplied with cavalry. Colonel Maurice praises Mr. Smith for honesty and good sense at the War Office, but we wish he could have praised him for courage shown in coming forward to tell the country how it stood and ask for the necessary means to remedy defects.

When the Colonel is not bound to apologize, and has to deal with the armies of the Continent, he takes a much stronger position. His sketch of the Eastern and Western frontiers of Germany, his estimates of the Austrian and, in an even greater degree, of the Russian armies, will be generally recognized as excellent. It is doubtful whether modern long-range weapons, or any other mechanical change, will in the long run diminish the value of solid courage and military devotion—the great merits of the Russian—in warfare, which, if we understand Colonel Maurice aright, he is inclined to believe, but he is on very safe ground when he argues from the difficulty Russia has always found in making any considerable part of her vast army really available for offensive purposes. It was seen in the great Napoleonic wars, in 1828, in the Crimea, and as conspicuously as ever in 1878. There is no reason to believe that the stupidity and corruption which have always counterbalanced the courage and devotion of the Russian soldier will be less helpful to civilized Europe in the future than they have been in the past. In speaking of the Austrian army, that strange force which has been so uniformly good and so constantly beaten, Colonel Maurice forgets neither its excellence nor its weakness. We hope much, and do partly believe that he is right in his opinion that the strength is even greater, and the weakness less than it was of old. The world has every reason to trust it may be so, but as in the case of Russia there is a long experience to inspire doubt. With all its honesty, goodness of intention, and many other merits, the Austrian army has suffered terribly from stupidity. It may be wiser, and yet not wise enough. The most striking part of Colonel Maurice's volume is his estimate of the military position of Germany, and particularly its chances in the event of a war with France and Russia combined. We commend his remarks on the military considerations which make it impossible for Germany to allow the ruin of Austria to those who are inclined to doubt whether the Empire could afford to stand neutral during a series of Russian successes in Galicia. But he has also a good deal to say about the chances of a war between Germany and a Russo-French alliance, which our lively neighbour may profitably reflect on. Colonel Maurice looks more exclusively to the military considerations, but he agrees in the main with an anonymous writer in the Revue des Deux Mondes who lately caused some searching of heart in Paris. This writer reminded his countrymen that alliance with Russia would not necessarily mean that the allies could be on the field at the same time. Colonel Maurice gives good reason for believing that Germany might repeat on a far greater scale the famous campaign of the Consul Nero. With her admirable system of military railways, she might well move a great army from one frontier to another in less than a week. In comparing Germany and France Colonel Maurice comments forcibly on the very different ratios of talk to work in the two countries, and expresses an opinion, pretty widely shared by competent judges, we should imagine, that the late experiment in mobilization was much more showy than instructive. This, unfortunately the smaller, half of his book is so good that we can only heartily regret that Colonel Maurice did not continue in the path of virtue, and write that book on National Defence for which his poor editor has wailed so long, and has now lost by the combined temptations of Sir Charles Dilke's herring, the attractive position of Blackwood, the wrongs of Lord Wolseley, and the merits of Mr. Smith.

"MY darling, I love you; passionately, devotedly, &c. &c. &c." These expressions form the first sentence of Mr. Willson's idyl. They were addressed by a gentleman named Dick to a lady called Mabelle. It is unnecessary, and, for reasons which will presently appear, might be inconvenient, to mention the surnames of any of the people in this story. Mabelle's rejoinder was, "You haven't tempted me in the least to be wicked, Dick, when I really want to be tempted." She said this in an elaborate, but not really material, context. Dick thereupon, presumably by way of tempting her, kissed her ear, but there was no satisfying the unreasonable creature. She said, "Do not spoil my happiness, dear, by improprieties. If you do, I will have to go home immediately. And I want to stay here with you." He then asked her to elope with him, but she pointed out financial difficulties. Her husband (whose name was Billy) was not only her uncle, but also her guardian. "For nearly three years, until I am twenty-one, I will not be able to get a cent from him. You have very little more than your salary." They then discoursed of love, and she propounded a theory that it never lasts more than a month or so; that it may precede, but should not accompany, and, ex hypothesi, cannot long survive, the marriage of its victims, which should be founded on affection and compatibility of temperament. Dick listened somewhat impatiently, and enunciated in his turn another theory, metaphysical in tone, with musical analogies about harmony and discord. She then gave a fresh turn to the conversation by asking him to marry her. He objected that she was already married to her uncle Billy. She admitted that this was so, but explained that, "as a matter of precaution, and thinking it might some day be useful, when I was in Chicago two years ago [it may be mentioned here that her age at the time of the story is eighteen] I obtained a divorce from William, which is perfectly valid in the State of Illinois, but not valid in this State. I am legally and morally free to marry in the State of Illinois, and such a marriage would be both legally and morally binding in every State of the Union." She elucidated her view of morality by ingenuously confessing that this divorce—which eventually turned out to be bad, but that is neither here nor there—was obtained ex parte, and that Billy knew nothing about it, though there had been some danger of his finding it out "last spring, when we visited his aunt's in Chicago. Of course, I would not let him kiss me while in the State of Illinois, and I had to manœuvre to keep from being left alone with him during our stay." This rather puzzled Dick, who somewhat weakly asked whether she "did not dissemble at all." She replied with dignity, if somewhat evasively, that she was "an honest, proper, and law-abiding woman." By way of proving her possession of these noble attributes, she offered to go to Illinois, marry Dick there, be his lawful wife for three months, and then go back to Billy. She added the irresistible allurement that during the three months of being Mrs. Dick in Illinois "I would guard your honour there as carefully as I guard William's here." Then she got off the fence—she had been sitting on a fence, a stone fence, during the whole conversation—and they went home.

"Home" for the time being was the temporary residence of one Nellie. She was "seven-and-twenty, in the perfect fulness of womanhood, tall and fair, with a sweet matronly look upon the high-bred face that the moonlight softens into a beauty of the heart that is almost divine" (whether the heart or the beauty of it was divine, it was a great feat to soften the high-bred face into a beauty of the heart; but then the moonlight was American). She was a mother, and, it may be cautiously inferred, a widow. She was also Dick's aunt, and was in love with him. In order to encourage Dick to return Nellie's affection (except in Illinois?), Mabelle related to them how she herself came to marry her uncle, which she had done when she was twelve years old. Then she went to bed, and in her absence Dick and his aunt Nellie made passionate love to each other, with much hugging and kissing. Nellie at last, with a good deal of difficulty, persuaded Dick that he loved her (Nellie) even more than he did Mabelle. After she had been sitting on his knee and embracing him for a considerable time, she observed, speaking of Mabelle, "'If it will give you pleasure, Dick, kiss her, fondle her to your content. But don't love her,' she whispers, unconscious of what the words betray; 'I could not bear that.'" Why a widowed aunt should have any hesitation about consciously "betraying" to her marriageable nephew the affection to which she has been testifying by making violent love to him throughout a long conversation is not clear; but they arrange these things curiously in America. The result was that, after some more expressions of affection, made with an unreserve in every way worthy of a free people, the lady discovered that "a sweet sense of shame gradually rises—wherefrom or wherefore she cannot tell"; and, after another embrace, in which Dick's "kisses burn and sting," they separated.

The two episodes summarized above are related by Mr. Willson in two chapters, and occupy no more than forty-seven pages. It is a bitter disappointment that practically nothing more is heard of Dick. That trip to Illinois never came off, by reason of the awkward circumstance that Mabelle fell in love with Billy, her husband and uncle. Her next opportunity of conversation with Dick did not occur for some months. When it did there was no love-making, and she coldly advised him to marry his aunt. He took her advice, and there is an end of him. The rest of the story consists of the conquest of Mabelle's heart already mentioned. It came about through her uncle Billy having, as he and Mabelle and all their friends supposed, another wife as well as Mabelle. Her name was Jane. Billy married her when he was at college, and then she ran away. So, after a reasonable time, he married his niece Mabelle for her money. The marriage was valid, because the interval had been reasonable. Just about the time when Mabelle arranged with Dick the temporary Illinois marriage, which did not come off, Jane turned up, and claimed from Billy the restitution of conjugal rights. There appeared to be no doubt that the two ladies were equally Billy's wives. So he introduced them to one another, and made Jane a handsome allowance out of Mabelle's fortune. There was nothing out of the way in this, because "thousands" of men in New York have several wives apiece, owing to the laws of that remarkable country. The principal result was that Mabelle fell in love with Billy, as already mentioned. However, it turned out at last, after manifold and very dull complications, that Jane had married somebody else after her separation from Billy (which somebody else had in his turn married another female somebody, and got four and a half years for doing it), and had at some period or other got a divorce from Billy, which divorce accidentally happened to be valid, so that Billy was free from Jane, and Mabelle was his only genuine wife, and also that the Illinois divorce had been granted by a court not having jurisdiction in such matters, so that Billy was Mabelle's husband as much in Illinois as anywhere else, which pleased her just as well, because she had changed her mind about Billy and Dick (varium et mutabile semper Femina Americana in a quite special sense); and Jane found a third husband quite after her liking; so everybody was satisfied. The justification of this surprising romance, in its author's eyes, is that everything everybody did or thought of doing was or would have been, in his opinion (which is obviously incorrect as regards the proposed Illinois marriage), quite justifiable according to American law, excepting only the behaviour of the wicked bigamist who got four years and a half. Each chapter ends with the words It is the Law. The moral views of the heroine have already been to some extent indicated. It may not be inappropriate to throw some more light on them. Here is her view of persons born in the country. "I loathe the 'honest countryman,' and shiver when I meet one on the road. Billy says, and I believe him, that there never yet was one who was not a thief at heart, a brute by choice; that honest men and decent men are made by the training of cities and towns; and there's truth in his argument." When she and Billy had made up their differences, he said his only regret was that he could not "thank some supernatural being for this blessing. I do not wonder at the tenacity with which the ignorant and vicious cling to the idea of a personal God, to whom they can give thanks for the happiness they do not make for themselves, and do not deserve." But his chaste and beauteous spouse (and niece) bade him "Leave such thoughts where they belong—to the criminal classes and lunatics —and thank yourself, and only yourself." For "a personal God is contrary to reason and revelation." So she lay in his arms, observing, "I am your wife, at last; your one, true, lawful wife, except in Illinois." Though, in fact, as we have seen, not even that refuge was left to him.

TOO often it is with regret, or with a grudged esteem, that we hail newly-discovered works by standard authors. The best writing generally takes care of itself, and is remembered and preserved, whatever may be lost. The first sprightly running is commonly the best, and editors scarcely earn our thanks by troubling the lees for us. For once we have an exception before us. The pamphlet of newly-discovered poems by Crashaw which Dr. Grosart has forwarded to his subscribers contains some things which, even in the congested condition of our national literature, are never likely to be obscured again. The British Museum lately bought from a bookseller, who had picked it up as an odd lot at Sotheby's or Puttick & Simpson's, a MS. volume of Crashaw's poems, indubitably, as would appear, in his own, previously untraced, handwriting. Dr. Grosart gives us an example of the latter in facsimile, selecting the page which contains the well-known epigram on "The Water being made Wine."

We turn at once to the poems which are entirely new. Here is one apparently intended to form the dedication to a gift-volume of the poet's Steps to the Temple. It appears just too late to adorn Mr. Lang's selected Ballads of Books:—

Fair one, these tender leaves do trembling stand,
Knowing 'tis in the doom of your sweet eye
Whether the Muse they clothe shall live or die;
Live she or die to Fame, each leaf you meet
Is her life's wing, or else her winding-sheet.

We could swear this was Crashaw, if we picked it up anonymous on Pitcairn's Island. Moreover, something very like the second couplet is to be found already in "Love's Horoscope":—

'Tis in the mercy of her eye
If poor Love shall live or die.

It is very pretty. But this, a nameless lyric, is more than pretty; it is exquisite, and in Crashaw's most transcendental manner:—

Though now 'tis neither May nor June,
And nightingales are out of tune,
Yet in these leaves, fair One, there lies (Sworn servant to your sweetest eyes),
A nightingale, who, may she spread
In your white bosom her chaste bed,
Spite of all the maiden snow
Those pure untrodden paths can show,
You strait shall see her wake and rise,
Taking fresh life from your fair eyes,
And with claspt wings proclaim a spring,
Where Love and she shall sit and sing;
For lodged so near your sweetest throat
What nightingale can lose her note?
Nor let her kindred birds complain
Because she breaks the year's old reign;
For let them know she's none of those Hedge-quiristers whose music owes Only such strains as serve to keep Sad shades, and sing dull night asleep.
No, she's a priestess of that grove,
The holy chapel of chaste love,
Your virgin bosom. Then whate'er
Poor laws divide the public year,
Whose revolutions wait upon
The wild turns of the wanton sun,
Be you the Lady of Love's year,
Where your eyes shine his suns appear,
There all the year is Love's long Spring,
There all the year
Love's nightingales shall sit and sing.

The break in the penultimate verse is a charming addition to the melody, and we are very much mistaken if this lyric does not take its place among the best of Charles I.'s reign.

The remainder of the new poems are religious, and they are not in Crashaw's very finest manner. "To Pontius, Washing his Blood-stained Hands," which we have a vague impression we have already met with somewhere, is a typical example of the monstrous chains of conceits which these most unequal poets were at any moment liable to produce. The face of Pilate was originally a nymph—

The daughter of a fair and well-famed fountain
As ever silver-tipped the side of shady mountain

(in itself a charming image); this nymph has suffered the fate of Philomela from this new Tereus, the hand of Pilate, and "appears Nothing but tears." A paraphrase of Grotius gives us a first version of the well-known verse on the Eucharist:—

The water blushed and started into wine.

We trace the great Crashaw of the fiery surprises but seldom in this long, tame, and somewhat crabbed poem; but he asserts himself in a few such phrases as this:—

Before the infant shrine
Of my weak feet, the Persian Magi lay,

and this, which well describes the condition of Crashaw's muse:—

A sweet inebriated ecstacy.

The new readings of old poems which the MS. gives are neither, it would seem, very numerous nor very important. "The Weeper" is such a distressing, indeed such a humiliating, poem that we receive a new stanza of it with indifference; we may note one novelty, this string of preposterous conceits on the tears of the Magdalen must in future close with a conceit that swallows up all the rest:—

Of such fair floods as this Heaven the crystal ocean is.

Dr. Grosart takes this opportunity of recording an interesting little discovery. Crashaw's important Latin poem "Bulla" is found to have made its first appearance in a very rare Cambridge volume, the Crepundia Siliana of Heynsius, in 1646, two years after the poet's ejection from his fellowship. It appeared the same year in the Delights of the Muses, with a considerable number of variations of the text. It is a pity that Crashaw did not write "Bulla" in English, for it is full of the characteristics of his style.

CLASSICAL SCHOOL BOOKS.*

TO read Pro Cluentio is a big undertaking, to edit it is an enormous one, and it is not an easy one to pass judgment on any important edition of the most intricate, the most interesting, and in some respects the greatest, of Cicero's forensic speeches. In bulk it does not exceed twenty-five columns of the Saturday Review, but nearly every sentence of it justifies, if it does not demand, the commentator's interference. Beyond those refinements of language which are lost without a cultivated appreciation of Ciceronian Latinity—the rarest of scholarly powers—there lie the innumerable difficulties which can only be solved by a complete understanding of Roman law and usage; the tangled web of inconsistent and controversial statements of fact which Cicero's pleading was not intended to altogether unravel; and, finally, the provoking uncertainty of the text, displayed at some of the most inconvenient places and defying the most sanguine hopes of emendation. Since the late Professor Ramsay published his first edition, much in Germany and something in England has been done for the text. Mr. Fausset now comes forward, not so much to make new contributions as to sum up the achievements of his predecessors, and in this object he may be said to have won an honourable success. The too conservative text of Ramsay has practically been replaced by Classen's, but at all the most important points of variation Mr. Fausset's critical notes supply the reader with sufficient evidence for giving an independent judgment. He will not be acquitted in some minds from the charge of unduly depreciating the authority of the Vulgate, and of attaching more than their proper weight to subjective considerations and to such elements of corroboration as may be furnished by observations of Ciceronian usage, quotations of parallel passages, and theories of rhetorical propriety. It is not an unfavourable, perhaps it may be regarded as a favourable, illustration of this tendency which is given by Mr. Fausset's treatment of the last section of the speech, where he replaces the carum of all the MSS., adopted by Classen and Ramsay, with the carissimum of Lambinus, accepted by Bait., Kays., Kl., and Müll. It is true that carum was co-ordinated with three other superlatives, but the inconcinnitas of the MSS. reading, if it exists at all, does not seem to be intolerable. We do not wish to convey the impression that Mr. Fausset is faulty in judgment; he appears to have a genuine power of discrimination and some independence of mind. At § 127 he adopts Madvig's reading and supports it with a careful train of reasoning, finally rejecting the proposal of Mr. Davies to convert comperisse into comparasse; at § 66 he writes donis datis muneribusque, rejecting Classen's theory that datis was mistaken by the scribe for a substantive and glossed with donis, declaring that "there are limits to the stupidity of scribes," and suggesting that a scribe not familiar with the phrase dona et munera made the correction datis muneribus; at § 39 he writes in quo alligatum, rejecting "the undoubtedly false inter allegatos," supported by Ramsay as well as the inter alligatos of Turnebus, here agreeing with Classen. In the Introduction, which deals mainly with the facts of "the case against Cluentius," Mr. Fausset has given a methodical statement of all the ascertained points and a careful discussion of those which remain matters of doubt, as, for instance, the bearing of the sixth chapter of the "lex Cornelia de sicariis et veneficis" on the legal accountability of Cluentius, a question which gave Cicero the opportunity of putting in a technical defence, while he professed, in deference to his client's wishes, to rely simply on the merits of the case. Mr. Fausset's Introduction cannot be called luminous. It has to be studied, but it rewards study. He gives a useful discussion of "the occasional colloquialisms" in Cicero's oratorical style; but, if space allowed, we should be glad to join issue with him as to some of the usages which he has classified as "colloquial." He has put together a good "glossary of selected words" (with derivations more or less hypothetical) like calumnia, condicio, interpres and sequester (the two aspects of a Roman Man-in-the-Moon), prævaricari, and religio. The "Explanatory Notes" are numerous but not redundant, full but not verbose. We do not pretend to have examined them except by taking a considerable number of samples, but we have not detected any serious misstatement, omission, or inaccuracy. But we wish to express an emphatic protest against the double fallacy implied in his statement that at the period of this speech "the virtue of old Italy was as obsolete as that of old Rome." It is nonsense which ought to be reserved for unfledged politicians to talk about the personal genius of the Cæsars "propping up for a few centuries longer" (as if that were quite a short time) the "tottering fabric of the Empire."

The American editions of Thucydides—Book I. by the late Professor C. D. Morris, and Book VII. by Professor Smith—are printed in beautiful type. Both are strictly based upon Classen's edition, but Professor Morris (we are told by the editor of the Series) "followed in the footsteps of no man slavishly," and at i. 21, he corrects Classen:—'Ἐκ δὲ τῶν κ.τ.λ. . . . τοιαῦτα ἄν τις νομίζων μάλιστα ἃ διῆλθον οὐχ ἁμαρτάνοι καὶ οὔτε ὡς ποιηταὶ ὑμνήκασι κ.τ.λ. . . . οὔτε ὡς λογογράφοι ξυνέθεσαν κ.τ.λ. . . . ηὑρῆσθαι δὲ ἡγησάμενος κ.τ.λ. Classen regarded these participles as "cond. prot. to ἁμαρτάνοι ἄν," but had not observed (we are informed) that the negative is οὔτε—οὔτε instead of μήτε—μήτε, whereas "the last two express the cause of the writer's conviction of the soundness of the result." On the other hand, Professor Morris has not observed the particle καί connecting the latter participles with the former. He is apt to fall into the scholarly fault of over-refinement, as at i. 17 in distinguishing περιορᾶν (of inactive perception) from περιιδεῖν (of non-perception) and at i. 86, τοὺς μὲν λόγους τοὺς πολλοὺς τῶν 'Αθηναίων οὐ γιγνώσκω, where he says that "the position of τοὺς πολλοὺς indicates the speaker's sense of weariness"; and at i. 122 he sees a very subtle, but nearly pointless, irony in what is more usually and more sensibly regarded as a serious assertion. His notes are clearly written, but unduly extended, and the translations are magnificently verbose. Favourable specimens of the generally sound commentary are found at i. 61, on πέμπτον αὐτὸν, where Gilbert's view is quoted (that the general named may be supposed to have had supremacy over his colleagues); and at i. 126, on ἐπῆλθον 'Ολύμπια; as well as at the many places where involved constructions have been carefully and (so far as possible) lucidly analysed. It is not clear what principle Professor Morris has followed in dividing his foot-notes from what he calls "critical notes," relegated to the second part of the appendix. If they related merely to textual criticism it would be an intelligible, but in the case of Thucydides a highly inconvenient, plan; but they deal with all kinds of subjects, including "the chronology of the "pentecontaetia," and, in fact, they are the best, most important, and most original, part of Professor Morris's work, being neatly worded and fairly argued discussions of the most difficult passages in the First Book. They can be recommended without any reserve. Not so the first part of the Appendix, which professes to give a list of the codices and editions of Thucydides. Not so the Introduction, though (like the text) it is "based upon Classen." It does not appear whether this wordy essay is to be attributed to the late Professor Morris or to the general editor, Professor Williams White. The most valuable part of it is a statement of Classen's views upon "Ullrich's theory of the composition of the History of Thucydides." The literary criticism of this Introduction may be judged from a few extracts:—"The fundamental character of the language of Thucydides [in the speeches] is the greatest simplicity and naturalness"; "the view of the world" which is to be assigned to Thucydides is "a pious feeling of dependence on the divine power," coupled with "a belief which rises above the forms of special worship"; and the "moral confusion," which prevailed at Corcyra after the political convulsions, Thucydides is perverted into attributing to an intellectual inability to distinguish between right and wrong. The chief merit of Professor Morris's edition of Book I. appears to be careful scholarship combined with clearness of expression and candour in argument. On chronology he is painfully exact, but does not appear to have a very firm hold of Athenian law, if we may judge from his note at i. 77 on ξυμβολαίαις πρὸς τοὺς ξυμμάχους δίκαις (of inter-federal jurisdiction), which he identifies with δίκαι ἀπὸ ξυμβόλων as being ex contractu, as distinguished from βλάβης δίκαι, actions ex delicto.

It is creditable to the editor of the series that the above book is closely resembled, in its main features, by Professor Smith's edition of the Seventh Book. Here, again, the best notes are in the Appendix. Professor Smith is very full in his citation of other commentators; thus at vii. 28, on a passage of recognized difficulty, he quotes Classen (with proper acknowledgment) for nearly a page and a half. At vii. 13, ἐπ' αὐτομολίας προφάσει, after fully summarizing Classen, Goeller, Groto and Stahl, he modestly confines to a couple of lines his own summing up, in which he declares that Classen's view is the best that has been offered, although it does not fully clear up the difficulty, "Classen seems to mean that the opportunity was the occasion (cause) for desertion." Professor Smith's edition is rendered more valuable than it otherwise would have been by his having made use of Holm, who has a good knowledge of the country in the neighbourhood of Syracuse.

Mr. Shuckburgh's edition of Herodotus (ix. 1-89) has only two serious faults. The first is that it is written in the horrid jargon which abounds with monstrosities of speech like "metopes," "Oresteium," "Perioeki," and finally reduces itself to absurdity in "the Lakedæmonians." The second is that, by separating the commentary proper from the matter of the "historical and geographical index," he has been sometimes obliged to choose between saying the same thing twice over and leaving each of his two statements incomplete. The chapters which he has edited deal with the Persian invasion of Greece, "from the spring of B.C. 489 to the final repulse at Platæa," and make an "episode sufficiently complete in itself" to form the subject of a separate book. Mr. Shuckburgh is at his best in dealing with matters of tactics and strategy—as e.g. on the exact position of the Persian army (c. xv.), and on the ancient developments of military signalling, from the rude Homeric beacon to the elaborate alphabet which was perfected by Polybius. On the familiar difficulty of the words in c. xxxiii.—παρὰ ἓν πάλαισμα ἔδραμε νικᾶν ὀλυμπιάδα—Mr. Shuckburgh writes quite a little treatise. He does not accept Abicht's view that the pentathlic winner was obliged to be first in all five events, and in favour of his own theory (that the winner of three out of five was entitled to the prize) he quotes the circumstantial statement of Pausanias that Tisamenos "won in racing and leaping against Hieronymus of Andros, but was beaten by him in the wrestling, and so lost the victory."

Like all the rest of Mr. A. Sidgwick's work, his edition of the Bucolics is neat and scholarly. Not being intended for advanced students, the notes on doubtful and disputed passages are concise and sometimes dogmatic. At iv. 46, Talia sæcla suis dixerunt currite fusis, he follows sufficiently high authority in comparing phrases like currere æquor and disposes of Conington's less attractive view (which regards the talia as parallel with the vocative use of οὗτος, as in O. C. 1627), by declaring the usage to be harsh, and by objecting to the vocative with fusis. Similarly at v. 66 he translates "two aræ as altaria," remarking that "the ara was for libations and ordinary offerings, altare for victims," as if this distinction supported his appositive interpretation. He does not compare the parallel passage from the Pharsalia, iii. 404, Structæ diris altaribus aræ, and appears to believe that he has quite settled the question. At vi. 35, Tum durare solum, &c., he supplies a nominative, orbis, from the line above, and translates "the world hardens its soil." At iii. 102 he explains neque as "used by a strange license" for ne—quidem (His certe neque amor causa est); but at ix. 6 (quod nec vertat bene) he favours the view of nec being an archaism for the simple negative. On iv. 18, "production" has been written in place of "produce" or "productiveness." But the faults are few in this book and the merits considerable. It is quite the best of Mr. Sidgwick's tasteful little pot-boilers, and deserves praise enough to justify a protest against the affectation of writing about "Vergil." Vergilius, if that gives any satisfaction to Mr. Sidgwick; but the English word is Virgil.

Of Mr. C. S. Jerram's edition of the Bucolics we have only received Part I., the Introduction and Text; the Second Part, containing the Notes, has not reached us. The introduction is sound and readable; the text is good and clearly printed, and there is a fairly complete list of "the more important various readings and emendations."

Mr. Sloman has produced a serviceable and sensible edition of the Phormio (the play which was acted at Westminster last year), and he has profited by his "unique opportunities" of studying the play in its practical aspects to intersperse the Latin text with minute English stage-directions. Some of them are superfluous, a few are questionable, and all of them are verbose. But, taken in the lump, they add great value to this edition, helping to unravel the intricacy of the plot, and imparting life and reality to the study of a dead language. Expurgation is effected by "the substitution of similars." Our old friend leno figures as homo impurissimus; and amica is "made an honest woman of," as is shown in the very pointed question addressed by Nausistrata to her over-married husband:—

Adeon indignum hoc tibi videtur, filius
Homo adulescens si habet unam amicam, tu uxores duas?

Mr. Sloman changes the latter words into unam uxorem, tu senex duas. But he becomes positively facetious in his emendation of Geta's account of "the love-sick youth":—

obsecrat
Sibi ut ejus faciat copiam;

which is turned into

Sibi ut eam liceat visere.

In spite of his "unique opportunities," Mr. Sloman has failed to grasp the subtleties of Terentian characterization. Speaking of Phormio, he says that "he may be a rogue, but he is no hypocrite like Chremes," who has been practising for sixteen years "a criminal deception" on his wife, but yet shows "no contrition for his abominable conduct." The notes do not shirk any of the important difficulties. They are not particularly full of information or suggestion; but they have been carefully written and compressed, so as to be readable to the ordinary student of Terence and sufficient for his purposes.

Messrs. Bond and Walpole's partnership business appears to be a going concern. Stories from Ovid's Metamorphoses is made up of about five hundred lines from the lighter tales which are scattered about the fifteen Books; the little vulgar boy (for instance) who incurred the wrath of Ceres by "spoiling her drink," Philemon and Baucis entertaining gods unawares, and the gorgeous Midas punished for bad taste in music. The editors' notes are humble in their aims, but sufficient for beginners in Latin. Generally they are not misleading and antiquated like this account of induitur aures:—"Poets use an accusative with induor of that with which one is covered." Midas was not covered with ears; the usage is not confined to induor, or even to words of cognate meaning; it is not peculiar to poets; and the suggested explanation is at once insufficient in itself and wrong as far as it goes.

Mr. Herbert Wilkinson stands on firmer ground in the Exercises which he has constructed on the Latin text of his Easy Selections from Ovid in Elegiac Verse. This is a companion book to Messrs. Bond and Walpole's, but it is much better than theirs; Mr. Wilkinson's short notes are unexceptionable in their clearness and correctness. The vocabulary system adopted in this series (Macmillan's "Elementary Classics") is detestable in its principle and pernicious in its effects. Most of the passages selected by Mr. Wilkinson are short enough for single lessons—a point of very great importance. It is noticeable that "the Life of Ovid" as summarized by Mr. Wilkinson differs from Messrs. Bond and Walpole's account of him. He was banished at the age of 51 (H. W.), at the age of 50 (B. & W.); died in A.D. 18 (H. W.), in A.D. 17 (B. & W.); at the age of sixty (H. W.), in his sixtieth year (B. & W.) In the Encyclopædia Britannica Professor Sellar agrees with neither of our present authorities; he says that Ovid was born in B.C. 43 and died in A.D. 17, at the age of sixty-one. The views of Jones minimus will probably resemble those of Lord Melbourne presiding at a Cabinet Council:—"I don't care what story we tell, gentlemen, but we may as well all tell the same one."

Dr. White has edited the Ninth Æneid because he believes that there is a dearth of cheap classical school books. That is a delusion which might easily have been dispelled. Dr. White divides his book into two parts, Text and Vocabulary; and in the vocabulary each noun or verb (in its "nom. sing." or "pres. ind. act. 1st p.") is explained as it is used in the text; anything which need be known about it for the present purpose is sure to be there; sometimes a little too much, as in the case of Sāturnia Juno. The objection to Dr. White's system is that the same grammatical remarks must be many times repeated under different heads; but we are not sure that it would not possess some countervailing advantages for a young man who wanted to get hold of a little Latin but had not the time or means to be properly taught. The book ought not to be admitted into any "grammar school," but it may be recommended to commercially educated members of Parliament who wish to obtain just enough Latin to make a misquotation in the House.

Mr. Mansfield's First Exercises in Latin Prose differs from most other primers in the Rules being put at the end of the book and the Exercises at the beginning; and the Latin words for each Exercise, instead of being conveniently placed at the head or foot, are stowed away in separate vocabularies appended to the rules. Mr. Mansfield declares that "a rote knowledge of all syntax rules is now happily discredited." If that is so, we are sorry for it. We do not see that Mr. Mansfield's explanations (which are well enough in their way) will serve to replace this antiquated exactitude; nor do we understand how the rules of syntax can be learnt properly without in the process being learnt by heart.

Mr. Stedman's Greek Examination Papers in Miscellaneous Grammar and Idioms is a useful book for teachers who cannot draw up a list of questions for themselves. Some of them are easy, others catchy, and a few are "twisters." Special attention is paid to technical and quasi-technical terms, as well as to the derivation of English from Greek words.

Having reached a seventh edition, Mr. Gepp's Exercises in Latin Elegiac Verse carries its own testimonial of practical merit. Many verse-books have failed because the makers have not understood what passages are easy and what are difficult to young boys; but Mr. Gepp's arrangement is really progressive. The plan is to expound the meaning of the English poetical lines in very bald prose; and, on the whole, it is a better plan than any other which dispenses with oral teaching, though it has obvious defects and dangers. Mr. Gepp is, in our opinion, inclined to be unduly expansive in his renderings, as in the case of "Ride a Cock-horse To Banbury Cross," which is rendered, "Go—my (noster) knees shall serve instead (vicem præstare) of a back (caballus) for thee, to where a marble statue (marmor or statua) adorns the Banbury (Banburiensis) market-place." Plenty of "aids to versification" are given, including lists of the names of birds, flowers, and young ladies.

LECTURES ON ELECTRICITY.*

THE author, in his preface, informs us that the first five of these lectures were delivered before the Society of Arts in the year 1886, and that shorthand notes were taken at the time, from which the present printed lectures were taken with some alteration. This work bears abundant evidence of its origin; it has all the conciseness, all the fire, and all the perspicacity to be expected of an "extemporaneous" lecture delivered by a practised teacher full of his subject, though perhaps it is disfigured here and there by the over-condensation forced on the lecturer by the limitation of time. We may at once express our regret that so practised a writer as Professor Forbes should not have removed even this slight blemish from his work before publication, and we make this observation thus early because the remarkable and unusual good qualities of this short series of lectures make even the smallest fault shine out with great clearness.

Again, in the preface we are told that these "lectures were primarily intended for an intelligent audience, ignorant of electrical science, but anxious to obtain sufficient knowledge of the subject to be able to follow the progress now being made in the science." We can at once say that these lectures ought most thoroughly to fulfil their purpose. Not only are the leading principles of electrical science accurately and clearly laid down, but this has been done without using any of the old misleading leading-strings of "electric fluid," "electricity," or "positive and negative electricity." To give one example amongst many:—quite early in the first lecture, after showing the effect of rubbing glass with silk and the behaviour of a pith ball between the two, the author goes on to say:—

> We now find that, after the light ball has touched the rubbed silk or glass, the electrified space moves it also in opposite directions. In each case the ball is said to be electrified by contact; but there is something different in the two means of electrifying the ball. We must denote this by some language, so we say that the ball is positively electrified if it moves towards the silk, and negatively if it moves towards the glass.

And, further on:—

> These actions of the space on an electrified ball and on rubbed glass and silk are the same as if two positively electrified bodies repel each other, and as if two negatively electrified bodies repel each other, and as if a positively electrified body attracts a negatively electrified body. Hence a rule is often given, which saves time in stating the facts—namely, that "Like electricities repel, unlike electricities attract." This is a most unscientific way of speaking, because there are no such things as electricities. Electricity is merely the science of electrical phenomena. Nor is it even true that the electrified bodies attract and repel each other. It is the electrified space which acts on the electrified bodies, and makes them act as if they attract and repel each other. All this must be remembered if the above rule is quoted.

Again, further on:—

> The most extensive experiments have all gone to prove that we cannot electrify one body positively without at the same time electrifying another negatively to an equal extent. In fact, the only effects which we have observed or can discover are those produced in and by the electrified space lying between those bodies which we say are positively and negatively electrified.

Now here we have a teacher for the first time in our experience taking the trouble to give his hearers the pure doctrine of Faraday and Clerk Maxwell at the very beginning of the subject, instead of either giving bald facts or trying to string the facts together by easily remembered but misleading analogies. Professor Forbes all through his discussion of what used to be called "static electricity" makes use of the simple, clear, and scientific term "electrical condition," or sometimes "electrification"; and speaks of the motion of electrical condition and the attractions and repulsions of electrical conditions in discussing induction and such phenomena, instead of the motion or repulsion of "electricity." This leads to the following short, but excellent, exposition of that most difficult mental conception—electromotive force. The author says:—

> I am now going to describe a kind of force which does not rightly have that title in the Newtonian sense of the word. It is usually called electromotive force, implying that it is a force which moves electricity and not matter, and, since electricity is not a material substance, this is not strictly a force. Newton called force that which causes or tends to cause motion in a body. While we have been watching the electric forces we have seen motions given to a piece of matter. When the force of gravity is acting on a falling body it is producing motion; when it is acting on a weight on a table it is tending to produce motion, but it only exerts pressure on the table owing to the resistance offered by the table. In all cases of force-action, as Newton intended the word force to be used, there is motion produced, or a tendency to produce motion, in a piece of matter. Electromotive force moves, or tends to move, a positive electrification in one direction and a negative electrification in the opposite direction in a conductor.

This leads on to an excellent exposition of the phenomena of induction, and here occurs one of the curious gaps which might well have been filled up before the work was published. Although throughout the work Professor Forbes is continually quoting and praising Faraday, and although he is full of the possible practical future of "Influence" machines, he omits all reference to Faraday's classical "Ice-pail" experiment, which is the foundation upon which all influence machines are built. However, the subject is steadily worked out, clearly and in a true scientific spirit, up to the point where the author, before passing on to magnetism and electromagnetism, is able to sum up in these words:—

> We have learned something when we have been led by experiment to accept the fact that, whether the electrification is in a stable condition or whether the electrical strain is being continuously relieved by conduction, we have in all cases a manifestation of one single agency acting in obedience to a limited number of very definite laws. The electromotive force established in the space between a piece of glass and silk that have been rubbed together is of the same character as that established between the terminals of a galvanic cell. The discharge of the Wimhurst machine is identical in character with the current from a battery.

The chapter on Magnetism is extremely good, and the opinions set forth are, no doubt, those with which the majority of men of science would agree, mixed and obscure as this branch of the subject is up to the present time. Throughout the author keeps faithful to Faraday and to æther, and is very happy in his exposition of the modern convention of magnetic resistance. Although there is one very striking experiment of Professor Hughes's described, it is rather curious to find no further reference to his experimental results or to the deductions which he draws from them. Many of these experiments would have illustrated with great emphasis the points on which the author is dwelling, and we can only ascribe their omission to the pressure of time which we referred to at the beginning of this review.

One of the most interesting chapters is that on Electromagnetism, which is not only as lucid and as logical as the others, but in which Professor Forbes always keeps before the mind how all that we know of the mutual influences of currents and magnets might have been deduced by simple reasoning from Œrsted's original discovery of the deflection and direction of deflection of a magnetic needle by a wire conveying a current. A minor but very great merit in this chapter is that the corkscrew memoria technica for the action of currents and magnets is given, which, in our opinion, is the only one which is of any use, as the memoria technica of a man swimming in the current gets hopelessly mixed in the mind of a student who has consulted several text-books, as sometimes he is told to imagine the current entering at his head, at other times to imagine he is swimming with the current, and each of these forms is varied by one author suggesting that the bewildered student should be on his back, whilst another authority will direct him to place himself on his face. Professor Forbes apparently agrees with us, for he recommends the corkscrew rule as superior to the others, "if you happen to know which way a corkscrew turns." This reservation appears very alarming to us. Can it be that amongst an audience at the lecture theatre of the Society of Arts there can be even a large minority in so dreadful a state of modern advancement as not to be familiar with the manipulation of this help to man? We hasten to return to the book before us, and, to conclude, we can only say that we wish Professor Forbes had had the time or inclination to expand this series of lectures into an elementary text-book, so that students might be able to learn the rudiments of the science without picking up a mass of hypotheses and analogies which they find so difficult to discard when the higher branches of the subject have to be attacked. As the book stands, we can heartily recommend it to all who wish to get a working outline of the main electrical phenomena, and some idea of the way in which scientific men regard them, and the attitude of mind which is leading to more and more light being thrown on their origin and intimate nature.

FISHER'S FOREST OF ESSEX.*

THE Forest of Essex, of which the remnant is better known to the present generation by the name of Epping, is a very proper subject for a monograph; and Mr. Fisher, to whose patient and acute research it was largely due that the battle of Epping Forest was fought and won before the late Master of the Rolls, was of all men the best entitled to make that monograph a labour of love. He can afford to treat with indifference any suggestion that either the labour of the author, or the luxury with which his goodly quarto has been produced, is out of proportion to the general interest of the matter. A monograph must be on a scale that would not be justified in a general history or treatise, for otherwise it would not be a monograph. In this case, however, the local and specially antiquarian interest is subordinate.

Epping Forest is an example of typical importance, whether we regard it as students of law, or of the history of social customs, or of the legal and conservative, one might almost say the ultra-legal and ultra-conservative, means by which popular reforms can be and have been effected in this country. To make the ancient forest law, which was odious to the chronicler of the eleventh century, the instrument of preserving trees and turf, in the interest of the people at large, from the advance of bricks and mortar in the nineteenth, was an eminently English and eminently lawyerlike achievement. We could easily have forgiven Mr. Fisher for having, or for showing, more pride in his share of it than he allows to appear. But his modesty in this regard is itself part of a professional tradition, and the tradition is a wholesome one.

Epping is, as we said, a typical forest. Some day the history of Dartmoor will have to be written; and Dartmoor, being legally complicated by its peculiar relations to the Duchy of Cornwall, presents a great many features which a lawyer is at first sight inclined to give up as inexplicable. That historian, whoever he may be, will be glad to make sure, through Mr. Fisher's book, of certain points of contact with the general type. For example, the Forest of Dartmoor (as every one calls it, though in strict propriety of legal phrase it is a chase) is surrounded by a belt of lands known as the "commons of Devon," mostly not separated by any physical boundaries from the Forest. These are the waste of divers manors held by notable persons of the county, the Duke of Bedford and others, and besides the ordinary incidents of manorial rights and customs, they are subject to peculiar rights exercised by the Duchy in respect of the Forest. The materials for investigating the origin of those rights are as yet only in part accessible, but what now concerns us is that the "commons of Devon" have a parallel to some extent in the "purlieus" of the Forest of Essex. The legal theory of the purlieus is that they are lands disafforested by virtue of the Carta Forestæ, but nevertheless remaining subject to forest regulations for certain purposes. We find here a right of "drift" claimed and exercised by the Crown, similar in all essentials to the rights which are still quite practically exercised on behalf of the Duchy of Cornwall on Dartmoor. Both the extent of the purlieus in space and the application of the rules as to persons appear to have been ill defined in the Forest of Essex. When we consider that the forest law was never regarded as a branch of the common law, but was a system standing apart no less than the law of the Admiralty or of the Court Christian, we may perhaps be inclined to think that our knowledge of its substance and its working is on the whole not less but more definite than might have been expected.

Incidentally, however, we get some light on matters which seem to belong to an earlier and more general history. Mr. Fisher points out that the rights of lopping and taking wood which were maintained in Loughton down to a quite recent time (they have been extinguished by compensation under the Epping Forest Act) can hardly be referred to the forest law. His references to the Codex Diplomaticus (p. 245 of the book) will be found profitable, especially by such readers as may have been tempted to accept Mr. Seebohm's ingenious but untenable rehabilitation of the Blackstonian theory of rights of common. Rights which in the early part of the ninth century were described in carefully-framed documents as common and ancient cannot have begun within the preceding century or two in the way of allowances from lords to their dependents. In this and other ways Mr. Fisher's book is one which the student of mediæval tenures, whether he be specially interested in forests or not, cannot afford to neglect.

It is sometimes supposed that commons are in danger of encroachment only, or mainly, at the hands of lords of manors and other considerable landowners. We have no desire whatever to extenuate the attempts of this kind made by people who ought to have known better, and set a better example; attempts, we say, remembering that in the last twenty years many such proceedings have been happily frustrated, and that the establishment of local associations, acting at need in concert with the Commons Preservation Society, is every day making them less likely to succeed. Epping Forest itself is the great example. But commoners have also been deprived of much of their rights by the encroachments of small squatters, individually, it may be, trifling, but collectively serious. Mr. Fisher shows that in the last century a good deal of this went on, apparently with the consent of the lords as often as not. Quite lately the same thing has given trouble in at least one quarter of Dartmoor. There is often a spurious popular sentiment in these cases in favour of not disturbing the poor man's industry—an industry exercised at the expense of other people's property, without even the excuse so dear to false sentiment of those people being rich. And this makes it difficult, sometimes impossible, to deal effectively with the class of encroachments in question. In the case we have in mind the officers of the Duchy were fain to compound with the squatters and release the Duchy rights. Whether they also purported to release the rights of the commoners we know not, and as to the Duchy having any power to do so we offer no opinion.

Mr. Fisher will hardly profess that his book is likely to be found amusing by the general reader; but it has many points of interest to scholars besides those we have mentioned, and it is excellently equipped as a book of reference. Moreover, it is adorned with facsimiles of a thirteenth-century charter and of the Forest cattle-marks, and with a series of maps showing the extent of the Forest and its relation to the manors included in or adjacent to it at various times.

BOOKS ON DIVINITY.*

We are glad to welcome the third and concluding volume of Dr. Ebrard's Christian Apologetics, which will take a high place in the department of theological literature to which it belongs. The greater part of the present volume is a continuation of the "ethnographical and historical sketch" commenced in Vol. II., and takes us in order through the various races of Asia and Polynesia, the savage races of Africa, and the peoples and hordes of America, with the view of showing that here also, as in the cases previously examined, the heathen world betrays a decided tendency, not to rise, but to sink from an earlier and relatively purer knowledge of God. On the other hand, we find everywhere fresh confirmation of the unity of the human race and of the primitive tradition it had inherited, and are thus led to recognize "the scientifically certain fact that the population of all parts of the earth has gone forth from the West of Inner Asia, the Euphrates region," and has carried with it in its dispersion over the world, in however crude or confused a shape, the remembrance of a primitive monotheism, of the sin of our first parents and its deadly consequences, of the rebellion of the old giants, the flood, and the confusion of tongues. In the later part of the volume Dr. Ebrard traces briefly "the redemptive acts of God" through the Old Testament dispensation down to the Incarnation and Sacrifice of Christ.

We learn from Dr. Flint's preface that Pünjer died of consumption in 1885 at the age of thirty-four. His History of the Christian Philosophy of Religion appeared five years earlier, when he was still a Privat-Docent in the University of Jena, where he became afterwards a theological professor extraordinary. We are cautioned that it is merely a history, not a criticism, of philosophico-religious theories, and the great merit claimed for it by Dr. Flint is rigid accuracy of presentation. In one sense the volume contains more, in another less, than the title-page would lead us to expect. It includes an introductory chapter on religious philosophy in the ancient and mediæval Church, and it excludes all notice of recent English, French, or Italian religious philosophy. The sketch of patristic and scholastic theology is however of the meagrest, though fairly accurate as far as it goes; Augustine, Aquinas, and Duns Scotus e.g. are each dismissed in a single page. Nor is the information given us much fuller when we come to later times, though it is so far exhaustive that all the leading Protestant or Rationalistic divines are chronicled; thus Martin Luther has six pages assigned him, and Zwingli, with whom the author shows mere sympathy, has ten. We cannot at all agree with Dr. Flint that nowhere else will a student get nearly so much knowledge on the subject as in this book, and that he must be an excessively learned man who has nothing to learn from it. On the contrary, it will convey little information to those who are moderately familiar with the subject; its real value is as a handbook for reference, and in that way it may serve a useful purpose.

It certainly required some courage in Dr. Fisher, who is a Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Yale University, to conceive the design of compressing into a single octavo volume a History of the Church from the Apostles' days to our own, which opens with a sketch of the state of the Gentile world at the time of the Advent and closes with a discussion of modern English hymnology, Catholic and Protestant. The author tells us in his preface that his two leading objects have been to exhibit throughout the connexion of ecclesiastical and secular history, and to present a tolerably complete survey of the history of doctrine. It is perhaps for this reason that he has throughout adopted Neander's plan of dividing the external history from that of doctrine and of ritual, which has its conveniences, but certainly has its drawbacks, as it seriously interferes with the reader's gaining a clear idea of the life of the Church as an organic whole. It is a more questionable peculiarity of the author's to omit not only all footnotes, but all reference to his authorities, whereby he makes a very large demand on the implicit faith of his readers. That this confidence would in the main be justified we see no reason to dispute. Dr. Fisher appears to have done his work in a painstaking and impartial spirit; but the result can hardly be called a success. His standpoint is that of orthodox Protestantism, and as regards Church organization he professes his present adherence to "the conclusions of Lightfoot in his Edition of Clement and his Philippians," but is "ready for further light." He might have found further light in the Bishop's masterly edition of the Ignatian Epistles, to which oddly enough—we mean the Epistles, not only the Commentary—he makes no reference at all. We cannot think this very compendious method of compiling Church history a serviceable one. It is a mere dry catalogue of facts "packed close as herrings," wholly uninteresting to read, and not very serviceable as a book of reference, especially when no authorities are cited.

We have a very different writer indeed to deal with in the Rev. E. G. Wood, whose Dissertation on the Canon Law, though it will appeal, as he must be aware, to only a very limited circle of readers, is a thoroughly learned and solid treatise on the particular subject-matter which he has evidently made his own. Mr. Wood is a scholar as well as a divine, and his literary aptitude and lucid method and style enable him to bring out clearly, even for those who are not experts, the leading points of a somewhat abstruse and difficult subject, and its bearing on theology and Church history.

Dr. Dallinger's Fernley Lecture is addressed not so much to students as to the general public, and is designed to show that the foundations of religious belief are not really imperilled by "the splendid advance" of physical science, or as he—to our mind mistakenly and somewhat inconsistently—terms it, "Science," as though the mental sciences had no claim to the title. He argues with much force and clearness that there are more things in heaven and earth than are included in the sphere of physical science, which after all can only explain the succession of phenomena without revealing the ultimate mystery of causation, and therefore "the coarser Materialism can bring no lasting danger to philosophical Theism."

The widow of the late Mr. Baldwin Brown, who was well known as an able and devout Congregationalist preacher, has published a collection of sixteen of his Sermons under the title of The Risen Christ. They deal, as the title indicates, with various aspects of the Resurrection, viewed in its philosophy, its history, and its results for the individual Christian and for the community; and their scope is thus in part apologetic, in part hortatory and didactic. The first eight, which represent the beginning of a treatise the author did not live to complete, are on the whole decidedly superior to the later ones, some of which have only a very indirect relation to the central topic; the three best, we think, are those dealing with the historical evidence of the Resurrection.

It would not be easy to gather from his somewhat obscure preface—clearness of style is neither his own forte nor his translator's—the precise drift of Dr. Weiss's Introduction to the New Testament. But the plan of the work is really simple enough. After a preliminary chapter on "the Science of Introduction"—which means a résumé of what leading German divines have said on the subject during the present century—the volume is divided into two unequal parts, the first dealing with the history of the formation of the New Testament Canon, the second and longest with the history of the origin of the actual writings of which it is composed, which in the present volume however comprises the Pauline Epistles only. This looks at first sight like putting the cart before the horse, but the author's object is first to trace the growth of the received Canon, and then to test its validity by historical and contemporary evidence. The first part of his inquiry is conducted in minute detail and in a workmanlike manner, and supplies a very useful compendium of the facts. We shall await with interest the conclusion of Dr. Weiss's independent investigation of the authenticity of the Canon in his second volume, which will no doubt be furnished with an Index, an indispensable requisite in works of this sort.

We do not quite understand why Dr. Chadwick is called "Prebendary" on the cover of this volume and "Dean" on the title-page. His Gospel of St. Mark is a verse to verse commentary, of rather a commonplace kind, meant for edification, not for criticism. It follows the Revised Version, but without any intimation, still less explanation, of its variations from the Authorized, even in critical passages like Mark iii. 29, where the new reading (ἁμαρτήματος), whether correct or not, is a purely conjectural emendation with hardly any ancient authority.

Dean Bradley's Lectures on Job, like his previous course on Ecclesiastes, were preached in Westminster Abbey, and are prefaced by the same disclaimer—which indeed was hardly needed—of any attempt to throw fresh light on the "linguistic or historical" problems connected with the book. He professes a general acquiescence in the critical conclusions of Dr. Cheyne, whose work on the subject was noticed in our columns last year, and who places the composition about a thousand years later than the traditional date. The Dean tells us that his interest in Job was first excited by a very striking—and we may add somewhat revolutionary—comment from the pen of Mr. J. A. Froude, which appeared in the Westminster Review thirty-five years ago. The lectures are more interesting than those on Ecclesiastes—partly no doubt because the subject is more interesting—but leave on the mind something of the same vague sense of disappointment.

The collection of papers published under the title of Christianity and Evolution is a reprint of later articles from the Homiletic Magazine by ten different writers, all clerics of some sort, whose attitude towards modern problems of the faith is not exactly identical. The papers are of various degrees of merit and interest, and might fairly pass muster as magazine articles, but it is not at all obvious why "it has been thought advisable to republish" the series.

Dr. Watts, who is a Professor in the Presbyterian College of Belfast, tells us that the object of his volume is indicated in the title, but to ordinary readers the title, which speaks of The Scientific Principle of Telic Causality, will appear the most puzzling part of the book. When however we understand that the barbarous terminology of the title-page simply means the principle of final causes, and that the author's aim is to show that no theory of physical causation can be adequate which ignores the informing action of a Creative Mind, matters are simplified; and it is fair to say that the obscurity is confined to the title-page. The thesis is argued out with much clearness and force.

The Sermons to Soldiers published under the title of Faint yet Pursuing are by the author of How to be Happy though Married, who thinks people may like to have his thoughts on more serious subjects, "if there is any subject more serious than matrimony," and he hopes his sermons, which are short, will not be found tedious. The hope seems to be justified. There is a short and sensible introduction on the art of preaching, and Mr. Hardy shows himself able, in this respect at least, to practise what he preaches. His discourses are terse, pointed, and practical, without being flippant or irreverent in tone, and he avoids the too common fault of preachers of setting up men of straw in order to knock them down. This remark applies especially to the last four, which deal with certain popular difficulties of religious belief.

The writer who calls himself "Zenas," and gives his book the equally enigmatic title of Apologia ad Hebræos, has convinced himself that the Epistle to the Hebrews was written from Rome before the great Fire by St. Paul, with the aid of St. Luke and St. Timothy, and was primarily addressed to the Philippians. He claims to have worked out his conclusions for himself from the text, with little or no aid from previous critics, or indeed acquaintance with them, and his method of procedure is first to construct an elaborate "biography" of St. Paul, and then to give a briefer notice of all the Apostolic Epistles in turn, except those of St. John. We doubt if he will be found to have thrown much new light on the subject, but he seems to have toiled with conscientious diligence through the task he had set himself.

If good preaching is rare, it is a still rarer gift to preach well to boys. It was possessed in a remarkable degree by Dr. Arnold and the late Head Master of Uppingham, while we have conspicuous living examples in the Dean of Llandaff, Archdeacon Farrar, and the present Head Master of Harrow. Dean James cannot quite be placed in the same category, but still his Sermons preached in Rossall School Chapel are good specimens of the right kind of school sermons. They are plain, direct, and to the point, without the mistake of preaching down to a merely childish capacity, and they gain much—as for instance in the last sermon—from appropriate illustrations.

Dr. Matheson's Psalmist and Scientist is the sequel and development of his former work, Can the Old Faith Live with the New? but it goes much further and lays itself open to more damaging criticism. His thesis is that religious emotion may survive and suffice when the doctrine it enshrined and accentuated has become obsolete, and he is indiscreet enough to cite Schleiermacher as a typical example. He forgets that one swallow does not make a spring, and that Schleiermacher's suicidal attempt to reconstruct the failing faith of Protestant Germany on an emotional basis, without dogmatic or historical support, proved a complete failure, and only found its natural outcome in the far abler and more consistent teaching of Strauss, who was his most illustrious disciple.

Mr. Hockin's John Wesley, which has already reached a fourth edition, is too well known to need any recommendation of ours. Its object is to prove, as it does most conclusively prove from Wesley's own explicit statements, that on every disputed question—including such critical points as the Real Presence and Sacrifice of the Eucharist, auricular confession, and prayer for the dead—the great founder of modern Dissent was to the last a pronounced High Churchman. It would be interesting to know how many of those who bear his name in the present day agree with him.

The object of Mr. Birks's Studies of St. Peter is not critical but devotional, and he has designedly avoided discussing controversial questions such as the meaning of preaching to the spirits in prison. His book seems well adapted for its professed purpose of encouraging an intelligent and religious daily study of the Bible.

Under the obscure, not to say misleading, title of Religio Viatoris a writer who withholds his name, but who may be pretty certainly identified on internal evidence with a high Roman dignitary in this country, gives a brief but lucid summary of his grounds for believing in theism, revelation, and historical Christianity, as presented in "the (Roman) Catholic Faith" as the substance of revelation. He cannot expect to carry all his readers with him, especially in his fourth section, which argues à priori and rather too glibly to be very persuasive, and passing a wet sponge over all historical difficulties, for the necessary infallibility of the Pope. Throughout indeed there are obvious lacunæ in the argument, as e.g. when it is urged that the goodness of the Creator is no more impeached by animals preying on each other than by men being allowed to eat meat. But the force of the alleged objection, valeat quantum, lies precisely in the wanton cruelties many kinds of animals often inflict on their prey, for no apparent purpose unless for the sake of torturing it.

Mr. Auchmuty argues from the Parable of Dives and Pauper, as he phrases it, that the distinction of rich and poor is unscriptural, and the drift of the volume which takes its name from the opening sermon is to preach the Gospel of Socialism. As might be expected, he interprets the Bible—very dogmatically—by the aid of such high theological authorities as Mr. William Morris and the author of Natural Religion.

We have next on our list two volumes of Sermons by Dr. Salmon, with whose masterly Introduction to the New Testament many of our readers will be familiar, as one of the best and most thorough exposures of the modern destructive criticism. They take their titles respectively from the opening sermons, Non-Miraculous Christianity and Gnosticism and Agnosticism, and deal, as is natural in discourses addressed mainly to academical audiences, not so much with purely theological questions—in which the author does not seem so much at home—as with ethical subjects and the claims of the Christian Revelation in face of modern science and the sceptical assault. It is of course impossible within our present limits to attempt any sort of analysis of the argument, but it exhibits throughout the clear logical grasp, comprehensive learning, and strong common sense—devoted to the uncompromising vindication, not of some vague and misty religionism, but of historical Christianity, as a Divine revelation—which mark the author's previous writings. As he puts it, "a non-miraculous Christianity is as much a contradiction in terms as a quadrangular circle; when you have taken away the supernatural, what is left behind is not Christianity."

Canon Scott Holland's last batch of St. Paul's Sermons, published under the rather perplexing title Christ or Ecclesiastes, is also designed as a warning that to surrender to scientific criticism "the supernatural setting of the faith" means really "to retreat within the joyless shadows of the Preacher," and lose the true key of life and spiritual energy. The line of reasoning, if less elaborate, is more direct and stirring than in Creed and Character; its appeal however is to the spiritual instinct in man, and will fall flat on the mere scientific expert. Its general tone may be illustrated by a characteristic passage in the last, and most striking, sermon in the volume, where the preacher is deprecating the vulgar fallacy that only the miseries of life suggest the need of retribution beyond the grave; "Our human successes breed arguments at least as valid and as impressive; our poor successes that carry with them a sadder lesson of our limitation, and our impotence, than all our distresses. It is the ragged and fragmentary character of our best success that so emphatically disproves our consummation to be here on earth."

We must confess to a decided dislike of compilations of "Elegant Extracts" by a second hand, even when taken from the Bible or from the great masters of human thought, like Shakspeare, and while there is still greater inconvenience in the method of manipulating a living writer, there is less excuse for it. The process is necessarily an arbitrary and scrappy one, and can give us no real knowledge of an author, but only at best of the compiler's estimate of him, especially where, as in these Thoughts on Revelation and Life, the average length of the extracts—which are often much shorter—is only about half a page. And such treatment is peculiarly inapplicable to the subtle and delicate genius of a writer like Dr. Westcott, who requires εἴ τις ἄλλος to be read consecutively to be understood. That over 400 pages from so fruitful and suggestive a teacher must contain much that is interesting is obvious, but just as we get interested we are pulled up sharp by the end of the extract, and no references are given. It is fair however to say that the selections appear to have been made with tact and judgment.

BOOKS ON IRELAND.*

WE have seen Lord Grey's book on Ireland called, by a Gladstonian, a melancholy book. It certainly is, though in no Gladstonian sense. We have in it the thoughts of one of the most thoughtful and experienced of English politicians on a subject which, during the whole of his long life, has constantly engaged the statesmen of his own party; and it is in effect one of the most humiliating confessions of failure and incompetence on their part that has ever been written or that could ever be written. When we see a staunch Liberal like Earl Grey inclining to the solution of suspending Parliamentary government altogether in Ireland for some considerable time, no other proof ought to be wanted, to a tolerably intelligent man, of the fatal results of Liberal policy during the past sixty years. Even now we are not sure that Lord Grey is wholly resipiscent on his party's behalf. He admits to the very full the disastrous character of the Liberal legislation of the last twenty years; but he seems to keep up a little Nelsonic blindness to the fact that the causa malorum lay much earlier. He still talks, though he is strongly opposed to the form of its Disestablishment, of the "injustice" of the Established Church in its former form, of the "intolerable oppression" of the tithes, of the "just claims" of the Roman Catholic population, and so forth. Alas! it is exactly talk of this kind that has brought on our present plight. If because a majority of the inhabitants of Ireland chose to deprive themselves of the benefit of, and to be hostile to, the Church of Ireland as appointed by the Government or Governments of the United Kingdom, and as representing an unbroken title for seven hundred years at least, it was "unjust" to maintain that Church, we at least cannot see how it can be otherwise than unjust to maintain a civil government to which a majority of the inhabitants of Ireland (if not such a large majority) maintain the same attitude of opposition. Once admit that the caprice of a majority of any fraction of the State may dictate to the State, and Mr. Gladstone's position follows, if not at once, yet by easy steps. We know that Lord Grey's own views, if carried out, would have obviated much of the dangerous results of the early "concessions," of emancipation, of tithe relief, and so forth; and we acknowledge his wisdom therein. But we fear the old "Liberal" leaven in him is still too strong to let him wholly confess the origin of the evil, the fatal admission that the mere wishes of a fraction of a fraction of the people of a country can make "justice." It would be almost too much, however, that a man in his position should be asked to admit, plain and plump, a position which proves Tories, and Tories only, to have been wise, to grant that "the fools were right" and not foolishly right all through. But except for this general and somewhat abstract question, the wisdom of the book, both as to the past and as to the future, is undeniable.

There may be two opinions about the healthiness of that state of the public mind in which it is necessary to provide the sovereign people with Shorter Catechisms of the true faith on questions of politics; but there can be little question of the excellence of the Shorter Catechism of Unionism which Sir George Baden Powell, assisted by the best authorities of the Kingdom, has provided. With the Duke of Argyll writing on some inconsistencies of Gladstonian Home Rule, Lord Derby on the plain man as a Liberal-Unionist, Lord Bramwell (a most refreshing screed) on "What Home Rule Means," Mr. Frederick Pollock on the compatibility of Home Rule and Imperial sovereignty, Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald on Irish Home Rulers as they are, and not as they appear to the guileless mind of Sir William Harcourt to be; Lord Hartington on Separatist demands and Unionist remedies, Lord Selborne on Home Rule in law, Lord Basing (Mr. Sclater Booth) on administrative difficulties of Home Rule, and Mr. Lecky on the interesting, and to Separatists, as we know, specially heartrending, question why Mr. Lecky is not a Home Ruler, a sufficiently good bill of fare was provided already. But the editor has very properly looked to the fringes as well as the centre of the question, and has dealt by himself with the Separatist aporia from colonial self-government, and by his most sufficient deputy, Professor Vambéry, with Mr. Freeman's favourite case of Croatia. The contents of the book are not in all cases new, but new and old are excellently selected and blended together, and the whole may be recommended as a catholicon to the faint-hearted, the ignorant, or the inquisitive on this great subject. We should like it to be read side by side with the Handbook of Home Rule to show the overpowering character of the Unionist argument; but lazy people may, if they like, dispense with this addition.

We trust that we shall not be regarded as guilty of disrespect to Her Majesty's Counsel learned in the law if we pass Mr. Digby Seymour's book with much shorter notice than the two books before it. In the first place, a fancy draft of an Irish Federal Union Bill by a lawyer and politician of no great eminence shows that Mr. Digby Seymour has failed to appreciate the fact that principles, and not details, are at stake. In the second place, one single sentence of Mr. Seymour's shows that in principles, as well as in details, he has failed to grasp the subject. Comparing—the fact of the comparison would be almost enough—Mr. Dicey's reasoning with Mr. Justin McCarthy's, he asks plaintively, "How can England have a case against Home Rule if Ireland has a case for it?" And he goes off into a kind of belly-and-members justification. Why thus:—You may cut off a gangrened limb to save the body; you can never, unless you are mad, gangrene the body to save the limb. And so farewell to Mr. Digby Seymour.

Mr. Barnard's contribution to Mr. York Powell's well-imagined catena of English History from Contemporary Writers is an excellent piece of work, and one very timely at the present moment. So well and completely done is it, that we find but two things which we care to censure, and one of those is due to Mr. Barnard's over-respect for a Rolls editor, not to his own laches. He should not be guilty of the silly affectation of calling Vikings "Wickings," and for this he is liable himself to horsing and stripes. In the following passage his sin is faith merely. "As Mr. Dimock remarks," he tells us, "this [the Anglo-Norman Poem on the Conquest of Ireland] was just such a Chanson de Geste as would be chanted in many a Norman hall," &c. &c. Now, unluckily for Mr. Dimock and Mr. Barnard, the poem in question is, in form, such as no Chanson de Geste—the form of which is nearly as severely fixed and as germane to its definition as the form of a Sapphic ode—ever was or ever could be. But this does not matter much, though it is always to be regretted that scholarly persons should use terms of scholarship as if they had no scholarly import or connotation. The purely historical work is very well done, and the little book is made attractive to that youth for which it is composed by illustrations at least as good as can be expected for the modest price of it. Considering the way in which, we fear to a greater and greater extent, history is getting written to order (for the increased examination of documents matters not one straw if the result of it is affected by prejudice), it becomes more and more necessary that the documents themselves should be within the reach of everybody. Mr. Barnard has arranged his materials with sufficient care, and we have but to find fault with his giving a translation into doggrel eights and sixes of the Poem, instead of turning it into workmanlike prose. Giraldus, of course, is the most largely drawn upon, not without a wise caution as to his idiosyncrasies. But the rare Irish authorities are also given after approved translations, the other Latin chroniclers besides Giraldus are duly laid under contribution, and the whole is a satisfactory performance of a very useful task.

In saying that it is rather unfortunate that the third edition of Father Morris's Life of St. Patrick should have appeared at the same time as Professor Whitley Stokes's edition of the Tripartite Life of that Saint, we desire to guard against one possible misinterpretation. Nothing in the documents now put more conveniently before students than in the Trias Thaumaturga of Colgan (a Latin version), and the Life by Miss Cusack (an English one), tends in the least to impugn the learned Oratorian's good faith. Father Morris is too much of an historical student not to give up, though, as he says, "with a pang," the fantastic, if not ungraceful, legends of St. Patrick's youth which the Irish hagiographers imagined, as inconsistent with St. Pat'ck's own words. Whenever he gives himself leave to be critical there is no fault at all to be found with his criticism. The "misfortune" lies in the inevitable comparison between a man who has no general thesis to prove and one who has a vast and complicated collection of theses at which he has to be constantly casting side glances for fear of saying something contrary to them. We could pass Father Morris's (in the circumstances) particularly ungenerous side hits at the "Anglo-Irish Establishment" with no other remark than that they are unworthy of him. We could only rejoice in his citation of such silly inurbanity as Cardinal Newman's remark that he should hesitate to believe in a miracle if related of "a member of Parliament, a bishop of the Establishment, or a Wesleyan preacher" with no further comment that, for such a reputed master of dialectics, the Cardinal gave the Wesleyan preacher beau jeu in retorting. The extraordinary exaggeration of his language about an amiable writer of verse like Mr. Aubrey De Vere might be allowed to pass almost unnoticed. But when we come to such a passage as the following, then the hopeless bondage in which an orthodox Roman Catholic historian lies is seen at once. It is well known to all students that St. Patrick in his Confessio mentions quite naturally, and without any comment, the fact that his father and grandfather were both in Holy Orders. This fact, indeed, is, as Mr. Stokes incidentally remarks, one of the chief proofs of the authenticity and date of the Confessio. Further, the early Irish hagiographers take the fact of a married clergy as simply as their master. Yet what does Father Morris say? "When, therefore, he mentions that his father and grandfather were in Holy Orders, we must suppose either that the ancient copyist has made a mistake or else that the Saint is alluding to what has been permitted in all ages of the Church to married men, like St. Gregory of Nyssa and St. Hilary, who have been allowed to take Holy Orders when separated from their wives by death or mutual consent." In other words, rather than admit the obvious and common-sense meaning, which might, though supported by innumerable other historical proofs, run counter to an opinion of our own, let us either put a perfectly gratuitous and non-natural gloss on the text, or shipwreck its authority by suggesting that the copyist has made a mistake! We could hardly wish for a more fatal example of a method which may be the method of faith, but is certainly not that of history. We should add that, if Father Morris could get rid of his terrier-like attitude of snapping at the "Protestant round the corner," he would be an excellent literary companion, and that we have no quarrel at all with his attitude on the question of miracles in itself.

The relief of getting rid of the said "Protestant round the corner" without the fear of a Roman round the corner in his place is very great to the reader of Dr. Stokes's book. There is to be found here, prefaced by an ample introduction, well annotated and supplemented, a collection of all the important early documents—the Tripartite Life, the precious Confessions and Letters to the Subjects of Coroticus, the Latin and Irish hymns of Secundinus and Fiacc, and a great collection of miscellaneous extracts from the Book of Armagh downwards. The Confessions and the Letters are admittedly among the most interesting first-hand documents as to early Christian missions existing; both the hymns have a certain vigour about them which is not common. As for the Life and the minor hagiological documents, the interest of them depends on more things than one. To the Voltairian, and even to some extent to the Gibbonian (though Gibbon himself had far too much historic sense wholly to despise such matters), they may be merely extravagant fiction, lacking alike taste, sense, and interest of subject. To more fortunately constituted persons they will be frequently interesting, even in themselves, and almost always capable of serving, if properly used, as valuable sources of social, religious, literary, and, now and then, political history.

Mr. MacDowall's Curve History, though something of a concession to a statistical fad of the time, serves as a useful book of reference, always provided that its statistics are not worked too hard. The celebrated curve of Mr. O'Brien's fighting weight in his prison battle with the Evil One—which the Evil One made such good fun of in the House of Commons—is not here, but many other things are. Emigration and pigs are the most wildly erratic; education the most constant in improvement. Now such Philistines are we that we should have been better pleased if emigration and pigs had steadily gone up, even if education had as steadily gone down.

THE LAND BEYOND THE FOREST.*

WE hardly know how to name the author of The Land Beyond the Forest. She figures on her title-page under her maiden name of "E. Gerard," but she is the wife of an Austrian officer of rank, who happens to have been quartered for many years in the eastern provinces of the empire. Miss Gerard, as we must call her for convenience, is one of the most fascinating of our lady novelists. In Reata she transported us to the forests of Mexico, and painted their semi-tropical luxuriance with such vividly realistic picturesqueness that it was hard to believe she had never visited the country. In her Baths of Hercules she laid the scenes on the borderland of Roumania and Transylvania, and we need not say that they lost nothing by her personal familiarity with them. It was in the spring of 1883 that her husband was appointed to the command of the cavalry brigade in Transylvania. To Miss Gerard, with her intense appreciation of all that is wild and romantic, the change from the monotony of garrison life in the dull Galician plains was a welcome one. She had still to put up with much social dulness and to endure many domestic tribulations; but the new existence smacked of adventure, as it opened up a bright field of fresh experiences. In the land where she was to be shifting her residences for two years there was still some survival of what "Eothen" styles the splendour and havoc of the East. The manners and the massive municipal architecture reminded her of the days when the Turks were still the terror of Europe, and even now she finds civilization everywhere rubbing shoulders with semi-barbarism. There was a contact, although no blending of races, that showed many a point of striking contrast, but had scarcely a quality in common. One town was an immemorial settlement of the Saxons; the adjacent villages might be Hungarian or Roumanian. When the nationalities had come together under the same municipal authority, each confined itself to its own quarter, and intermarriages were altogether the exception. The forests and the roads were frequented by great gangs of gipsies, illuminating the darkness with the glimmer of their camp-fires, who were governed by their own immutable laws, though they set authority, so far as they dared, at defiance. It was emphatically a land of legend and romance; each town had religiously preserved its special memories and traditions; all of them had stood many sieges in their time, and most had been repeatedly stormed and sacked. In one of the races the Reformation had struck ineradicable roots, and the Calvinistic creed had survived through the decay of secular institutions; in others religion had been degenerating into superstition, while another was veritably heathen, with no religion of any kind. The gloom of the forests, the solitudes of the hill pastures, had predisposed the peasants to fantastic credulity. With scarcely an exception they firmly believed in signs and omens, in spectres and vampires and wehr-wolves, and all the horrors of a semi-pagan mythology. Living penuriously through great part of the year, the people celebrated feasts, and sometimes held riot on holy-days; recalled the triumphs or calamities of the past by processions on memorable anniversaries; and solemnized their marriages, births, and burials with a succession of intolerably wearisome rites. That old-world life with its picturesque Oriental tinge awakened the sympathies and excited the fancy of the author of Reata. She recorded her first impressions in sundry contributions to magazines, and when she had left a country to which she wistfully looked back, she resolved to collect and connect these impressions. The work grew and expanded under her hand, and the result is the volumes we are reviewing. So far as she professes to go it is almost exhaustive of its subject. There is a solid substructure of historical facts and statistics which enables us to follow with intelligent interest the chapters that deal with the poetical side of the "Land Beyond the Forest." There are graphic descriptions of the Transylvanian scenery in its various aspects, and, should any one care to travel there or to emigrate thither, he will find abundance of practical information in these pages, although it may not be altogether encouraging.

The three important races are the Magyars, the Saxons, and the Roumanians. It is the Magyars, of course, who rule the others, and there is no mistake as to their thorough-going methods of Government. They tolerate no sentimental nonsense as to provincial Home Rule. They have resolved "by pursuance of an inflexible policy to sacrifice all alien considerations to purely Hungarian interests, and impose their own nationality on all without exception." Hungarian is taught in all the schools and is the language of the Courts of Justice. Indeed, the system is carried so far that many criminals are tried and condemned without understanding a word of the evidence or of the arguments on either side. Serbs, Saxons, Roumanians, &c., grumble, but are compelled to acquiesce, and seem gradually to be resigning themselves to the yoke. In Miss Gerard's opinion the Hungarians have chosen the wiser of two difficult and dangerous courses. Suppression undoubtedly has its perils and inconveniences, yet a system of concessions would have been simply suicidal. But she believes that the outlook for Hungary is at the best gloomy. "Should the Balkan races begin to agitate ere Hungary has accomplished her Herculean task" (that of consolidating her strength as a nation), "then her downfall is certain." In Transylvania 650,000 Magyars have to deal with twice the number of sullen Roumanians and with upwards of 200,000 sturdy Saxons. The Saxons are the lineal descendants of the German colonists who were tempted into the country in the thirteenth century, and they have ever since kept together in their semi-patriarchal communities. Miss Gerard found them respectable rather than attractive. The Saxon is stiff and formal, prudent and penurious. He does not indulge in romantic fancies or reckless marriages, nor does he increase and multiply like the impulsive Roumanians. His marriage is always a matter of bargain, and the future comfort of his household must be assured. Nor does he waste his substance in entertaining strangers, and he rather prides himself on refusing the hospitality which his Hungarian neighbours offer all comers as a matter of course. In his towns and villages everything is solid and meant for endurance, in striking contrast with the Roumanian collections of tumble-down hovels of mud. Each house stands gable-on to the wide main street, with a spacious courtyard behind, surrounded by the sheds that shelter the cattle, the horses, and the buffaloes. The clustering of the farm steadings within the enceinte of fortified walls is a survival of the times when the farmers lived in terror of Turkish invasions. The walls were protected by loop-holed towers at short intervals; the very churches, which stood for the most part on commanding heights, were formidable places of defence, encircled by extensive outworks. Sometimes they are within triple lines of walls, and the remains of the moats and drawbridges are still visible. In those days stores of provisions were laid in, in prospect of possible sieges; the custom still exists, and is become a veritable mania, strangely in contrast with the parsimonious habits of the people. "One village prides itself on having the greatest quantity of bacon, much of which is already thirty or forty years old, and consequently totally unfit for use; while in another the oldest grain is the great speciality." In fact, forethought is carried to such an extreme that the thrifty peasant takes care to provide himself a coffin, picking up the timber cheap, and having time to satisfy himself conscientiously of its soundness. He deals in similar fashion with death and the doctors, and it is a marvel how the doctor manages to live. He is seldom called in till the patient's cure is hopeless, and then the dying man often declines to swallow the medicine, which has clearly come too late to do him any good.

As for the Roumanians, they are as careless as the Saxons are provident. As the Roumanian, like his neighbour the gipsy, can live on next to nothing, he is quite easy as to the future of his numerous progeny. His staple food is maize-corn flour, sometimes mixed with a little milk. The children are taught to help their parents by going to the woods to steal firewood almost as soon as they are able to toddle. A young married couple may be more easily and cheaply started in the world than even among the Crofters of the Hebrides. "In actual possession of a calf, the Roumanian lad considers himself a made man." The hovel of mud or clay is thatched with reeds or shingles. Yet he is said to show extraordinary natural taste in decorating the wattled interior; the walls are glowing with coarse engravings of holy pictures; the rude furniture is brightly painted; and the women can turn out gorgeously striped stuffs from the primitive weaving-looms that are to be seen in every cottage. Miss Gerard remarks that their faults are the faults of slaves. Oppressed and persecuted from the prehistoric period, accustomed to work for their masters and not for themselves, they are lazy, cunning, and deceitful. Greatly addicted as they are to violent outbreaks of passion, the gust passes over as quickly as it blows up, from a well-founded apprehension of the consequences. Degraded as they have long been, the spirit of nationality is strongly stirring among them, and the foundation of the Roumanian kingdom under a Hohenzollern Prince is another trouble for the Magyars. It is significant that the King of Roumania's portrait may often be seen in Transylvanian hovels, but never that of the Austrian Emperor. There is an interesting chapter on Roumanian poetry; for, rude and uneducated as the people are, the language is fairly rich in legendary ballads and folklore songs. If the Roumanians have been oppressed, the gipsies have always been treated with exceptional consideration in the Hungarian provinces; they have found congenial breathing space on the boundless plains and secure retreats in the pathless forests; and at the present day, in Transylvania alone, it is computed that there are no fewer than 80,000 Tziganes. As for the most part the scattered bands are perpetually on the move, to take an exact census must be impossible, but with the steady increase of cultivation and population, they are beginning to abandon their wandering habits. Most of the towns and villages have their faubourgs of gipsy hovels. Of course, when they sit down in permanent homes, they take up some kind of occupations, but their tastes are naturally capricious, and they detest any regular industry. It would appear that pilfering and music are their favourite pursuits. Perhaps the fascination the gipsy musicians can exercise on Magyars of all classes partly explains the exceptional toleration they have always enjoyed. The Tzigane throws his soul and being into the melody, and plays on, without a symptom of weariness, like a man who is possessed or inspired. He sets the feet of the peasants in perpetual motion at their rustic merrymakings, and supplies the orchestras at the fashionable balls in the great cities. The gipsy bands in the cities have put on a certain artificial polish; "but intrinsically they are the same as their more vagabond brethren, and their eye never loses the semi-savage glitter, reminding one of a half-tamed animal." "Under the influence of Tzigane music, a Hungarian is capable of flinging about his money with the most reckless extravagance, fifty, a hundred, a thousand florins, and more, being sometimes given for the performance of a single melody." Miss Gerard closes her book with picturesque descriptions of the wild scenery of the gorges in the mountain boundary that divides the "Land beyond the Forest" from Roumania. Gloom and desolation seem to be the prevailing characteristics, though in the summer season the solitudes surrounding the châlets are enlivened by the bleating of the sheep, lost to sight in the rifts and clefts of almost inaccessible precipices, but which, nevertheless, respond readily to the cry of the shepherd, whom they know as their protector against bears and wolves.

This little volume is both useful and instructive to those who are interested in the rearing of pheasants, and in grouse-driving. It supplies a want very much felt by those who are trying to get up and maintain their shooting, but who, having been unable to gain practical experience, are completely in the hands of their keepers, who, either by dishonesty, laziness, or ignorance, cause them much expense, with very poor results. The perusal of this little volume may enable them to "see through" the "set excuses" that are offered to them by their keepers in exculpation of themselves for their want of success. Nobody is more competent to give valuable hints than Mr. Lloyd-Price. He has reduced the art of game-rearing and preserving to a science, as his friends well know.

This little book begins with an amusing dedication to Lord de Grey, who is unanimously accorded the honour of being the best shot of the day. Mr. Lloyd-Price shows his sense of humour all through the book, and we almost wish that he had sacrificed some of his jokes in giving his ideas to the public about the best pheasantries to be built, with full particulars as to whether to have them open at the top to allow the wild cock birds to come in, or to have them covered over with wire and the cock birds kept in with the hens. We feel sure that there are many points regarding the measurements, building, &c., of pheasantries that would be eagerly read and sought after by neophytes in game-rearing, and we trust that Mr. Lloyd-Price may see his way to giving his valuable experience on the subject at some future day. He animadverts on the extremely bad maternal qualities of the "wild" hen pheasant; but we think he might have said in justification of her that these lâches are owing chiefly to her own artificial rearing, and that in places where the rearing of "tame pheasants" has been given up and only a stock of wild game kept, these hens become year by year more careful and acute in bringing up their offspring, and, by becoming really wild, attain to a degree of self-reliance and intelligence in these matters that the half-tame bird does not possess.

We should strongly recommend that this most interesting little book be put into the hands of all keepers, in the hopes that it may eradicate many of the old-fashioned and erratic fallacies that most of those gentry indulge in, and whose ignorance and obstinacy combined make them turn a deaf ear to advice, as they generally have a notion that their masters are hopelessly ignorant on the subject, as, alas! many are.

There is one most valuable hint about grouse-driving that we wish especially to refer to, and that is Mr. Lloyd-Price's advice to put up posts at the corners of the "butts," so as to prevent the "dangerous" hands from following their birds round, and then "loosing off" all down the line of "butts," and "peppering" many of their friends. There are but few of us, indeed, who have not suffered the agonies of fear of impending danger, if not of being actually hit, at the hands of some of these excitable sportsmen, and we know from practical experience that the adoption of this suggestion "calms each fear," and is productive of better shooting in consequence.

This portion of the work makes us long that the month of August was at hand; and, taken as a whole, this little book is most useful and instructive, and we feel that a debt of gratitude is owing to Mr. Lloyd-Price for imparting so freely, so clearly, and in such an entertaining manner that fund of knowledge on the subject, which can only be acquired at a place like Rhiwlas, at great expense, and after many years of practical devotion to the object in view.

MEDICAL BOOKS.*

THE public stands much in need of some trustworthy instruction as to how to preserve its health. Many of the books which have been written, professedly with the object of imparting such knowledge, have dealt with the treatment of diseases, and thus run counter to the undoubted truth contained in the misquotation that "the man who is his own physician has a fool for a patient." We regret to say that many others have been thinly-veiled advertisements of the professional talents of their authors. We are both grieved and astonished by the fact that boys and girls are usually sent out into the world without the slightest intelligent knowledge of their own bodies or how to take care of them. We cannot doubt that much misery and vice arise from this cause. Mr. Morris's Book of Health is intended to remedy this unnatural state of things, and would form a useful text-book for use in the upper forms of schools. The introductory chapter is written by Mr. Savory, and gives a lucid and simple description of the organic and animal functions of the human body. On food and feeding Sir Risdon Bennett gives sound advice, and corrects the many popular errors on the subject. Since the death of Dr. Anstie probably no physician has studied the effects of alcohol on the system more closely than Dr. Brunton. Hence his carefully-written paper on this subject is of great value. His conclusions will prove disappointing, both to those who hold extreme views as to the benefits to be derived from the consumption of this substance, and to the total abstainers who are never tired of denying its utility under any circumstances whatever. The frequent substitution of "will" for "shall" unmistakably indicates the land of the author's birth. On the subject of "Education and the Nervous System" Sir James Crichton-Browne speaks with well-merited authority, and his opinions are to be commended to the earnest consideration of parents, guardians, and others occupied in the care and tuition of the young. Though practically, and perhaps unavoidably, much neglected by the dwellers in towns, exercise is theoretically admitted by all to be essential to the retention of high health. In what manner and with what precautions it should be taken is ably set forth by Mr. James Cantlie, who we should imagine is himself somewhat of an athlete. Mr. Frederick Treves tells us that > the perfect dress . . . should afford proper protection to the body, and should preserve in it a proper degree of warmth . . . without interference with any natural function, and without limitation of any natural movement . . . in conformity, so far as the above requirements will allow, with the tastes and fashion of the time and with the dictates of modesty.

How this ideal may best be realized he with much success endeavours to indicate. The articles by Dr. Pollock and Mr. Murphy on healthy surroundings and homes are full of common sense. All travellers will be thankful for the thoughtful remarks of Dr. J. Russell Reynolds on "Travelling: its Influence on Health." The "little ones" will owe many thanks to Dr. Cheadle if their mothers will read and profit by his instructions. Dr. Dukes's familiarity with school life and its dangers gives him a peculiar right to instruct us on the maintenance of "Health at School." Matters concerning the eye and ear are discussed with the ability which we should expect in such masters of these specialties as Mr. Power and Mr. Field. We are glad to observe that the paper devoted to the consideration of "The Throat, Voice, and Speech" has been written by a general physician of such eminence as Dr. Bristowe. Mr. Tomes contributes a concise little article on the teeth and their management. The editor gives an excellent description of the skin, hair, and nails, together with directions for maintaining them in proper condition. The subject of the preservation of health in India is exhaustively treated by Sir Joseph Fayrer and Dr. Ewart. Dr. Herman Weber contributes a practical treatise on climate and health resorts.

Twelve years' experience fully entitles Dr. Savage to place before the medical profession the conclusions at which he has arrived with regard to the causation, nature, and treatment of the various forms of mental aberration. We entirely endorse his opinion that there is no natural standard of sanity, though, for legal purposes, an artificial, but very imperfect, one has necessarily been created. His statement that "No person is perfectly sane in all mental faculties, any more than he is perfectly healthy in body," is absolutely and undeniably true. He also points out that, although the collapse often comes suddenly, symptoms of unsoundness of mind have generally been present at long antecedent periods of the patient's life-history. In common with most other physicians, the author looks upon heredity as the most general predisposing cause of mental disease, but not by any means the only one. The exciting causes—i.e. the actual starting-points of the departure from mental health—are considered at length, and many illustrative cases are given. Dr. Savage has devoted a chapter to the consideration of the vexed question of the responsibility of lunatics, and shows that the difficulties of it principally arise from the fact that no definite line of demarcation can be drawn between the sane and the insane. We regard this book as a valuable contribution to the literature of a most important branch of medical science.

Materia Medica and Therapeutics is an excellent text-book for students and a useful supplement to the British Pharmacopœia for practitioners of medicine. The frequent discovery of new drugs quickly renders every successive work on therapeutics obsolete, and necessitates revision at short intervals. In his fifth edition Dr. J. Mitchell Bruce has made such additions as are required by the physician's enlarged armamentarium.

SOME NEW MUSIC.

WE have been sent a Menuet Caprice for the pianoforte, composed by W. H. Bentley, published by the London Music Publishing Company; and, as it is marked Op. 1, No. 2, we imagine it must be the work of a young composer. It is a showy little piece, well suited to mild performers, as the technique is not difficult; and we see no reason why the composer should not rise to greater works. The name puzzles us much. Why is it called a Menuet? It has none of the characteristics of one, except that it is in three-time, and it misses altogether the essential stately grace and rhythm.

A long list comes from Reid Brothers, amongst them two pianoforte pieces by Ciro Fasoli. The first, "Marguerite Mazurka Caprice," is bright and sparkling, but with no great originality. Its second subject, or what we suppose might be called the "trio" (if such a term can be used in a mazurka), brings too striking a reminiscence of one of the airs in Lucrezia Borgia. All the same, this Mazurka has merit, and may help listeners to pass a cheery evening without much strain on their musical knowledge. "L'Etoile d'Amour," by the same composer, would be a pleasant valse to dance to, but has no characteristic to distinguish it from many other valses of the same kind.

Several songs, and a pianoforte work of Claude Melville, have been sent by the same publisher. The latter is called "La Reine," and is a thoroughly modern drawing-room piece, with a certain amount of brilliance; but we cannot imagine how it came by its title of "Ancienne danse de la cour." Mr. Claude Melville's song of "Oh that the dove's light wings were mine!" words by W. C. Newsam, is a descriptive song, where a "watery waste" and the point where the reciter feels "sorrowing, weary, and distressed," are very faithfully portrayed. There is a very curious false accent in the setting of the word "Hesperides," the syllable "Hes" being made quite short and set to a note on the fourth unaccented beat of the bar; "per" is given two notes, consisting of the first principal and second beat of the next bar; while "i" has an almost equally important post on the third and fourth beat. It has a most awkward effect. "Elysian Dreams," by the same composer and author (is it a joint partnership?), has a certain graceful swing about it, and is not so absolutely dreary as the former song. It may be an accurate description in music of the "Elysian Fields"; but certainly the sing-song, swinging rhythm is not exactly descriptive of the lines—

> Till the Great Angel that shall come at last,
> Shall sound o'er earth and sea his clarion blast.

We suppose the violin part sent with this song is not considered at all essential, as it adds nothing either to the air or accompaniment, being almost always in unison with one or the other. "He giveth his beloved sleep," by the same dual authorship, is without any distinctive point, but may please those who like an eminently placid song.

Then we have a duet, "Sweetly the Nightingale," for soprano and tenor, where Mr W. C. Newsam dissolves the partnership with Mr. Claude Melville, and combines the two offices of poet and composer. It is tuneful and of an engaging simplicity that ought to become popular, as it is so entirely within the compass of singers who only possess a very limited knowledge of music, time, and tune.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

ARMAND BASCHET'S (1) name was well known to most students of diplomatic history, and Dr. Dufay has reminded his readers of a commendation of the then young savant which appeared in the Saturday Review five-and-twenty years ago. It was a little odd that Baschet should take to the laborious department of literature in which he made his reputation; for when he first went to Paris, just before the Coup d'état, he fell in and associated for a time almost exclusively with the extremest school of literature proper—Baudelaire, Champfleury, and their set—while his own actual literary start was made with enthusiastic essays on Balzac and Voyages humoristiques in the taste of the day. He soon drifted into documents, however, was able (being fairly well off) to indulge his taste without difficulty or hardship, spent years in overhauling the archives of Venice, Vienna, Paris, and London, edited one series of Calendars for the Master of the Rolls, and produced a great deal of historical material. Dr. Dufay has diversified his account of Baschet's life by some extracts from the documents he published, and has produced a very readable monograph.

The useful Année Politique for 1887, by André Daniel (Paris: Charpentier), needs but a line of mention. The narrative is well done, though it must always be matter of opinion whether it is wise in a book which must be chiefly, if not solely, useful as a book of reference to criticize as well as to narrate.

One of M. Rollot's (2) admiring friends, a professor not unknown to readers of the Deux Mondes, has, it seems, informed the poet that this is the poetry he has been waiting for during twelve years. Our memory does not, we confess, furnish us with any remarkable point de repère of the poetical kind in the year 1875-6; but if M. Louis Ganderax has at last found his sacred bard, there is, of course, nothing to do but to congratulate bard and worshipper. We should not ourselves have hailed the dawn of a new poetry in M. Rollot, though he certainly is not a mere Hugoist, or a mere decadent, or a mere belated Parnassian, or a mere blasphemer to order. We might describe him as a kind of Darwinian Lamartine; and he writes always with fluency, sometimes with force, and occasionally with melody. His notion of taking off your clothes and going on all fours through a wood to revive the soul by recollections of the arboreal animal is novel and striking. But the briars would certainly scratch; and the gardes forestiers might take you up.

Mme. Jeanne France has drawn in Madame Fulbert (3) a painful and partly powerful warning to French wives not to indulge in the pastime which most novelists represent as their sole recreation. The expiation of Valérie Vuillaumin is certainly complete enough in all conscience; indeed, some of its effect is lost by the length and ferocity of the punishment. But we are afraid that the frail and fair will point out, first, that Valérie did not in the least love her lover, while they do love theirs, and, secondly, that her extraordinary brutality to him and to her child, and not her crime d'amour, was what brought judgment on her. M. Bonnetain's (4) study of French private soldier life is for a Naturalist book not very dirty; but it carries the Naturalist passion for the representation of situations of dull misery a little further than most. The work of Dostoieffsky (5) now presented by the indefatigable E. Halpérine (who either by much translation of Russian, or some other means, has become E. Halpérine-Kaminsky) consists of short stories in which, to our thinking, the author is stronger than in long ones.

We have also before us in the Petite Bibliothèque Française (Librairie des Bibliophiles) a slight but most pleasant little berquinade of M. Legouvé's called Une dot, which shows that the veteran hand has nowise lost its cunning; Trois mots sur le Volapük, by M. de la Sizeranne (Paris: Le Soudier), a subject of which we are heartily tired; a little notice of Mlle. Quinault's Dîner du Bout-de-Banc, by M. Ballieu (Paris: Dupret), which is interesting and readable as describing last-century manners; and a stout Annuaire de l'enseignement, edited by an Inspector-General, M. Jost (Paris: Colin). This last, which contains more than six hundred pages, includes a complete calendar list of the personnel of the Education Department in France, down to the directors and directresses of primary schools, an abstract of all legislation of the French Sessions of 1886-7 affecting education, and a series of articles on pedagogic subjects. Among these, one on overdriving in primary schools has the most general interest. We cannot say that M. Brunel, who is quite aghast at the idea of its being possible to teach children too much, either makes a very good case for his own view or even shows that he appreciates the facts.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

A STORY of Active Service in Foreign Lands, by Surgeon-General A. Graham Young, is a volume made up of the author's correspondence between 1856 and 1882, and is, as might be expected, almost as void of "story" as the Needy Knife-Grinder. There is too much of the ordinary tourist's description of foreign parts in these letters from South Africa, India, and China. No one cares to read for the hundredth time how Calcutta looks from the deck of a steamer on the Hooghly, or how the first sight of Hong Kong impresses the traveller. The most interesting portion of the book, and that which approaches nearer to sustained narrative, is an account of the war in China in 1860, the sacking of the Summer Palace and capture of Pekin. But there is little vitality in these pages. Doubtless it is possible to compile a readable volume of old letters, but it is even more certain that Surgeon-General Graham has not succeeded in so doing.

Mr. Charles Duke Yonge's Life of Sir Walter Scott, in the "Great Writers" series (Walter Scott), is a book that might prevail against the strenuous wrestling of the most patient reader. Naturally one marvels how it has come about that so indigestible a compound could be produced from Lockhart, for new biographies of Scott must necessarily proceed from Lockhart. There is enough, however, in Mr. Yonge's volume to make it doubtful whether he has read Lockhart, or, having read him, is conscious of his authority. His style, also, is of the kind that continually sends the reader back to master some tortuous period. At page 17 we have an alarming reference to an innocent publication, and one of the oddest illustrations of cause and effect conceivable:—"And as the title of the volume was Tales of Wonder, Scott bespoke the public favour for it by an 'Apology for Tales of Terror,' which was sufficiently ingenious, but which had a most disastrous effect on his subsequent fortunes, since it led him to form a connexion with a publisher named Ballantyne, whose unskilful management of his business eventually brought on Scott losses which nothing but his own strength of mind prevented from being absolutely ruinous." Mr. Yonge's criticism of poetry is quite as dark and wonderful as his style.

The Romance of Life-Preservation, by James Burnley (Allen & Co.), is a capital book for inquiring boys and full of attractiveness for the general reader. It is a collection of remarkable examples of all kinds of perils or disasters memorable by marvellous rescues or escapes. It treats of lifeboats, fire brigades, ambulance services, miners' lamps, and other appliances for the protection or preservation of human life. Life-preservation may of course be anything but romantic. The method of your sincere coddler is not very heroic. Mr. Burnley's book illustrates the romance of courage, endurance, and self-devotion in the hour of peril on land and sea and in many fields of enterprise. The vast subject is skilfully treated in this comprehensive and thoroughly readable compilation.

The fame of Hannah More has sadly dwindled, we fear, but it is right that among "Eminent Women" we should find Hannah More, by Charlotte M. Yonge (Allen & Co.) Miss Yonge has shaped her work into a rather scrappy narrative, which is not altogether distinguished by the nice precision and lucidity of the eighteenth century. A reference to "Amos Cottle, bookseller"—and, let us add, epic poet—is by no means to be understanded of the people, and from a sentence on page 114 it would appear doubtful whether Mason, or his tragedy Caractacus, is spoken of as "the friend and biographer of Gray."

Stage literature has always a following, and Adelaide Ristori: an Autobiography (Allen & Co.) ought to find many English readers, if only for the tragédienne's analytical studies of her favourite parts.

Bishop Forbes: a Memoir, by the Rev. Donald J. Mackey (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), is a rather dry account of the life and work of one of the ablest heads of Scottish Episcopalians. Much of the more interesting portion of the book will be found in the appendices. In the correspondence are several letters to Mr. Gladstone, one of which contains an odd reference to a "grand old man"—Dr. von Döllinger, to wit—who merits the familiar phrase because, "after all he has gone through," he remained hopeful for the future of Christianity.

An excellent handbook of English History, simple in method and clear in style, is Mr. Cyril Ransome's Short History of England (Rivingtons). The leading features are the very lucid statement of constitutional growth, the useful divisions into dynastic sections, and the handy chronological index, tables of genealogy, and key-maps. Altogether the book will be valued highly by teachers in lower forms who require a compact and complete history in miniature, and not an abridgment.

It is a little strange to read of a country once so famous for the excellence of its dairy products that dairy-farming, as a profitable undertaking, is very imperfectly understood in England. This is the melancholy reflection with which Mr. H. M. Upton introduces a practical and excellent handbook to the subject, Profitable Dairy Farming (Sampson Low & Co.) Archdeacon Denison once told the Somersetshire farmers how far they had fallen from the skill of their fathers in the making of cheese. Mr. Upton has less to say of latter-day degeneracy than of the prevalent ignorance of scientific methods and the general apathy that stifles all development of dairy-farming as a profitable industry. It is foreign competition that brings to light the present inadequate methods of English dairy-farming. Slovenly packing for markets, for instance, is only too common in this country, though the reverse is notorious of foreign dairy produce. Mr. Upton gives a striking example of this (p. 85).

Among our new editions are Mrs. Shelley's Frankenstein, in "Routledge's Pocket Library," a charming edition of an ingenious and thrilling romance; Carlyle's Sartor Resartus, "Camelot Classics" (Scott); Izaak Walton's Lives in "Morley's Universal Library" (Routledge); the third volume of Lord Tennyson's works, the Idylls of the King, complete, and illustrated by an engraving of Mr. Woolner's statue, "Guinevere" (Macmillan & Co.); Mr. Froude's Bunyan, "English Men of Letters" (Macmillan & Co.); the pocket-volume edition of Devereux, by Lord Lytton (Routledge); the fourth edition of Mr. Rowland Ward's Sportsman's Handbook to Practical Collecting and Preserving of Trophies, &c. (Rowland Ward and Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.); and a second edition of Messrs. Emile Garcke and J. M. Fells's treatise, Factory Accounts; their Principles and Practice (Crosby Lockwood & Son).

We have also received the Clergy List for 1888 (John Hall); the Colonial Office List for 1888 (Harrison & Sons); the Government Year Book, edited by Lewis Sergeant (Fisher Unwin); the Royal Kalendar for 1888 (Allen & Co.); and The Advertiser's A B C (T. B. Browne).

With reference to our review of his "Greek Religion and Mythology" Herr GRUPPE writes to us that the Reviewer, mistaking the sense of the word Religionsquelle, has attributed to him opinions which he does not hold. He means, not that intoxication is the origin of religion, but that in the oldest religious literary document—the earlier part of the Rig Veda—"intoxication forms a very important element of practical religion." Herr GRUPPE disclaims as "absurd" the theory "that drinking and religion were once very closely connected."

CONTENTS OF NO. 1,690, MARCH 17, 1888:

NINTH BONUS DIVISION, 1888.

SUN LIFE OFFICE.

ESTABLISHED 1810.

EXTRAORDINARY RESULTS.

THE profits now being paid in cash by the Sun Life Office are exceptionally large, surpassing those hitherto given, and for which the Society has been so justly noted, and average 196 per cent. of the annual premium (nearly two premiums) now payable in cash; or 332 per cent. of the annual premium (more than 3¼ premiums) added to the sum assured, exemplified more fully, at the average age 35, by the following table :

Years in force	Annual	Cash £	s.	d.	Addition £	s.	d.
5	Premium,	28	2	1	59	11	11
10		51	9	9	101	3	8
15	age 35,	52	13	3	95	0	2
20		52	15	9	86	12	3
25	£1,000,	61	1	6	91	16	0
30		79	15	5	112	3	5
35	£28 6 8	82	15	1	108	8	0
		£408	12	10	£654	15	5

Thus a Policy of £1,000 becomes one of over £1,654, or cash has been returned which, improved at 4 per cent., would equal £709, or the premium is totally extinguished.

Full examples at various ages will be supplied on application, but the above may be considered as representative.

N.B.—Bonus options at each division. No partnership liability. Modern practice. Simple proposal forms. Immediate settlements.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—The above extraordinary results prove that a With Profit Policy opened with the SUN LIFE OFFICE can be had at considerably less than COST PRICE. Before assuring obtain and read the Prospectus of the Society.

"It will be sufficient here, in calling attention to this excellent manual, to give the chief subjects with which Mr. Abercromby deals. The following sentence in the preface tells us briefly the object of the whole book:—'Many books have been written on storms and climates, but none on everyday weather'; and he claims in the present volume to have opened for those who have only known meteorology as a dull branch of statistics 'a new project in science and a new vision to the mind.'"—Saturday Review.

"A fresh crisply written autobiography, which has something to tell and tells it well; which is brimful of shrewd humour, practical energy, and cheery hopefulness........The interest never flags......His great social gifts enliven every chapter of the present volume; flashes of dry humour, keen observation, ludicrous anecdotes light up its pages."—Athenæum.

NEW BOOK BY MR. FROUDE.

The ENGLISH in the WEST INDIES; or, the Bow of Ulysses. By JAMES A. FROUDE. With 9 Illustrations from Sketches by the Author. 1 vol. 8vo. 18s.

The Times.—"Mr. Froude's brilliant book on the West Indies is, perhaps, the most enjoyable he has ever written, and has a wider interest than might be inferred from the title. Never has he thrown himself with more intensity into those broad and burning questions which concern the future of the empire. Never has he found happier opportunity for fervent eloquence or picturesque description, and he has seldom displayed his powers to greater advantage. He has ingeniously searched out analogies and contrasts; he has drawn wide political deductions from the facts that have come under his observation; by turns he is persuasive, indignant, or sarcastic, and not infrequently he breaks out in scathing invective. Consequently, the book is full of a double interest, for it reflects on every page the opinions and personality of the writer."

Daily News.—"The book is lively, simple, and instructive."

Yorkshire Post.—"From first to last the narrative is most engrossing, the work of a thoughtful, observant, and cultured traveller, no less interested in the botany of the country through which he journeyed than in its history, its people, its mineral wealth, or its sport."

THE EMPEROR FREDERICK'S MESSAGES.

IN discussing here the consequences of the change of sovereigns in Germany, it was remarked that, though no direct danger could be inferred from the weak state of health of the present EMPEROR, an indirect danger might arise from presumption on that weak state of health in other quarters. The anticipation has already been to some extent fulfilled. The tone of the Russian newspapers is less indicative of the policy of the Russian Government than is the case in any other country of Europe; but there are the beginnings of a Russian public opinion, and Russian newspapers no doubt in some degree express it. They appear to take for granted that the policy of the new EMPEROR will and must be a policy of peace, almost at any price; and that Russia is even freer than she was some weeks ago to trample upon international law in Bulgaria without fear of interference from Germany, even if her proceedings brought her into collision with Germany's most intimate allies. It is scarcely necessary to say that no more certain cause of the disturbance of peace could be found than the sharing of this opinion by those who are really competent to determine the action of Russia. The "stronghold of peace" of which the new German EMPEROR spoke in his first official utterance exists as such a stronghold only on the terms of making itself respected and feared. Whenever brigands and highwaymen, provided that they do not attack it directly, are allowed to pursue their calling tranquilly within sight of its walls, it is not a stronghold of peace—it ceases to be a stronghold altogether. Fortunately, there is nothing of this fainéant tone in the three documents which the EMPEROR has addressed to the Prussian Chambers, to Germany at large, and to the Reichsland of Alsace-Lorraine respectively. The omission of Russia from the list of countries to which Prince BISMARCK paid special thanks in his remarks on the second of these documents has been commented on, but with a curious forgetfulness of the reason of the omission, which extends to England. The PRINCE was speaking of Parliamentary condolences which it was desirable for the Reichstag as a Parliament to acknowledge. There is no Parliament in Russia, and it is not the custom of the English Parliament to occupy itself with matters of this kind, so that the PRINCE could not have mentioned either country if he had felt disposed to do so.

The address to the Prussian Diet, as well as that to the Reichstag, consists in part of an apology for not taking the constitutional oath on account of ill health, and a solemn declaration in lieu thereof. The Reichsland possessing no Constitution, properly speaking, naturally did not receive any such explanation. This last document is, and could not but be, the weakest of the three, and it would perhaps have been better if it could have been omitted. To proclaim the determination to "preserve the rights of the Empire over "these German territories reunited with the Fatherland "after a long interval" has about it a little too much of the threat and a little too much of the argument. "Consciousness of the duty to cultivate in these territories "German ideas and customs" seems to argue a second and very awkward consciousness that German ideas and customs do not exist in these territories at present, which in its turn strikes at the legs of the former argument that they are "German." And it is, perhaps, rash to prophesy that "the lapse of years cannot annul" this very recent union. But the situation is no doubt difficult, and it may very well have seemed to the new EMPEROR and his advisers important at any rate to discourage the notion, set afloat by some silly or sanguine critics on his earlier utterances, that the firm and disciplinary character of the Emperor WILLIAM's régime was to be exchanged for a régime of compliance and concession. The intention was, no doubt, in this case wise, though the expression may not be on the whole happy. It is certain that the German Empire will never willingly let Alsace-Lorraine go. Prince BISMARCK, if he chose, might point to the language of this document as evidence of the wisdom of his own views as to these annexations; but he is not likely to do so.

Less interest attaches to the purely Prussian Message. The people of Prussia are quite satisfied with their sovereigns, and they would be an exceedingly foolish people if they were not. The time may come when Prussians shall be as wise as those Englishmen who execrate their fathers for having presented them with an Empire; but that time is not yet. They have another reason for satisfaction which, as being less obvious, is perhaps less generally felt, but which patriotism ought to relish. Prussia has now long given the lie, and may, if she chooses, continue to do so, to the wiseacres and doctrinaires who have for ever so many years declared that a real constitution and a real king are (as a great student of German would have said) "in-"compossible." To that favourite doctrine of modern Liberalism Prussia has replied by producing the pair in actual work; and she is alone among nations in the act. It is impossible for anything to be more strictly constitutional than the Prussian Constitution, and not very easy for anything to be less democratic. Now that even England has to a great extent given in to the foolish fallacy that constitutional and democratic are convertible and coextensive terms, Prussia may be said to be alone in demonstrating—and, on the whole, very successfully demonstrating—the contrary. The ideal, no doubt, is the same as the original ideal of English constitutionalists; but for many years England has been more and more guilty of backslidings from it, so that ignorant persons are found who describe, not merely the exercise of the most strictly constitutional acts of the Crown, but the exercise of the most strictly constitutional rights of the House of Lords, as "unconstitutional." Germans are supposed not to dislike giving lessons to the rest of the world; and this is one which they may continue to give with great credit to themselves and great profit to others.

Europe, however, naturally looks with most—at least with most selfish—interest to the address to the Reichstag. Much of that address is, of course, "common form"; but it is significant enough that the paragraph which is not common form, the paragraph which gives individuality to the Message, and distinguishes it from any Message which might have been delivered in any year and almost on any occasion, is devoted to the recent Army Bill. It is quite true, no doubt, that the hand of fate prevented the late Emperor from conveying his Imperial thanks for that Bill to the Reichstag; but, without some special object, the passage repairing this necessary omission would hardly have occupied such an important and such an isolated place in the Imperial Message. The fact of this prominence is an unmistakable answer to those who, either from mere foolish optimism or from more interested motives, endeavoured to read into former utterances of the EMPEROR's an intention of abandoning that nemo me impune lacessit attitude which the new German Empire has kept up from the very hour of its birth amid fire, and sword, and conquest. It gives also, though not an equally direct, an equally forcible answer to those who think that the German policy is to be less friendly to Austria than of old. If with the entire southern frontier of Germany safe from invasion, and, what is more, guaranteed by a fast ally, the Empire feels it necessary to make these great sacrifices in men and money, it may be calculated without much difficulty what sacrifices would have to be made with Austria estranged. Political arithmetic is not one of the exact sciences, but it will give a satisfactory answer to the question, If so much and so many be absolutely needed to defend the Baltic, and the Vistula, and the Rhine, will this be sufficient to defend in addition the mountains and the plains from the Lake of Constance to the Silesian-Polish frontier? They are but idle words which argue that anything but a temporary aberration of personal judgment could lead Germany to estrange a faithful and valuable friend in order to conciliate a certain enemy.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

MR. RITCHIE'S lucid and comprehensive speech justified both the selection by which he was placed in charge of the Local Government Bill and his admission to the Cabinet. It may be assumed that he has had a principal share in the construction of the scheme with which in all its details he is so thoroughly familiar. As such a measure was to be introduced, Mr. RITCHIE's Bill deserves the approval of the House of Commons and of the country. The Government would have courted defeat if it had trifled with the question of local government. There may still be different opinions on the necessity of a municipal revolution; but from the time when the general intentions of the Government were announced the question of opportuneness ceased to be material. Mr. RITCHIE acknowledged with judicious candour the absence or insignificance of any popular demand for legislation, and his statement that there was a general desire for decentralization required further exposition. He probably spoke of the supposed expediency of giving new powers to local authorities, and the practical or political impossibility of enlarging the administrative functions of the justices in Quarter Session. No additional control over taxation would in the present day be granted except to elected bodies, nor, indeed, have the justices any especial competence to deal with many of the duties which will be assigned to County and District Councils. The judicial powers of Quarter Sessions are for the present reserved, to be probably hereafter transferred to professional tribunals. The grant or refusal of licences in cases of complaint against the actual holders will also fall within the jurisdiction of Quarter Sessions. The District Councils will have an absolute discretion to grant, to confirm, or to refuse licences in all other cases. Where no complaint is made and sustained the withdrawal of a licence will confer a right to compensation at the expense of the county or the district. The advocates of compulsory abstinence oppose, as might be expected, the claim to compensation; but there is no doubt that the House of Commons will by a large majority sanction a demand which is obviously just. Expropriated publicans will, at the best, suffer heavy loss by the prohibition, which will prevent them from employing their capital in the business which they understand. It may be taken for granted that the lessors of their premises will also receive compensation. The opponents of Mr. RITCHIE's proposal will probably suggest that the Councils may, as representatives of the ratepayers, have an interest in renewing licences; but the general policy of the local authority, if not its special decisions, will be ultimately controlled by constituents to whom the temperance agitators are professedly anxious to remit the whole question of licensing.

Mr. GLADSTONE, while he courteously recognized the merit of Mr. RITCHIE's speech, was apparently inclined to withdraw or to qualify the promise which he was understood to make at the beginning of the Session. He then, for the apparent purpose of encouraging the legislative activity of the Government, pledged himself to give them all the assistance in his power, by discouraging obstruction and unnecessary opposition. He now exercises his right of considering every part of the Local Government Bill before expressing an opinion in favour of any of its provisions. When the debates begin it will be more possible than at present to appreciate the spirit in which he receives a not unambitious project of legislation. It might have been expected that he would at least have approved the prudent liberality of the Government in founding the new organization on direct household suffrage; but Mr. GLADSTONE can seldom be blamed for saying too little, and in the discussion of the Bill he may perhaps be better than his word. No member of either party has better reason to know the difficulty of framing a complicated measure without giving occasion for plausible objections. As both parties had seemed to agree on the policy of introducing a Local Government Bill, it was necessary to produce a definite scheme. If Amendments which could not be accepted were carried, the whole labour of the Government would be wasted. Mr. RITCHIE wisely abstained from stating which parts of the measure were vital. The Government will retain its discretion to insist on those parts of the Bill which it may regard as indispensable. On the whole, it will, perhaps, be less unpalatable to the Liberals than to the Conservatives; but Sir R. PAGET, who ought to understand the opinion of his own party, welcomed the explanation of the measure with unqualified cordiality. In truth, the representatives of the agricultural interest are primarily responsible for the proposed legislation. But for their repeated demands of relief from local taxation, it is probable that a Local Government Bill might have been indefinitely postponed. Their efforts have been so far successful that Mr. RITCHIE and Mr. GOSCHEN make the ratepayers a present of two or three millions a year. If the boon is thought to be acceptable, it must be purchased by suitable concessions. The country gentlemen will probably regret the loss of their administrative powers, and they may with reason anticipate a large increase of local taxation when it is controlled by the nominees of household suffrage. Nevertheless, it would be impossible for them to establish a claim to protection against a withdrawal of their powers. Unpaid public functionaries have no private interest in the possession of rights which ought rather to be regarded as duties. On the whole, the governing bodies which are about to be superseded will do well to transmit their functions to their successors with the best possible grace. They ought also to remember that they will inevitably be losers if the Government incurs any serious defeat.

It is impossible without careful study to understand the numerous details of the Bill. Ten of the largest towns are to be made counties, with the result of retaining the self-government which they have always enjoyed, and at the same time of acquiring the new powers which are to be conferred on local authorities in counties. There will probably be a long series of contests on the extension of the list. Liverpool and Manchester and the rest will have no pretext for dissatisfaction; but the numerous towns of the second or third rank with populations ranging from 20,000 to 100,000 will almost certainly protest against subordination to the County Council. The measure as it is framed is symmetrical and probably judicious; but it will interfere with local sentiments, if not with vested interests. The great extent of the changes which are to be introduced is illustrated by the provisions which are to apply to Local Board districts. At present their governing bodies are elected by plural voting, by which the larger ratepayers possess two or four or six times the electoral power of their less wealthy neighbours. It would be impossible to maintain the distinction when the Local Board districts become parts of the county under the proposed scheme; but it is worth while to observe that Mr. RITCHIE had only room to describe the change in a single sentence of his speech. When the clause is reached in the discussion of the Bill he will be able to show that the present constitution of the Local Boards is already anomalous. The simple household franchise exists in municipal boroughs, some of which are less popular and less rich than the larger Local Board districts. An answer, given in two words to a question asked by Sir ALGERNON BORTHWICK, informed the House that female ratepayers are, as at present, in municipal boroughs to possess the franchise. The Government could not have decided otherwise, though the first instalment of the rights of women originated in the ambiguous language of an Act of Parliament which had not been intended to confer the privilege. It has not been generally remarked that clerical blunders in drafts of Bills are among the elements of an historical constitution. Female suffrage is more legitimate in municipal contests than in Parliamentary elections. It will be more possible to exclude women who may not be ratepayers from a share in the expenditure of the local funds than to prevent the concession of political power to the whole sex.

The only part of Mr. RITCHIE's statement which excited general surprise was the announcement that London is to be included in the Bill. On further consideration it will probably be found that the attempt to deal with so large a question in the present measure is a mistake. The mode of government which is suited to a county or a great provincial town must almost necessarily be ill suited to a province which is more populous than Scotland and much richer and more intelligent than Ireland, and a municipal government for four or five millions of persons seems at first sight an impossibility. Whatever name may be given to London it will be rather a principality than a county.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Mr. FIRTH will oppose the clauses relating to London on one side and the Corporation and the Board of Works on another. The provisions of the Bill may be in themselves defensible, but a serious conflict on a point not necessarily connected with the rest of the Bill may be inconvenient, and perhaps dangerous. It is fortunate that the London clauses are, from their nature, separable and independent. In case of need the Government may, if it thinks fit, postpone them to a future Session. The case of London is so solitary and so exceptional, that it ought to be considered by itself. The reasons which Mr. RITCHIE urged for the course which has been adopted are weighty, but not conclusive. The remainder of the Bill will, without the incumbrance of a collateral dispute, probably occupy nearly the whole of the Session. The Government has removed a certain feeling of uneasiness on the part of its supporters by excluding from the Bill all matters connected with the Poor Law. The contribution of fourpence a day to the support of every indoor pauper scarcely requires a modification of the general statement. The provision is free from the objection which applies to every encouragement of pauperism. It is against outdoor, and not indoor, relief that legislation is required. On the whole, the Bill shows constructive ability and sound judgment, and Parliament would incur a serious responsibility by objecting to pass it. On the most delicate and difficult issue which was necessarily raised the Government has arrived at a just conclusion. It would, for reasons which have been frequently explained, have been extremely unwise to form the Councils on any basis except that of household suffrage.

SCOTT FOR THE YOUNG.

TO teach the young idea how to shoot has always been accounted a respectable undertaking, and it is not unnatural, in these advanced times, that there should be a general desire to instil the juvenile mind with the love of good literature. It may possibly prove to be a national advantage that English classics should be read in all Board schools. That, however, is a question independent of the introduction of the best fiction into reading-classes above the Third Standard. For this purpose there is an enormous literature available. The tales of MARIA EDGEWORTH and the shorter stories and tracts of HARRIET MARTINEAU are excellent examples. Whatever the choice may be, it is obvious that the works introduced should be unadulterated specimens of English literature, untouched by the irreverent fingers of educational pedlars and pedants. In a recent addition to a series of reading-books published by Messrs. BELL & SONS we have an example of abridgment of the most gratuitously offensive kind. To select SCOTT, of all writers, and that noble and impeccable romance The Talisman among all the Waverley Novels, is an intolerable piece of presumption. It is only an aggravation of the offence to remember that the master-works of SCOTT were some years since vulgarized and distorted with a still greater show of audacity. It is something new, we believe, to emulate that evil example in the interest of popular education. There is a ludicrous incongruity between the deed and the excellent intentions of the projectors of these reading-books which intrudes upon, though it cannot mitigate, the indignation aroused by so gross a violation of good taste and reverence. SHAKSPEARE for the family is laudable in comparison, and CHAUCER for babes is a harmless pleasantry. Selection, too, may be a necessary, and is at least an excusable, literary process. It does not misrepresent or degrade genius, or falsify a document.

Abridgment, of course, may be authorized or legitimate. Abstracts of HUME or CLARENDON by competent hands, and LOCKHART'S reduction of his Life of Scott, may be cited as models of the art of epitome. Imaginative literature would needs suffer indefinable injury even when abridged by an expert, if so incredible an assumption were permissible. The Talisman, "abridged for use in schools," is sufficiently maladroit to create a distaste for SCOTT in the juvenile reading-classes permitted, as we see by the advertised bait, to revel in selections of ANDERSEN and GRIMM. The dramatic opening of the story is entirely wiped out by the abridger. Of the prodigious and stirring encounter between Sir KENNETH and the SARACEN there is absolutely nothing. The horsemen, we are told, "met in "combat"; "but, after a display of valour on each side, "a truce was agreed upon, and they rode side by side to "the little cluster of palm-trees." All the fire and clash of that brilliant onslaught, the impressive and masterly presentment of the landscape, the glow and atmosphere of the spirit-moving romance, are reduced to one acrid page, as dull as the argument of a libretto. SCOTT'S chapters are parcelled into "lessons," brief sections of text arranged on no conceivable principle, and the teacher is delicately directed to certain "lists of difficult words." No meanings are given with the words, the syllables of which are separated, though by no means accurately in every instance. The native hardihood of the author of the abridgment is shown by the exclusion of words used by himself in a manner not to be comprehended by the young, e.g. "['Out upon the hound!' said RICHARD, spitting in "contempt, by way of interjection]." By a thoughtful provision the passages interpolated are distinguished from the original text by being placed between brackets, that the guileless schoolboy may the more readily distinguish between undiluted SCOTT and interjected wash. Truly, the ways of pedagogues are wonderful, and of all the quackeries that are born of them, this pretty example of "Folly, doctor-like, controlling skill" is the most inscrutable.

LORD ROSEBERY ON THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

LORD ROSEBERY'S powerful speech had one defect, which, however, is of little practical importance. It is doubtful whether he would have asked for a Select Committee if he had not known that his proposal would be rejected. Lord SALISBURY'S argument was on this point unanswerable. There was nothing except the speech itself to be referred to a Committee. Lord ROSEBERY, though he made several ingenious suggestions for the future constitution of the House of Lords, prudently abstained from committing himself to any definite plan. A Committee has to consider the details and the application of principles which have been already approved by the House. In the present instance the fragments of the existing organism would have been thrown into MEDEA'S cauldron without any provision for their subsequent reunion. The most plausible of Lord ROSEBERY'S imaginary substitutes for the House of Lords does credit to his originality. No previous projector had imagined the conversion of the Privy Council into a Second Chamber. The number of members would be sufficient, and yet not inconveniently large. Almost all of them would have had official experience, and the list would include the leaders of political parties, and somewhat more than half of the whole body consists of peers. The objection that Privy Councillors are nominated by the Crown might perhaps be removed by some legislative contrivance. It would be more difficult to supply the places of those who would insist on retaining their seats in the House of Commons. It is not worth while to discuss further a hypothetical plan which was disclaimed by its author as a solution of the problem. That it is for the present insoluble may be plausibly inferred from the impracticability of all the alternative plans which have hitherto been devised. To certain minds an hereditary legislative Assembly seems to be absurd; but all, or almost all, the substitutes which have been suggested would probably be less powerful and therefore less useful. It would be interesting to learn whether Mr. W. H. SMITH and Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH have in their minds any more definite scheme than those which have been noticed rather than accepted by Lord ROSEBERY. Their late declarations only show that they are willing to apply to an acknowledged evil a remedy which has not yet been discovered. They probably entertain no invincible prejudice against the demarcation of the longitude or the squaring of the circle, though neither task has yet been accomplished.

Lord ROSEBERY inclines to a project, which has some recommendations, of election by the peers themselves. As he truly says, it would be absolutely necessary to provide for the proportional representation of a minority which is too weak in numbers to protect itself. It might be possible to enlarge the constituency by adding to it a certain number of responsible persons, though scarcely the County Chairmen; but the result would in both cases be nearly the same. The peers who had satisfied the test of election would be respectable in character; and many of them would be distinguished by ability and experience; but these qualities already distinguish the same persons, and they control in proportion to their number the present House of Lords. The chief advantage of the change would be that the minority would be in some degree strengthened; but there is no reason to expect that in any circumstances the Liberal peers will not be a minority. Lord GRANVILLE, Lord HERSCHELL, and Lord ROSEBERY himself command respect and attention when they think fit to address the House of Lords. After any kind of manipulation, as long as the Upper House consisted of peers, the Liberals would be outvoted. The popular jealousy of privilege and hereditary right would be neither abated nor diminished by the proposed purification of the Upper House. It would still be exclusively aristocratic both in the persons of its members and in its partially representative character. As the conduct of debate and of business now rests with the leaders, the House already possesses all the advantage which it could derive from their ability and knowledge of affairs. The occasional attendants who come down on great occasions to vote with their party would exercise a more important function in electing the existing peers than in swelling the majority or minority at divisions. The exclusion of half a dozen disreputable peers would be an infinitesimal advantage. As Lord GRANVILLE said, they seldom thrust themselves in the way of colleagues by whom they are coldly regarded; and consequently they create but little scandal. The strongest objection to Lord ROSEBERY'S plan applies to every proposal of the kind. An efficient Second Chamber cannot be arbitrarily created; and perhaps the present House of Lords, with its admitted defects, has elements of strength which would be wanting to a new Assembly. The conclusion is not altogether satisfactory, and in changed circumstances it may deserve reconsideration.

The question of life-peerages attracts but little interest. Lord SALISBURY, who has for many years been favourable to such a measure, called attention to the fact that creations of hereditary peerages are now not, as formerly, confined to persons of ample fortune. The admission of life-peers would alter the character of the House even less than the election of the legislating peers. Life-peers would be appointed by Ministers whom they were prepared to support, and they would share the feelings of the respectable class to which they would all belong. Lord GRANVILLE is an older and more zealous supporter of the scheme than Lord SALISBURY himself. A measure for effecting the object may not improbably pass the House of Lords, and it is impossible to know whether it will be approved by the House of Commons. The enemies of an hereditary peerage will grudge any advantage which the House of Lords might derive from reinforcement by a new set of colleagues. Some precedents for a mixture of Crown nominees and hereditary members of an Upper House have been furnished by Hungary and some other countries; but their experience has comparatively little value. The Hungarian Legislature is not new in itself; but it has only of late years been habitually recognized and respected by the Government. The House of Lords is still the most powerful of European Second Chambers, though it no longer maintains its political equality with the House of Commons. The experiment of admitting life-peers may be tried without serious danger; but the whole question of reorganization of the House of Lords will still remain open. Antiquarians please themselves by remarking that before the Reformation the spiritual peers outnumbered the hereditary portion of the House. Bishops and abbots, representing a large part of the land, were extremely unlike ex-governors of colonies, who might be summoned to the House of Lords as life-peers. The law of ecclesiastical succession was regarded in former times as not less natural than the inheritance by sons of their fathers' estates. Bishops and abbots formed part of the peerage because they were great territorial lords.

Lord SALISBURY, as usual, made thoughtful and original remarks, rather perhaps for his own intellectual satisfaction than with any immediate practical object. He admitted the grave inconvenience of the unequal division of parties in the House of Lords. As Lord ROSEBERY had observed, the Home Rule party, exclusive of the Irish Nationalists, counts two hundred supporters in the House of Commons and an insignificant fraction of the House of Lords. Even in cases where the antagonism of opinion is less conspicuous, the Conservative leader disposes of a constant and irresistible majority. There is therefore some excuse for Lord ROSEBERY'S apparently paradoxical statement that the voice of the House of Lords is that of a single statesman. Lord SALISBURY evidently felt the force of Lord ROSEBERY'S argument, as he took pains to show that the permanent majority of the Conservatives in the House of Lords is of comparatively recent origin. He mentioned several important divisions in which Lord PALMERSTON and his predecessors had defeated the Conservative leaders, and he contended that the present derangement of the balance is owing to the revolutionary character of Mr. GLADSTONE'S policy. It is true that in the last twenty years Mr. GLADSTONE has striven with much success to create and widen the feud between the upper and lower classes. Of late he has ostentatiously promoted the same object by contrasting on all occasions the classes and the masses. Mainly for this reason, those who are interested in the maintenance of property and order have, with few exceptions, denounced and opposed their formidable adversary. There are consequently no materials for constituting a Second Chamber which would not be Conservative; and it is impossible to persuade the peers to follow Mr. GLADSTONE. Yet Lord SALISBURY might have quoted an instance which has occurred within the last fortnight of a successful rebellion against his authority when he opposed an encroachment on proprietary right. The PRIME MINISTER, who on that occasion was supported by the late Lord Chancellor, in vain advised the House of Lords to respect the bargain which had been concluded between Parliament and the railway Companies. Lord SALISBURY'S explanation of the great preponderance of Conservative peers is undoubtedly correct. Unfortunately, discernment of the causes of a political inconvenience has little tendency to remove it. The disturbance of social relations, for which Mr. GLADSTONE is largely responsible, is certain to outlive him. Lord SALISBURY neither encouraged nor condemned Lord ROSEBERY'S proposals of change. He would probably not oppose any reasonable change which might enable the House of Lords to take a more active hand in legislation; but a Prime Minister is seldom of a sanguine temper, and Lord SALISBURY is not disposed to associate himself with a movement which has so far assumed no definite or practical form. The success of one of Lord ROSEBERY'S proposals would probably be as acceptable to Lord SALISBURY as it would be agreeable to himself. An arrangement by which a peer could choose whether he would belong to the Upper or Lower House would probably tempt Lord SALISBURY to prefer the more laborious and more ambitious career. A mere permission to take part as a Minister in the debates of both Houses would be less exciting.

SIR CHARLES WARREN AND MR. BAGGALLAY.

THE House of Commons had nothing better to do, before it was counted out on Tuesday night, than to discuss Mr. PICKERSGILL'S motion of censure upon the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police. Mr. PICKERSGILL is not, to put it mildly, a clever man; and his speech was neither instructive nor amusing. A member of Parliament who can gravely say—and Mr. PICKERSGILL has never been suspected of a joke—that Sir CHARLES WARREN is "a sort "of spurious CROMWELL," and whose notion of an epigram is to describe the same functionary as "this military and mili-"tant Chief Commissioner," scarcely deserves the compliment of rational opposition. As, however, Mr. PICKERSGILL, after a few pretty broad hints from Mr. FOWLER that he was trifling with the House, thought proper to withdraw his motion, leaving to Mr. HUGHES the final honours of the count, we are relieved from the necessity of further dwelling upon the plentiful lack of matter in his indictment. The case is really a trivial one enough, and might have been adequately treated by a question and answer across the table. The injured dignity of Mr. ERNEST BAGGALLAY, "lately a member of this House," is not a matter of Imperial concern, and it had already engaged, with more obvious propriety, the attention of the Town Council of West Ham. Mr. BAGGALLAY thought proper to disbelieve the evidence of Police Constable BLOY, who charged a girl with drunkenness and disorderly behaviour. BLOY, according to the HOME SECRETARY, was a "bad and "unsatisfactory witness," who seems to have made the magistrate suppose that the girl was charged with immorality, whereas in truth and in fact she was not. Accordingly Mr. BAGGALLAY, in discharging the defendant, made some unfavourable comments upon BLOY'S veracity and credit. We agree with Mr. ADDISON that both magistrates and judges are far too fond of thrusting their views of things in general upon the notice of the public. They are supposed to know the law, and sometimes they do actually know it. But they are not better acquainted than the rest of us with SHAKSPEARE and the musical glasses, nor is it desirable upon other grounds that they should deliver miscellaneous lectures from the Bench. BLOY having been severely censured by Mr. BAGGALLAY, himself by no means the wisest of stipendiaries, it became the Commissioner's duty to consider whether the constable was fit to remain in the force. That he was bound, and not merely entitled, to make an inquiry no one who gives the point a moment's thought will deny. He could not allow a grave charge against one of his men to pass unnoticed. He could not punish BLOY by dismissal without giving him an opportunity of being heard in his own defence. He had to take evidence, and he did take it.
